PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY, 1870.

RICH OR POOR?

BY MARION HARLAND.

"YOUR papa is not as rich as your Uncle Elbert."

"Why isn't he, mamma?"

"Don't ask absurd questions, Carrie. I wish you children would take your books and games into the dining-room for awhile. My head aches, and I am tired to death. I should like to have a nap of ten minutes before it is time to get supper. Your papa will not be in until late, I know."

But when the room was cleared of the talkative flock, Mrs. Lollard did not lie down, or even close her eyes. She leaned forward, resting her elbows upon her knees, her chin in her hands—the ungraceful, but restful attitude over-tired women are prone to adopt when removed from critical observation. "Taking one's comfort," I once heard a much-enduring housewife and mother call it. Mentally, Mrs. Lollard was taking discomfort instead.

It was the evening of New Year's Day. Bleak twilight was barely kept without the windows by the sleepy glow of the anthracite in the grate, which was only half full. Coal was high, and they could not afford to keep up a larger fire, the mother had said, shortly, to Carrie, the eldest daughter, when she would have replenished the sinking heap.

"It is so dark in here, mamma. It is enough to give one the blues," the girl had remonstrated. "We can't see to read, or talk either, for that matter. Mayn't I light the gas?"

"Not while there is a light in the dining-room. Annie is setting the table in there. Our gas bills last quarter were enormous."

"It is doleful," complained Carrie, who was usually easily satisfied with whatever her parents decreed. "I think there is not another family in town that has such dismal, poky ways as ours. At Uncle Elbert's they are as gay as larks all the while. And here we sit moping in the dark, with nothing to amuse us—on New Year's Eve, too!"

The mother had answered crossly at that with the sentence at the head of this sketch. The more pettishly because the child's repining seemed the echo of her own discontent.

Her eldest brother, Elbert Craig, had begun his business career, as had her husband, at the foot of the ladder, had mounted the lower rungs so slowly, that, when she married John Lollard, sixteen years ago, Elbert was—notwithstanding his marriage with his employer's daughter—still only head book-keeper in the establishment he had entered as clerk, eight years earlier. John had just set up a store of his own with a fair prospect of success, which was speedily overcast with the hopes of thousands of other mercantile men by a tornado panic sweeping over the country with a force and suddenness few were strong enough to withstand. Carrie, the Lollards' first-born, could just sit alone when her father gave up everything he could call his own into the hands of his creditors. He had nothing to reproach himself with. He had worked hard, invested prudently, as he believed, and lived, if comfortably, economically. His assets exactly balanced his liabilities, and there was nothing left except an unblemished name, sound health, a stout heart, and firm trust in GOD as capital for beginning the world anew. He found a place without much trouble as salesman in a wholesale dry-goods store, the proprietor of which was a personal friend who had been his chief creditor. John Lollard esteemed himself a fortunate man in securing it so soon after his failure, while hundreds were thrown out of employment for months, and many ruined beyond redemption. It was a snug berth during the storm, and would serve his purpose well enough, bring in bread and meat to his little family until he could look around him for something better.

In the fourteen years that had elapsed since then, the something better had assumed no more promising shape than a trifling rise of salary, and this he had solicited under the pressure of his increasing expenses. There were five children at home, now, three girls and two boys, and the non-elastic property of his income was more clearly and painfully appreciated each day. He often said to himself and to others that he could never have pulled through a single one of the toilsome years had not his wife been such a good manager. He ever bore about with him, although she did not know this, the recollection of her cheerful courage, her patience, her self-denial, and her encouraging counsel in the hour when their fortunes were at the lowest ebb. He could not refer, even now, without emotion to the heroic integrity that seconded his resolution to pay his honest debts if the act stripped him of the very bed he slept upon, and the tenderness that assuaged the pangs of disappointed ambition. She believed secretly, and sometimes very sadly, that he undervalued her submission to the trials that had visited them since that first great struggle as much as he had exaggerated her fortitude at that date. It was far easier to fight that battle than to endure without irritation and complaint the pinching, rubbing, and pricking of everyday life. True, he was steady in his assertion that she was a wise economist, and he never growled, as some richer men she could mention were apt to do, when she asked him for money, but, study times and seasons as she would, the application for funds would occasionally fall upon a day when there was nothing in his pocket to meet it, and she mistook his reluctance to tell her the truth for disappointment that the last supply had not lasted longer.

It is a wearisome, hateful, inexpressibly dispiriting task—the endeavor to make one dollar do the work of a dollar and a half—the futile attempt to hold the slippery representations of clothing, food, fuel, and house rent until the bills for these are all met, and there are no coming accounts to affright one into a cold sweat of agonized expectation. “Take no thought for the morrow” is a text which a vast army of anxious workers have had more difficulty in obeying than they would have known in replying to the call to persecution and death for the truth’s sake. Mrs. Lollard was conscious that she disregarded it habitually, and the knowledge that her faith was weak, herself a doubting disciple, tended to depress her still further. She ought to remember that the Father knew she had need of these things, that they who wait upon him shall want for no real good; but, in the face of these comfortable assurances, there would arise, even while she was pleading His promise upon her knees in her closet, the naked fact of present and actual necessity. There were many nights in which she could not sleep for hours together, while those for whom she planned were locked in slumber; when she thought herself into a headache and heartache, contriving how this and that garment could be turned and altered to save the expense of a new one, or how the grocer’s or butcher’s account for the ensuing month could be cut down to match the capabilities of her housekeeping purse, or wondering how they were to get along when all the girls were grown, and the boys both old enough to go to school. Her husband and children were tempted to think her unreasonably peevish or unkind in her taciturnity on the mornings succeeding these vigils; but her heart was too heavy, her soul too sick, for the affectation of liveliness. The burden was grievous upon John’s shoulders also, as she could not but acknowledge, but he had the distraction of work with other men, and amid scenes that did not remind him incessantly of the need of more money than he possessed or was ever likely to earn.

“And there are scores of things men never see, and wouldn’t care if they did,” she said, inwardly, gloomily staring the low-spirited fire further out of countenance. “John would not have understood, for instance, how Margaret gloried in talking to me day before yesterday about her preparations for New Year’s, her girls’ dresses, and the calls she expected to receive, and all that. He would not have detected the complacent smirk with which she asked me to get out of the carriage with her at the confectioner’s, and rattled off her final orders to him; nor the patronizing tone in which she directed him to put up a package of bondons for me to take home to my children. She is forever asking my advice about purchasing some article of furniture or ornament, and inquiring why I do not treat myself to the like; pushing me in the hearing of others with questions as to why I don’t send my children to dancing-school, and allow them to attend gay parties; why Carrie doesn’t take singing lessons from an Italian master, and why I never attend matinées and concerts. I overheard her tell John the other night that I was making an old woman of myself, staying so closely at home, and dressing so ‘demurely.’ She meant shabbily, as I knew, but he only laughed, and said he rarely noticed a lady’s dress, unless it were extremely fantastic or very slovenly, and that his wife was a model of neatness and taste in his eyes. I do dress meanly in comparison with most of my associates; never feel more dowdiness than when I am with her; she has such exquisite taste, and the means of gratifying it. Yet I like handsome clothes and a plenty of them as much as she does. It provokes me to see her rolling by in her carriage, decked out like a queen, when I have to count the cost before getting into an omnibus, and have not had a new hat or cloak in three years. It is mean and wicked, I suppose, to be envious, but I wish, at least, since she is so much better off than I, that I were not obliged to see it all." She could not help despising herself heartily for the admission, but self-contempt did not make the reality of her situation more tolerable.

Margaret Craig was the only daughter of a wealthy merchant, who had condescended to allow her to ally his family with the poorer but not less respectable one represented in his establishment by his handsome and clever book-keeper. The fortune of the heiress had gone far toward raising Elbert to his present position. His wife was very fond of him, in her way, and assumed no airs of superiority on account of the assistance she had given him in his upward march. She never suspected that her sister-in-law almost hated her for the difference in their circumstances, and for what Mrs. Lollard conceived to be an ostentatious display of wealth and the advantages it bestowed upon the possessor. Mrs. Craig pitied her poor relations very sincerely. After the manner of most prosperous people she had a spice of contempt for them for not being as well-to-do as herself, but she liked and took much notice of them, nevertheless. At stated seasons—Christmas, New Year's, and birthdays, she made valuable presents to them, with good-natured liberality, if not judiciously. Mrs. Lollard did not resent her gifts of books, toys, and jewelry, but her soul arose in violent revolt against the acceptance of certain parcels of cast-off clothing, always fine in material and never much worn, which it was Mrs. Craig's pleasure to send around to the unfashionable street wherein the Lollards lived, when her own spring and fall dressmaking was done.

"I have no use for them, and where there is a house full of children such things can be worked up to advantage," she would say, carelessly, when her husband's sister tried to decline the bounty.

She had an easy, patronizing way of dealing with the dwellers in the out-of-the-way quarter that drove Mrs. Lollard to the extreme verge of decent forbearance, when she considered that the suave Lady Bountiful was, after all, only the wife of her brother. The plain truth that the Craigs were up in the world, and she and hers down, and likely to remain so, was gall and wormwood when illustrated by Margaret's "insufferable ways." It made matters no better, but rather worse that the semi-annual beneficence was so often useful.

"How well Carrie looks in that gray silk!" Mrs. Craig had said during the ride to the confectioner's that had furnished Mrs. Lollard with a pregnant text for her fireside musing. "I was so glad she happened to wear it, Wednesday evening, when we had her to dinner. You showed good taste in trimming it with russet velvet. The contrast is very fashionable just now, as I suppose you know. We had three or four visitors in the course of the evening, and she really appeared very well—was quite the little lady. I remarked it to her uncle afterward. I should not have thrown aside the dress—I only bought it last spring—if I could have matched it. Somebody spilled a glass of wine over the front breadth the second time I ever wore it. It was too bad, for I liked it very much."

"It is a good silk," rejoined Mrs. Lollard, repressing her wounded pride by the thought that but for this gift, Carrie must have gone without any better evening dress than the purple Empress cloth her aunt had sent her at the same time.

"I never buy anything but the best fabrics, my dear!" Mrs. Craig drew her sable cloak about her with a shrug of satisfaction. "The most expensive things are invariably the cheapest in the end."

An excellent motto for those who can command money to purchase the best of everything. The poor are proverbially short-sighted. How often this defect is compulsory; how often a fault in judgment is not a question for the rich to decide. Mrs. Lollard knew as well as did her mentor that cloth at twelve dollars a yard would wear twice as long and look three times as well as a fabric that cost but six; but she had not the money for the first outlay. That settled the matter. The cheaper cloth must be bought and used all the more carefully because it would soon show signs of shabbiness.

There was no apartment in the Craig's mansion—unless it were a servant's dormitory—so plainly fitted up as was that in which Mrs. Lollard now sat. It was the living-room of the house, shut off by folding-doors from the better-furnished front parlor where a fire was seldom kindled. The carpet was faded, especially about the door and fireplace, and darned in divers spots, besides having been turned twice and made over, that the freshest breadths might be shifted to the middle of the room, and the less reputable be hidden under the lounge and in dark corners. A sewing-machine stood between the windows, with a wide-mouthed work-basket upon the top. This was never empty. One of the items in Mrs. Lollard's good management was that she always kept some piece of sewing ready to her hand—"to catch up at odd times," as she said, although where she found leisure moments, odd or even, in her round of labor and care, nobody could have guessed. The convenient bit of work was never ornamental. An apron for Emmie, a sack for Baby, a set of collars for Carrie or herself, was slipped in between the heavier tasks assigned by necessity. She had no respite from needle-work except Sundays. She had laid aside her weekly mending that afternoon only when the cloudy twilight hindered her from threading her needle. She had not a lazy bone in her body, her husband and neighbors had a habit of affirming. She wondered, to-night, in recalling the compliment to her usefulness and energy, if the same might not be said of any galley-slave, over whose shoulders the lash continually hung. Rest was a forbidden indulgence to the poor.

Her head ached, and so did her back, and there was a dull pain in her side that would have driven a rich woman to a medical consultation. She was the physician of the family, nursing her offspring through all the maladies incident to childhood, and the milder forms of fever and catarrh which overtook them, now and then, despite their frugal fare and their mother's watchfulness. A regular practitioner had not crossed the threshold since Baby Rob's birth, two years ago. Doctors were expensive, and she was too poor to humor her uncomfortable symptoms. They would develop or disappear with time.

Poor! she always came back to that! And such unromantic, ignoble poverty as implies a constant struggle to keep one's head above water. It seemed to her, sometimes, it would be a positive relief to stop swimming and go down into actual and undeniable pauperism. She enjoyed nothing aright while incessant solicitude and activity were needful to maintain a show of respectability. And people looked down upon them. It was no secret that her husband's salary was inadequate to the demands of his growing household. When intimate friends praised her for "getting along so nicely, considering," she fancied she read pitying contempt in their eyes. Her children did not dress so well as did a majority of their playfellows, strive and strain as she might to make them appear creditably. As for herself, she was losing the taste for higher things than domestic drudgery, even while she loathed her fetters. She had no leisure for reading or music. She never saw a good picture except in a shop window, and as for attending a lecture, on art, science, biography, or travel in other lands, she put by the temptation to expend a quarter or half dollar in appeasing her intellectual craving with the reflection that it would bring greater good to the greater number if passed over to the butcher, baker, or grocer. It was a mean, unsatisfactory mode of thought and existence. Nobody could enlighten her on that point or show her the matter in a more defensible aspect than she beheld it—but whose fault was it?

She had silenced Carrie peremptorily when she had inquired why her father was not as rich as her uncle, but the question, foolish or wise, was too often uppermost in her mind nowadays. It was the Lord's will, of course. How easy it was for her lips and those of others to pronounce the formula. But why had He willed that this disparity of worldly ease should exist? Her husband—she kept herself in the background while she argued—was diligent in business, upright in all his transactions with his fellow men; a GOD-fearing man, moreover, who ordered his household aright; who visited the widow and the fatherless in their affliction and kept himself unspotted from the world. If godliness were "profitable unto all things," where was its promise of good for "the life that now is?"

The children were making so much noise in the dining-room near by as to drown the tinkle of the door-bell, but the maid-of-all-work heard it in the kitchen, and admitted the visitor. He spoke before Mrs. Lollard knew he was in the house.

"Good-evening, Edith! Are you all alone?"

It was her brother Elbert, and she blushed with mortification at being discovered hovering over a smouldering fire in a dark room. Muttering something about "liking to sit in the twilight," she would have struck a match, but he stayed her hand.

"Brighten the fire a little if you like, but don't light the gas. I am sick of glare and bustle. I have been out paying New Year's calls since twelve o'clock. A tiresome, hollow sham it is, but I must keep it up until near midnight. Margaret made out my list, and I am not nearly through. Let me rest myself by a few minutes talk with you over the hearth. It looks so cosy and home-like. I wish there were as quiet a nook in my house for me to-night. Depend upon it, Edith, what we have gained in luxury we have lost in domestic comfort."

The fire, enlivened by a stick of wood and a few lumps of coal, showed her his care-lined face and the broad streaks of silver in his hair, as he sat down by her, and laid his hand upon her lap. He was not a demonstrative man by nature or habit, and the gesture touched her heart.

"Stay and spend the evening with us," she said, cheerfully. "You will not be troubled by pomps and vanities here."

"I wish I could. Pomps and vanities! That is the whole of it. The only pleasure in riches is the excitement of gathering them. When a man tires of that, he has sucked the last drop of juice out of the orange. Do you know what was the happiest moment of my life? When, at the close of my first year as sub-bookkeeper in Mr. Wallace's store, I found that I had two hundred dollars in the Savings Bank and not a debt in the world. I began forthwith to think of setting up for myself in business and offering myself to pretty Margaret Wallace, I felt so rich. I have never been half so well off since."

"But you are well off, whether you feel it or not," returned his sister. "Your poverty is only imaginary. When you have a contrary opinion, you know it is a fancy, the trick of diseased nerves or imperfect digestion. You need rest, not wealth."

"I have dollars and cents enough to keep house and business going, if that is what you mean by riches. But let me relax my vigilance for a day, turn my thoughts and energies in another direction long enough to seek such recreation as my German porter enjoys during his midsummer vacation, and all may be wrecked. He takes his ease with his wife and little ones to-day; eats the Turkey I gave him yesterday with a merry heart; washes it down with a glass of lager, bought with the money I handed him as a New Year's gift; smokes a pipe to aid digestion; goes to bed at nine o'clock, and slumbers until morning, unscared by visions of insolvent debtors, falling stocks, and other dubious investments. 'The sleep of the laboring man is sweet,' we are told in Holy Writ. That means bodily, not mental labor, I am sure."

"We all have our trials and temptations, brother," interposed Mrs. Lollard, humbly, remembering her late meditations. "The lowly are not exempt from anxieties, nor, according to your showing, can money buy peace of mind."

"If it could, I should be a happier man, at home as abroad. I ought not to speak of family matters outside my own doors, I suppose, but you have been a dear, faithful sister to me always, and I have great confidence in your judgment, as in that of your husband. I want to talk with you about Wallace. I am sadly perplexed what to do with him."

"Isn't he well?"

"Well physically. In every other respect he could hardly be worse."

"Brother, you shock me! Why, he is but eighteen—a mere boy!"

"He has been gambling ever since he was fifteen," rejoined the father, in a hard tone, contradicted by the deeper lines about his mouth and eyes. "He drinks, too, I have discovered lately. I would have dealt summarily and severely with him when his iniquities first came to my knowledge, but his mother interfered. He is his grandfather's namesake, and the old gentleman unfortunately left him a fortune in his own right, of which he is to be master at twenty-one years of age. I tried to keep it a secret from him. There is no more certain way of ruining a young man than to let him know that he will not have to work for a living. But Wallace is his mother's darling, and when some inconsiderate meddler gave him a hint as to what his prospects were, he coaxed the whole story out of her. Then, she has concealed his pranks and follies; sat up for him when he was out late, and told me nothing of his debts, preferring to discharge them from her private purse; petted and nursed him when he came home half-drunk from billiard-saloon, oyster-supper, and gambling-hell. At last, his embarrassments became so heavy and complicated that they could no longer be covered from me. His bills were brought to me, his mother's store of ready money being exhausted, and his creditors importunate. A family tumult was the consequence. You don't understand what that means. God forbid that you ever should! John and you are a unit in the government of your children, as in all things else. The boy's associates are some of the most wily and dangerous rascals in town. There is no use appealing to their sense of honor or humanity."

"Where could he have picked them up?" queried Mrs. Lollard, naïvely. "I should think your social position would have kept him above the danger of such companionship."

"A poor boy would not have attracted their cupidity. The eldest son of a man who is reputed to be wealthy, the prospective owner of a handsome fortune, is too valuable a mine to be overlooked or abandoned, now that they have hold of it. As for him, he is infatuated by them and their mode of life. My hope is that if I send him to sea on a three years' cruise, they may forget him while he is away, and the severe discipline of a sailor's life teach him something like self-mastery."

"But it is a terrible remedy." Mrs. Lollard shuddered and grew sick as she thought of her own bright, brave Johnny, whose laugh sounded from the dining-room at that instant. Could she, were he in his cousin's place, banish him from home, her guarding love, his father's companionship and example? "It is an awful experiment," she repeated, earnestly.

"So is the need of cure a fearful fact." Mr. Craig's tone was yet harder, his eyes more wreathed. "Where is your husband?"

"Mr. Blakeman is sick, and he sent a note down this afternoon asking John to come to see him. He wishes to give him some directions about to-morrow's business, and there are some important letters to be answered to-day. I was a little ungracious about his going, even to oblige a sick man," coloring and stammering as she stated thus mildly the opposition she had felt and expressed to her husband's action. "John so seldom has a holiday."

"He knows what to do with it when he gets it, which is more than Blakeman does, or than I do. And he has a home in which to spend it. How merry those children are."

"They are playing rather a noisy game," said the mother, offering to rise.

"Don't stop them. It does me good to hear them. It reminds me of the days when there were children in nearly every house. My elder daughters have been in the parlor all day receiving company. Isabella and Clarence are shut up in the nursery with unlimited rations of pastry and candies to keep them quiet. By the way, that boy of yours is a manly fellow. When he and you decide what profession he is to adopt, let me know. Maybe I can give him a lift. If he should choose a mercantile life, you must let me have him. His early training has taught him the practice of such old-fashioned virtues as economy, temperance, and honesty. He will never give you the heartache I have now."

"Things may turn out better than you expect," said Mrs. Lollard, soothingly. "You have been a kind, indulgent father, and you cannot fail of your reward."

"Reward!" He laughed slightly and scornfully. "I am only the goose that lays the golden eggs. So long as the supply lasts, I shall be treated with a reasonable show of respect. But my children do not love and cling to me as John's do to him. Your household is a joint stock company. You work together for the common good. If you have privations, they are borne for one another, and the thought is a consolation. I know how it used to be in our father's house; how we worshipped our parents, whose daily toil and sacrifices in our behalf we saw and to some extent appreciated. There was proud satisfaction in the thought that we were helping them by learning to help ourselves. My wife and I do not need our children's assistance. They live for their own pleasure, nothing else. When John was sick last winter, he was nursed as I could never hope to be, were I to be laid aside from work. There was an affectionate strife going on all the while as to who should wait upon him, and all the resources of the household were racked to furnish him with comfort and amusement. Don't talk about poverty, Edith. You do not know the meaning of the word. You are a rich woman; rich in the best of earthly blessings, rich in your faith in and hope of heaven. Good-night! Tell your husband why I wanted to see him, and say nothing about our conversation to anybody else, least of all to poor Margaret. She will have it that I am unnecessarily alarmed about our boy. The mother's heart is always ready to make excuses, you know. Good-bye, again!"

Mrs. Lollard went with him to the hall door, and stood there a minute, looking after him as he walked up the street. A hale, handsome gentleman, a casual observer would have said, with the unmistakable air of being on excellent terms with fortune. His sister thought him more to be pitied than the lamplighter in his shabby dreadnaught, who ran nimbly from one lamp-post to another whistling "Champagne Charley." She gave one glance at the clouded heavens, felt the fine, sharp mist they began to spit upon her face, and shut the door with a prayer for the sorrowing father, and a thanksgiving for the safety of her own fold.

"Children!" They were busy over a box of dissected pictures, but looked up in pleased expectancy at their mother's voice. "Papa will not be in for some time yet. Suppose we get up a little welcome for him, something to amuse us and please him. Such a good father ought to be treated with as much consideration and honor as if he were the president. And he has worked very hard for us all this year. The Christmas tree is down in the cellar yet. John, you can cut off a quantity of small boughs, with which Carrie can make an arch for the back of papa's chair. Emmie may help her. Edie, get his dressing-gown and new slippers ready, and put a clean cover upon the footstool. I will leave the arrangement of this and the sitting-room to you while Robby and I go into the kitchen. I told Annie she could go out this evening, so we must get up our feast ourselves."

Papa was chill, weary, and damp when he put the key into the door on his return. The talk with his employer had detained him longer than he had anticipated, and he could not but feel that the sick man was inconsiderate in claiming so large a portion of his one rest day. It was past the hour for supper, and he was well enough acquainted with his wife's methodical habits to feel sure that the smallest children had eaten theirs, and were snug in bed by this time. He was sorry. He rarely saw them in the evening during the busy season except on Sundays, and he had promised himself a romp with Rob and engaged to tell Edie "lots of stories" that night, "because it was New Year's." The streets were very lively, in spite of the gathering storm. Brisk, well-dressed men brushed past him on the sidewalk, ran up and down the marble steps of stately dwellings in the eligible neighborhood, made more desirable by Mr. Blakeman's habitation. He had, through the illuminated windows of the tall blocks lining both sides of the street, glimpses of superbly-appointed parlors, and groups of elegantly-attired women receiving the compliments of the season from men as aristocratic in appearance and courteous in manner. It was a gay, pleasant scene, and nowhere fairer and more animated than in his brother-in-law's house, before which he paused for a moment. Lillian Craig, who was but a year older than his Carrie, stood in full view, dressed in pale blue silk, pearls upon her beautiful neck and arms, and white lilies in her floating hair, talking in a lively strain with a moustached youth he knew by sight as the son of a merchant prince. How lovely she looked! And yet, until now, he had thought Carrie the prettier of the two. Anita, the second daughter, was plainer than her sister or her cousin, but Mr. Lollard scarcely recognized her, would not have known her in any other house, in the amber robe that set off her dark skin, and the heavy ornaments of dead gold that reminded him of the tinkling collar and armlets of a Persian princess. She stood beside her mother, who was magnificent in garnet velvet and diamonds. His wife had not so much as a diamond ring, and her best dress was a two-year old black silk. She was a fresh beauty when he married her, and to this day a better talker and more intelligent woman than Margaret Craig, in every respect the truer lady of the two. But nobody believed this excepting himself. The world passed the one coldly by, and bowed obsequiously to the other. He was a sensible man, not given to coveting his neighbor's goods, or questioning the dealings of his Heavenly Parent, but he sighed deeply and moved on with a heavier heart than he liked to take home.

Robby ran up to him as he opened the hall-door. Carrie had rigged him out in his best frock, a crimson merino that made him look like a bold, handsome gypsy with his great dark eyes and glowing cheeks. "Papa, we're doing to make a ting of oo."

"A king, papa," corrected Edie, also in gala-attire, while Carrie and Emmie drew off with loving violence his wet greatcoat, brought boot-jack, slippers, and warmed dressing-gown; then marshalled the procession into the dining-room, where mamma met him on the threshold with a kiss and word of welcome. The triumphal arch fastened to the back of his chair was a success, although the materials were nothing better than cedar-twigs, strings of popped-corn, and stars cut out of gilt paper stuck plentifully among the evergreens, and encircling the white medallion at the top. "DEAR PAPA" was inscribed upon this in Greek text in red and blue chalks, and this was Johnny's chef d'œuvre.

Mrs. Craig would have smiled indulgent disdain, her daughters giggled outright behind their hot-house bouquets at the repast, which seemed so sumptuous a banquet to the healthy, happy young Lollards—Carrie included. Hot coffee for papa and mamma—the children drank nothing but water; a plate of chipped beef flanked by another of home-made doughnuts; a glass dish of raspberry jam, balanced by a salver on which mamma constructed a marvelous pine-apple of butter, with curled parsley for the leaves at the base and apex, and in front of papa's plate smoked a gigantic plateau of buttered waffles, also of mamma's manufacture. This was the whole bill of fare with the exception of a plate of light, sweetbread. Very homely diet, you see, but a more fervent thanksgiving was not said over another meal in the land, nor did a happier party surround another board. How they ate, and talked, and laughed! praising mamma's cookery and papa's distribution of the dainties. What funny stories papa told, and how bright were the roses in mamma's dear cheeks at some things he said about New Year's days they had passed together in their youth; and what a beautiful speech Johnny made, all out of his own head, in proposing the health of the "Lord and Lady of the feast," and how cunning it was in Robby to pound the table with his fat fists and cry, "Hear!" just as Carrie had privately instructed him to do, at the conclusion of his brother's oration.

"I think we have the most goodest times of any children I know in the whole world!" pronounced Edie, climbing upon papa's left knee, Robby having usurped the right, while mamma, aided by the three elder children, made a frolic of clearing away the dishes. "It is so nice to have papa all to ourselves!"

"I am glad my darling is happy!" replied the father, kissing the curly pate nestling against his cheeks. "God is very good to us all, I think. Don't you, mamma?"

"Very good!"

He saw the quick moisture that arose to her eyes before she turned aside to conceal it, and he would not have exchanged the token of sympathy with his grateful tribute to the Giver of their mercies for the finest of Mrs. Craig's diamonds.

The wee ones had their story and a grand game of "Blind Man's Buff," to "jolt their suppers down," said Edie. Then she and her younger brother were put to bed by mamma's own hands, and tucked in as only mothers can bestow the coverings about plump shoulders and necks. They were not too sleepy to say their prayers, but their eyelids closed under her good-night kiss, and were not again lifted. The five left below stairs had a long, quiet, family talk. The children were not kept without the pale of their parent's confidence, and as a reward for the trouble it cost the latter to explain their reasons for denying them certain things, and enjoining upon them the duty of taking care of what they had, Carrie, John, and Emmie already began to spare them the pain of repeated refusals; grew daily more discreet and helpful.

"We cannot afford it just now, my dear," was a phrase that was always believed and respected, and the response was usually a brave "Never mind, mamma! I do not really need it," or a playful "Ah, well! we will wait until our ship comes in!"

"Our ship has not been telegraphed as yet," said Mr. Lollard, by and by, in allusion to the family proverb. "But I have news that a little canoe is likely to touch at our landing. Mr. Blakeman has raised my salary four hundred dollars. A hundred dollars a quarter will make things rather easier, won't it, mamma?"

"You may well say so!" she returned, and in the pure pleasure of the hour she failed to remember that Mrs. Craig had mentioned this very sum as the cost of the garnet velvet and trimmings.

"Why, we shall be rich people at this rate, after a while!" cried Carrie, to whom the amount sounded very grand.

It was the mother who answered, her head upon her husband's shoulder, and his arm around her waist, while the three children were grouped closely about them. "We are rich already, my daughter!"

THE LOVE OF PHILIP ASH.

BY MRS. DENISON.

"If a man's brought up right," said Deacon Rafe, "under the prayers of a good pious mother, I tell ye he's got to wrestle like all nater, afore he takes evil ways on him. What's done, has got to be ondid, and at the beginnin' it's mighty hard work to go wrong, though it's like goin' down a hill—after the fust few steps you have got to run. It don't take so long a pullin' down as it does a buildin' up."

Old Deacon Rafe, or Uncle Rafe, as everybody called him, stood on the broad hearthstone, as he delivered himself of this speech, holding his hat in his hand. A candle burned on the shelf, which Susan, the daughter of Deacon Pelt, had lighted to show her Uncle Rafe the way through the long, dark entry. It was early October, but the day had been cold, and the ruddy firelight flickered, and flashed, and leaped out ruddily, now revealing the full smooth brow of the girl, anon the gleam of a soft gray eye, dark with thought, and again the fine curve of the red lips that were lightly pressed together, as she stood looking straight before her, seeming to see through the thin, angular frame of the deacon—through the square of darkness caused by the open door.

Not far from the old fireplace stood a table, square and solid, shining in the warmth and honesty of real mahogany, a piece of furniture that the good deacon was wont to boast was nearly a hundred years old, and had been in the family for three generations. The kerosene lamp upon it, a very small one, sent a luminous circle of light from under the painted shade; the light fell upon a thick, old-fashioned volume, with clasps, but the face that bent above it, a man's face, bronzed and handsome, wore an expression that was almost heart-breaking to look upon, when as now his eyes sought the lettered page; but his soul seemed to be far, far away, intent upon some memory, perhaps, that the old man's speech had awakened in his mind.

This speech had reference to some matter of discipline in the church over which these two men held the rod of authority, for Deacon Rafe and Deacon Pelt were the two strong pillars of the spiritual Zion on Milton Hill. Both were powerful men in their way, both were old and tried citizens and Christians, and both had more than a sufficiency of this world's goods. The case about which they had been talking was a sad one—a woman—a wife and a mother had gone astray, and she was to be sent out of the fold that had saved and sheltered her, lest she bring disgrace upon the church.

"Well, good-evenin', brother!" said Uncle Rafe, holding out a wrinkled hand all covered with thick blue-gray veins. "I'm very sorry this thing has happened, but as matters stand we must act upon 't immediately, and not give the world a chance to talk. Good-night, Susy, my dear; oh, you're goin' to light me out; that is very kind of you. I s'pose I ought to know the way, but my sight is growing poor, I believe, and I ain't as steady on my feet as I used to be."

Susy went with the old man as far as the outside door, stood there a moment holding the candle back and gazing out into the bright moonlight. How beautiful, how saintly still the scene was! The green before the door seemed bleached to a silver whiteness, the trees were tipped with a clear radiance, that glorified the night; the great vault above hung like a pale curtain, faintly studded with stars, outshone by the greater luminary. Through the branches the mysterious voices of night whispered, and underneath, at gnarled roots, and below tufted moss and odorous grasses, the happy insect world held its musical carnival. Susy looked over all this with a yearning glance that yet wore the pensive shades of some recent sorrow. The girl's nature had apparently been roused by some sudden shock from the apathy of careless youth. Far and near Susy had always been quoted as "that thoughtless creature," and the old adage, "a deacon's daughter," had been again and again applied to her, but within the past six months, I might as well add since Philip Ash had come to live with them, she had changed so perceptibly that more than one gossip wagged her tongue over the fact.

At last some noise within recalled the girl from her dream. With a deep sigh she closed the door, lingeringly, as if loth even in her abstraction to shut out the beautiful picture, and with slow steps she wended her way back into the old-fashioned kitchen.

Since she had left not a leaf had been turned by the student; the yellow light streamed over the same page, on his hand, white and well-shaped; and the face, still wrapped in shadow, held the same gloom. He did not look up as the girl brushed past him, breathing quick, but kept his eyelids straight and still.

Susy went to the fire, snuffed out her candle, and, with a mute woe in her face, sank down heavily. Mrs. Pelt, just putting the finishing touches to a stocking of coarse blue yarn, gave her girl a side look under half-shut lids, and pursed up her mouth a little as she drew the last needle out.

"John's bought that colt, Susy," said the gray-haired, pink-cheeked little woman, who, though nearing sixty, still retained the bloom of her youth.

"Has he?" and the voice was very unlike the cheerful tones of the girl.

"Yes, and 'twasn't for Dorcas, neither, I'm a thinking. Dorcas has been at him for a long time, but I heard him say that if he got her, he shouldn't give her to anybody in the family. He came out of meetin' last Sunday with Jared Pinkham's cousin. She's from the city, and is full of fashionable ways and notions. I guess John might do better than that; I don't know. He's smart, anyway, and owns one of the best farms in the country." Then, after a little pause and one or two stealthy side glances at the girl's face, she added, "Belindy says he took you home from the quiltin', t'other night."

Susy's face grew flame red. "He did! I did not want him; but he did," she said, in low, half-smothered tones. "I don't care about it; I don't want to talk about it," she added, nervously, and touched the heavy burning log with her foot.

"Shoes cost something, Susy," said her careful mother, startled out of her previous train of thought by the thousands of stars that snapped and shot up and out like the scintillations of spent rockets. "It's time for honest folks to be a-bed, I reckon," she went on, putting her needles away. "Biah'll come in and see to covering the coals."

"Yes, mother, I'll go in a little while," said Susan, lifting herself wearily; "there—there's something I want to do; it won't take me but a minute, and then I'll go."

"Well, good-night, dear;" and the woman bent forward and kissed the cheek of her woman daughter—the only child left to her of seven. Very tender was the touch of hand and lip, and the mother turned away with a moan in her heart. The child of her old age was in trouble, and she knew not how to comfort her.

The silence grew oppressive when the door had closed, and the lingering echo of footsteps quietly died away. Susy sat motionless, her hands dropping at her side, one over the other, her head drooping, her eyelids shut close to keep back scalding tears: All the evening a struggle had been going on within her. It was a struggle that a year ago would have culminated in an obstinate and prideful silence, and her heart, like a caged bird, might have beat itself to death against the cruel bars of her determination, for pride and stubbornness had been her besetting sins. Susy had been the darling of two old hearts, and had come very near being ruined through their constant indulgence. But, though the child of an almost idolatrous love, she was also the child of prayer. Old Deacon Pelt, to use his own words, had "wrestled mortally for his one ewe lamb, that she might be brought into the kingdom." His prayer had been answered, for Susy had bowed that fair head in sincere penitence, had been admitted into the visible fold of the Good Shepherd. So, though it was a hard matter for her to overcome her natural worldliness, other motives underlaid her purposes—a supreme power guided her thoughts into right channels, and where once she would have died sooner than confess herself in the wrong, she now, though it almost tore soul from body, put self out of sight, and elevated her moral nature by penitence and confession.

After awhile she lifted her head slowly, and stole a glance at Philip Ash. Would he never move? She felt instinctively that he was not reading, that if there were burning thoughts beneath the pressure of his hand, under the cold, unmoving glare of his eyes, they kindled no answering fire in his bosom. Should she go to him and confess? She shivered at the thought, and he sitting so still and passionless. If he would but move, but turn and look at her, though the look might chide. Her heart beat with such fierce, strong strokes that it seemed to her they must be audible to him. Could she stifle the terror with which his silent presence filled her heart, and go to him, and say forgive?

Just then the great log broke with a sound like an explosion. Philip Ash did turn at that, but Susy was busy doing battle with the flaming coals that had fallen out upon the hearth to the very verge, where the new rag carpet enlivened the sombre red of the well-worn flag stones. When she lifted herself breathless and flushed, Philip still sat in the same statue-like attitude.

Whizzing and whirring the old corner clock struck eleven. Startled at the sound, Susy decided to retire, but first she would put her resolve in execution. With a trembling hand, a crimson face, and glittering eyes, she moved unsteadily to the table. He might have felt her approach; but if he did, he gave no sign.

"There must be something cruel in his nature," Susy thought, bitterly, and then she stopped beside him. "Philip!"

At the sound of her voice he looked up at her, oh! so cold and stern.

"I wounded your feelings last night, Philip. It was thoughtlessly done, and—I am sorry." She gave a little gasp, but bravely kept the tears down.

"So am I;" voice and manner were alike cold.

"O Philip! I want you to forgive me." There was another gasp more like a sob.

"I dare not deny your forgiveness."

And still through the calm voice ran a thread of condemnation that fell lead-like on the sensitive young heart beside him. She stood there for a moment in the shadow; pressing her dry lips together, wringing her slender hands, moaning in her inmost soul that all was over, this precious love life was over. She should bury it, and go mourning all through the dreary days of her existence. "O Philip! is that all?" at last burst like a heavy sob from her overburdened bosom.

"What more would you have?" he asked, coldly.

"One word that would give me assurance that I was pleading to a human being," she said, passionately; "one look that has at least the gentleness of friendship. You cannot know how hard it has been for me to conquer myself—and—I hoped at least you would show—a little pity”—her voice choked, her cheeks became crimson, and her hands trembled, though they were locked like iron.

Philip never looked up; he dared not. One glance might have overcome his stern resolve, and softened the anguish at his heart. He gloried in his own martyrdom, perhaps, for he had suffered more than this proud girl at his side. She could not know how much nor how long. “I said I had forgiven you, Susy. I can say nothing more. Years ago I made a vow that if the woman I had loved should trifle with me in the most ordinary acceptance of that term, I might forgive, but never should consider her as holding any more intimate relation thereafter than that of an ordinary friend. This decision was forced upon me by circumstances of the most painful character. I cannot speak of them now—I”—he paused, looked up at the empty space beside him. The girl had vanished like a spirit; an angry light in her eye, her lip curved nevertheless to the grieved outlines of bitter agony, her heart aching as in her young, pleasant life it had never ached before.

“Oh, why did he come here—why?” she cried, in a voice of anguish, as she threw herself down upon her bed when she had reached her own room. “Did God send him here to make me suffer because I had resolved to live a truer and better life? Is this the cross that I must bear? Are these the thorns that are to bruise and wound me, because I choose the narrow road? Is this what I receive for trying to live the life of a Christian? I cannot bear it, I cannot! What shall I do? Who will help me? If I could only have told him what led me to do as I did—if he had not been so cold, so cruel, so wicked! He never loved me, he has tired of my devotion; he never loved me if he can give me up for that. And yet he bore with me that night. Three times he suffered himself to be slighted, almost insulted, and even at the last, if I had let him come home with me, as was his right, all might have been well. Now I have lost him forever, oh! forever.”

She lifted herself and moved for a moment hurriedly to and fro. The words “forever and forever” seemed to sound in her brain. She raised the window sash higher, and leaned out with a yearning that the calm and silence of the soft summer night might infuse itself into her weary life, for, being young and ardent, and a very novice in sorrow, she felt some way as if her years had been many and full of trouble. The world receded; the gleam of white grave-stones in the little churchyard, now lying all alight under the moonbeams, was a grateful sight to her, and she felt that it would be pleasant to lie down under the green turf, and know no more of this cruel world and the hearts that were so cold and untrue. As she looked with dry, burning eyes upon the lovely night, she saw some one coming slowly past the window—the figure of a man. It stopped at the gate, leaned wearily upon it, and looked long and wistfully towards the house. Susy could see the slouched hat; she even fancied that under somewhat seedy habiliments the stranger carried the look and manner of a gentleman. The moonlight fell full upon him, and, but for the peculiar head-gear, she could have seen his features distinctly. She had drawn back from the window as he stopped, and surprise and curiosity overcame for the moment her deeper emotions. Presently the man lifted the latch cautiously, and came up the path that led to the front door. Susy’s window was directly over it. She heard three or four quick raps, and then a moment after old Biah’s shuffling steps across the hall. The man spoke low, but audibly. His voice thrilled her, she could not have told why. He was a stranger, and had lost his way, very weary, willing to pay for a night’s lodging, and he seemed very grateful when, after a somewhat tedious cross-questioning, Biah consented to let him share his own bed.

Meantime Philip Ash had closed his book, and, as the stranger’s knock sounded at the door, he had opened a window that led to a small side porch, and quietly stepped out. For a moment he stood gazing straight before him on the glory of sky and forest; then he moved down the garden till he came to the banks of a little stream that ran through the farm, terminating some half a mile away in the wider river and pretty falls that made the village picturesque. Campsie mill, for which he was the agent, stood in full view; its many windows illuminated, as with silver tapers, by the mild lustre of the moonlight. Beneath the water glittered a stream which he might have leaped with safety, but deep and rapid at times for all that. Philip paused here with folded arms, and mused half-aloud.

“Another dream,” he murmured, bitterly. “Another temple fallen at my feet in ruins. God help me, for I love the girl as I never loved any woman before. And I built my hopes upon her because I thought a Christian would be tender, and loving, and true. More fool I! They are all alike—worldly or religious, saints or sinners—they must play cat-like with the very sinews of men’s hearts, and wreck them utterly for the pleasuring of their vanity. And I had hoped so much from a union with her; she seemed so to fill my heart, that has been hungering and thirsting for an honest love for years. Life has shut down before me in cruel darkness; its light has gone utterly and forever. I shall never love again.”

Did nothing whisper to him that there was something noble in this woman’s nature, since she had brought herself to ask for forgiveness, humbled a heart that was naturally proud, and stubborn, and unrelenting? Did not the fair young face, all flushed as he felt it was, and more beautiful for its clouding, plead with him? Yes, these had their influence, but the poison-point of an arrow that had lodged in his soul years before, rankled there still, and fevered his blood and steeled his heart.

"One woman has deceived me, no other shall," he muttered, bitterly, and wended his way back to the house, gaining entrance by his night-key; for "Blah" had locked the window and the door, and the stranger was long ago sound asleep, under the protecting wing of the good old man-servant.

Morning broke in all the glory of autumn, and found Susy in a better frame of mind, though still quite unhappy. "If religion is good for anything," she said, like a philosopher, or rather like a Christian, "it will carry me through this sorrow. At all events, I shall not beg for his love;" and then, shining through the clouds of her darkness for a moment, all manner of golden visions of possible relentings and unforeseen chances brightened the shadows, and set the bow of hope over the small world of her regrets and longings, and for a brief time she was almost cheered again. So she went down stairs and quietly assisted in getting breakfast, looking so busy and pretty in her neat dress of gingham, protected by the apron of spotless white, that her mother, and even old Blah gazed at her with admiring eyes.

"Blah had a man sleep with him last night," said Mrs. Pelt, turning the delicate rice-cakes she had prepared. "Seems quite the gentleman, too, Blah says. Of course we wouldn't let him go away without breakfast."

He was there when Susy carried in the tea (Philip Ash had not come down yet; he seldom came down till the family were well seated at table). Susy was startled when she saw him; he was older than Philip, but there was an unmistakable likeness between the two; who could he be? He looked haggard and worn, and like a man whose shoulders had long been wearily bent under some crushing affliction.

Presently they drew up to the well-spread table; the deacon's sonorous voice sounded in thanksgiving, the pleasant clinking of cups and saucers succeeded, when the door opened, and Philip Ash entered, stood there like a man struck into stone, his eyes dilated, his lips parted. The strange guest, startled by the silence that followed, turned; the eyes of the two met. Never was consternation more strongly painted on a human countenance than on that of the man who had chanced among them. An expression of deadly terror succeeded; he turned pale to the roots of his hair, and stammered out, in a hoarse voice, "You—Philip?"

Philip Ash said nothing. If his look conveyed a menace, his lips had not the power to utter it. He turned slowly, closed the door, and they could hear him afterward, pacing the floor overhead.

"Nothing, thanks; I can eat no breakfast, now. That man, God help me, is my brother! How can I find his room? I must see him. I have done him deadly wrong."

The words seemed to be forced from him; he arose from the table, went over to the nail on which his hat hung, and turned to the door through which Philip had disappeared. The deacon had also arisen. "Young man, let there be no violence," he said, in his firm, even tones.

"God forbid!" was the answer; "there will be none, assuredly on my part;" and he was gone.

"Deacon, hadn't Blah better stand on the stairs? I'm mortally afraid they'll come to blows. Philip's face has almost given me a chill, it was so awful. What can be the matter between them? Dear me, to think of brothers being enemies." Susy was a little frightened. Instinctively she took sides with Philip; whatever it was, that man with the fierce eyes and fiercer moustache was the wrong; she settled that in her mind.

At first there was silence overhead, when the man seemed to have entered, and then burst forth a storm of language, surging above all other sounds. Then there was a lull again, and presently the stranger came down, still white and terror-stricken, looking about him, as if he saw for the first time the faces that were gathered there.

"I—must go," he said. "Many thanks for your kindness, though if I had known," he added, in a lower voice, "whom this house contained, I would have walked a thousand miles rather than meet him."

"Well, if that isn't curious!" exclaimed Mrs. Pelt, watching the stranger as he went with rapid strides away from the house, "what can it mean? Gracious mercy!"

The exclamation (such were seldom heard in Deacon Pelt's house) was called forth by the sudden noise overhead—the fall of a heavy body. Susy turned white; Blah and the deacon hurried up the stairs; Susy and her mother stood trembling below, when the deacon called out:—

"Wife, there's trouble here; this youngster has fainted, or maybe"—

Susy and her mother flew to the deacon's side. Philip lay stretched upon the floor like one quite dead, and the deacon was pouring water over his face.

"Blah, you'd better go for the doctor," he said, as all remedies seemed to fail. "Susy, do not cry, child; the wheels of life ain't stopped forever, I reckon, though it looks mighty like it."

Together the deacon and his wife placed the helpless body on the bed. Susy went below, wringing her hands in helpless agony, and (she could do nothing now) stood at the gate to watch for the approach of the doctor. She had never known before the strength of her love. Without recompense or hope of reward, it seemed to her that she could give her life for him; and oh! how fervently she prayed that God would not punish her by taking him away.

Three long weeks of fever succeeded. The life they watched, under the roof of the deacon's farm-house, hung for days upon a thread. Susy shared with her mother in nursing him. If they forbade her, and hinted at her pallor, she wept, implored, and insisted, until they could not refuse. The old deacon shook his head at the change in his hitherto dutiful child, and for the first time seeing how matters stood, looked forward with new anxiety to the result. The doctor came and went without speaking, until, one day, he took Susy's hand, as he said, "My young friend, your good nursing has saved his life;" and, as a matter of course, Susy went by herself and wept as if her heart would break—but they were happy tears.

Very faint, wan, and weak he was, as he lay there past the verge of danger, and Susy sat watching him, with a new light in her beautiful eyes. It seemed to her that now that God had spared him, she had nothing more to ask. One morning he called her to him.

"Susy, it has preyed upon me—the memory of my cruel coldness that night. Now, lying here, helpless, brought up from death's door, as the doctor assures me, by your unwearying care, I ask you to forgive me. Will you, Susy?"

"Oh, no, no; don't ask me that," sobbed Susy. "I was in the wrong; oh, God is so good to give you back!"

"To you, Susy? Say it, for I feel that heart and soul I am yours, my darling." His voice lingered over the love-word, and both were silent for some moments. "And now, dear, I will tell you about him—the brother whom I so strangely met and parted from. You will know, then, what has darkened my life, and made it for nearly ten years, a burden and a bitterness to me. My brother possessed a strange and jealous nature. He was older than myself, and I being ambitious and fond of study, outstripped him at school, and gained the warmer approbation of my father. He never forgave me for that. As we grew older, I tried to conciliate him, but he never behaved towards me as a brother should. When I was twenty I was engaged to be married to a ward of my father's, a lovely girl, seemingly innocent and singularly fascinating. I need not tell you that I thought I loved her, purely and fervently; that I felt, in all the world there was nothing so dear and beautiful. It was my first hallucination; I know now that it could not have been such love as manhood, matured and purified through trial, experiences. The wedding-night drew near. On the eventful morning of the day, whose close was to make me the happiest of mortals, I drove over to the house of my bride-elect. Even then she met me, all smiles and graciousness. That night there was no bride. A note, hurriedly written, given to me in the presence of a hundred expectant guests—in the midst of perfumes, and flowers, and beauty, informed me that the "woman at whose feet I had poured all the treasures of my heart, had gone away with my brother."

A half-articulate cry escaped the pale lips of the listener. To her this story seemed almost too horrible for belief.

"I was very calm. I believed nobody saw that I suffered. Unforeseen circumstances, I said, had prevented the wedding, but the guests must nevertheless enjoy themselves. The people with whom this girl had been stopping were furious, but I was calm. I felt as if my heart had turned to stone, and would never love again. Nor did it, darling, till your sweet face stirred its pulses. I will say nothing of all my life between that time and this. I put no faith in woman; for years I scarcely spoke to one. My brother had gone abroad. From that night till the morning I met him, I had not seen him or heard from him. Well, God's wheels grind slowly, but surely the retribution comes. My brother married her, but she has served him worse than she treated me; ignored the sacred ties that bound her, forgetting her babes, gone off with one dead to all morality, and God alone knows in what part of the world, abused and forsaken, she suffers to-day. And now you know why I seemed so unkind that night. The old trouble was revived by the conversation between your father and Deacon Rafe—the old wound torn open afresh. I feared that you, so young, pure, and good as you seemed, had still that strange leaven of deception in your nature; that you, too, could taunt, and madden, and"—

A soft hand was on his lips. "Alice Hunt told me that you were trifling with me, that you had trifled with her, that she had heard you were already a husband, and my mind was poisoned, Philip. But, after a little reflection, I believed she had told me nothing that was true. I hated myself for what I said, for what I did. O Philip! you shall never think, never have cause to think unworthily of me again. I have been only half-hearted in everything, and yet God has been so good to me."

She broke down, crying again, and Philip, putting his arm about her, drew her wet cheek closer to his lips.

There was a slight rustling at the door.

"Well, deacon," said Mrs. Pelt, a moment after, taking up her knitting, "I see now what's been the matter with our Susy. I guess after this you and I must be contented with each other."

There was a smile on her lips, but under her glasses the tears could be seen welling up. The deacon made no reply, but he understood her, and said softly to himself, as the sweet face of his child came before him :—

"God bless her!" While the mother's heart echoed :—

"God bless them both!"

TO THE ABSENT ONE.

BY BEAUFORT LE ROY.

Oh! tell me, what is earth without
The genial influence of the sun?
The skies are dull, and dark, and lowering,
The fields do show no signs of gladness,
The mountain wears grim shadows on its brow,
The bosom of the sea is black and treacherous.
But see what living joy its coming brings!
All nature bursts to open bloom. Night's tears,
Now jewels, deck the blossom's morning garb,
And opening buds disclose their bosoms to the bee;
Bright silvery clouds fly chasing each other
Through the azure vault; the glittering rill
Leaps laughing down the mountain side;
The rainbow's varying arch with outspread arms
Embraces each joyous landscape, where insects gay
Flit on from flower to flower, and warblers
Of sweetest notes sing of their heightening joys
'Mid the soft sighing of the wind among the leaves.

Oh! what is night without the resplendent glory
Of the moon? A sacred stillness reigns supreme,
Yet all around is murky gloom, for still delays
The coming of the vestal queen.

But, lo! she rises o'er yon placid lake.
A pavement of gold spreads from its brightening
orb,

Night winds now breathe upon the bosom of the sea,

And crown its rippling waves with sparkling gems.
What mellow light pervades yon leafy grove,
Where music mysterious and melting lures to rest
The warblers who chanted there the livelong day!
How soft and dewy now thy balmy breath, O night!
What looks of joy and sweet contentment all thy satellites

Do wear beneath her hallowed light,
Whom now thou hailest as thy deity.

Thus, what to me are all the baubles of the earth
Without the sunny light of thy sweet smile
To illumine the darkest avenues of life, and banish clouds,

Which else would ever shroud my sky?
By day thou wert my sun. By night
The glories of the moon were all thine own.
No cloudy days, no murky nights were mine
When thou, sweet one, wert by my side.
When melancholy's pall fell o'er my mind,
And sad forebodings came of future fate,
Then thou didst steal upon me as some angel spirit,
And all was peace and speechless joy within.
The songs of birds, or whispering winds at noontide
'Mid the soft fringes of dark pines,
Was not such music to mine ear as thy low voice
In trembling tones telling thy early hopes and fears.
The zephyr, bearing on its unseen wings the fragrance

Of sweetest flowers, brought not my heart such thrill of joy

As when I felt thy breath of purity upon my cheek.
What was the sunlight to the opening flower,
Or mellow moonlight to night's votaries,

Compared with that fond look, which thou
Didst beam upon me from those tell-tale eyes,
Unbidden interpreters of all the dearest
And most hidden secrets of the soul,
And promises of joys to come, alas! now past,
Too heavenly pure, too purely sweet to last!

Fair vision of life's brightest dream, alas!
Thou'rt gone, and I am all alone in gloom,
Even as the dreaming mariner, whose barque
At dead of night is shivered on some rock,
And he alone is left of all that joyous crew
Upon the barren and deserted shore,
A battered, shivering, and half-breathless form,
With life a weariness, and death a welcomed boon.

TOO LATE.

BY NELLIE C. HASTINGS.

He came at sunset to the darkened room;
"It was too late," they said; and so I lay,
Cold, quiet dust, and pulseless, breathless clay,
That could not greet him, silent in the gloom.
I heard his light hand tremble at the door,
And his soft footstep cross the echoing floor,
Quiet and light, as when—so long ago!
I heard it last—and heard it pass away
For the last time down the stairs—so slow, so slow!
I could not see him then, for tears that came Between my sight and him—a foolish rain!
But now the quiet step came back again,
And paused beside me, through all years the same;
And I would fain have looked up in his face,
But a cold seal was on mine eyelids laid;
I only felt him. Then some words once said,
Came back to me across the gulf of Death;
That death, he said, "would make me love him more,
And know him better than all Life before."
Now, he was silent—and I had no breath
To tell him how I loved him—not one word!
But through the hush, one quivering sigh I heard;
And like a spark of fire, one hot tear—
My darling! fell upon my forehead here;
And though I saw not, yet I knew he leant
Near and more near above me; and he bent
His dear head to the pillow where mine lay,
Until his breath stole o'er my lips' cold clay,
And straight his warm mouth kissed the tear away.

"Poor little one!" he said, "poor little one!"
So slow and sadly! and that pitying tone,
So tender, oh, so tender! seemed to say
More than he uttered, to the silent clay.
He said "it would not matter if I died Before he came—my soul would feel and know."
And now he told me—standing there beside
The poor dead heart that loved him long ago;
How much he knew of all its secret strife,
All that had lasted longer than my life.
He knew it all, and pitied; and it seemed
A far, far better ending than I dreamed
In all the foolish past. Death's bitter sting
Was softened, since he pitied, O my King!
And knew no stronger love, like mine, to make
The whole earth lonely for one small grave's sake.
He only pitied; he had been my friend,
And I had loved him; Life could never lend
A better ending to so sad a tale;
And this was all, as Death drew down the veil—
One tear—one kiss, and, with a softened tone,
The tender, sweet old words—"Poor little one!"

As threshing separates the corn from the chaff, so does affliction purify virtue.—Burton.

JEROME RAYMOND'S NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

"A WOMAN to see me, Jane? Do you know who she was?"

"No, ma'am, she was never here before. She looked very much disappointed when I told her you were out, and said she would call again to-morrow at the same hour."

"No message?"

"No, ma'am. She said her business was very important, but she must see you, and could not leave any message."

"Take my cloak and hat to my room, Jane. I will lie down awhile on the lounge here; I am tired, and my head aches." But when the servant left the room, Helen Raymond did not lie down. The spirit of restlessness seemed to possess her, for she paced up and down the floor, pressing her hand upon her burning, aching forehead, and trying in vain to still her unquiet thoughts.

Two days ago, had you asked this young wife where perfect happiness could be found, she would have answered that it rested upon her own heart. One year before she had married the man she loved, believing her deep, pure affection was fully returned. Jerome Raymond was older than his gentle, beautiful wife by some fifteen years, but he was a man whose love might crown any woman's life with blessing. He was a merchant of high standing and ample means, and he had made it the study of this first year of wedded life to add by every means within his power to Helen's happiness. They had been abroad, and the girlish enthusiasm of the beautiful bride had stimulated the husband to many a ramble after the picturesque, many an hour spent in historical research, and many a long drive or ride over grounds filled with historic or artistic associations. Only one little week had they been in their own home, where taste and affection had dictated the expenditure of wealth, and where there seemed nothing wanting to make a true home of elegance, comfort, and happiness.

To say that Helen Raymond loved her husband with her whole heart gives no exaggerated idea of her affection. She had just been emancipated from school life when she met him, so noble, so true, and so good, respected in society, and standing high amongst merchants. Her father was his lawyer, and a troublesome lawsuit was in progress, requiring the client to call often upon his professional adviser. So the grave man of business met the fresh young girl with her unformed mind and untried heart, and he grew to love her, to look upon her sweet, innocent face with the feeling of delight one feels in contemplating some fresh mountain flower in a hot house. Jerome Raymond was no novice in the world's ways. More than one fair daughter of the full paraphernal of fashionable frippery had let him see that she would be willing to accept his name and wealth in exchange for as much of her heart as two or three seasons of flirting had left her. He had passed by so many of these, that the voice of society prophesied a life of celibacy for him.

But sweet Helen crept into his heart by no such portal as these had tried to force. She gave him at first the respect due to a man older than herself, and whom she believed far superior to all her other gentleman friends in intellect and moral worth, and he gave her the protecting fondness he would have accorded to a pretty child. How these emotions grew fuller and more perfect, till they stood upon the equal ground of strong, mutual love, it were too long a tale to record. It was an instance of true love whose course ran perfectly smooth. Relatives and friends on both sides were delighted, all agreeing as to the merits of bride and groom. Birth, social standing, wealth, all things in keeping, and love being added, there seemed nothing to cloud the sky matrimonial.

One year of married life had but united the two more closely; for, while Helen's character developed, her mind expanded, and her intellect fed upon stronger food than it had ever before received, she lost nothing of her sweetness of disposition or that gentleness and frankness that had first won her husband's heart.

And now, pacing up and down the little sitting-room fitted up for her especial use, what is the bitter grief that clouds all the felicity of her life? Only a few words spoken in sleep. When Jerome Raymond, two mornings before, had kissed his wife's lips, and remarked upon their pallor, he had no idea what his own lips had betrayed in the still hours of the night. Only one sentence had escaped them, as he turned uneasily in his sleep, but that sentence had been like a dagger thrust to the heart of the wife who loved him so fervently. It was—

"Rosetta, my poor, deserted darling!"

Over and over again, in the two miserable days that followed, did Helen Raymond repeat the phrase. Who was Rosetta? Was she deserted for her sake? It was some one Jerome loved; the tender inflexions of his voice proved that. No relative of whom Helen had ever heard bore the singular name. Somewhere, she knew not where, there was a deserted Rosetta for whom her husband mourned. And, now, with this fact before her, Helen began to recall other facts of equal significance. She remembered hours of sadness passed by her husband, even in their honeymoon; there were letters, too, sent from abroad, whose address she was not allowed to see, and some received whose contents were not imparted to her. All had seemed right when she was happy and trustful, believing in her husband's love, but how dark it all looked now. And, while her heart was so torn and troubled, here was a mysterious woman, who would not leave her name or errand, wishing to see her.

No wonder that her face was pale and haggard when she arose the next morning after a sleepless night, and her smile wan and feeble when her husband commented upon it.

"Indeed, I am quite well, Jerome," she said, as he pressed a loving kiss upon her face, and in her heart she wondered how he could be false to her, and feign such tender devotion.

And he, with clouded brow, was hurrying to his counting-house with his heart full of sorrow. "What ails Helen? Can she suspect anything? In three days to change like that. I will tell her all. But she is so jealous; she has told me often she hated a flower if I admired it too warmly. How would she bear to have me tell her of Rosetta? No, no, not yet. Later, perhaps, I will tell her all, but not now, not yet."

Yet it was evident that the secret oppressed him, deepening the furrows on his brow, and casting a shadow into the depths of his large black eyes. The day passed busily, for it was the last week of the year, and merchants all know there is little time to waste in that week.

While Jerome thrust back his sad thoughts to give his whole mind to business, Helen was striving to banish all unworthy suspicion from her own mind, trying to remember nothing but the love lavished upon herself, and the year of unalloyed happiness she had passed. She was in her little sitting-room with a dainty piece of embroidery in her hands, trying to interest herself in the intricate pattern, when Jane announced:—

"The woman, Mrs. Raymond, who was here yesterday."

Looking up, she saw standing in the doorway a tall, rather pleasant-faced Irishwoman, who held by the hand a little girl of about seven years of age. Looking at the child, Helen saw large black eyes, a pale complexion, delicate features, and a mouth of great sweetness, and sensitive almost to a fault. It was a lightning glance that took all this in, and the woman was invited to take a seat. She seemed terribly embarrassed, playing with the fringe of her shawl, adjusting the child's hat, and getting so red in the face that Helen really feared she would burst a bloodvessel.

"You wished to see me," she said, at last. "Can I be of any service to you?"

"Well, ma'am, if you will, you can serve me and do a good turn for your husband at the same time; but it's a queer errand I'm on, and I am afraid you won't hear me out."

"I do not understand you," Helen forced herself to say.

"I am afraid you will not listen to all I want to say. If you will promise, ma'am, to let me finish my story, I'll tell you how you can do a good turn for a husband who loves you."

"You have said that twice. Tell your story. I will hear you tell it all."

"Well, ma'am, and thank you, too; it's a long one, to be sure. It's little more than twelve years ago, ma'am, that I was cook in Mrs. Raymond's family—that's your husband's mother, ma'am—and she wanted a girl to run errands and tend the dog. I had a little slip of a sister, ma'am, only sixteen, and Mrs. Raymond took her for the work. She had been there about three months when Mr. Jerome came home from across the water, where he had been to finish his studies, they said. An only son he was, and his parents that proud of him that they nearly worshipped him, yet holding him in good control, too, and telling him sometimes of the great marriage he would make. Well, ma'am, we were all blind, his father and mother, and myself, her sister. I must tell you, she was very beautiful, my sister Rosetta."

Helen turned so white, that the woman paused, but she signed to her to go on.

"Well, ma'am, it was a good year before any one suspected what was going on, and then Rosetta ran away in the night. Nobody knew where she had gone, and I was turned away without any reason given for it. It was four years, and not a word came to me from my sister, when one day Mr. Jerome himself came to the service place where I was, and said to me:—

"Maria, come to Rosetta. She is very ill, and she wants you."

"So I left all and went to her. She was living in a pretty cottage just outside of the town, and I found her in bed, with a wee baby nestled up to her breast. She told me that she knew Jerome had made a mistake in taking her away; that he had tried to teach her and make a lady of her, but she could not learn. She was very happy, she said, and he had given her every kindness, but she was glad to die and leave him free to marry again."

"She was his wife?" said Helen, hoarsely.

The woman flushed angrily, and drew a paper from her bosom.

"There's the certificate, ma'am. I took it, and I took the child, when she died the next day. Mr. Raymond was good to her, and he has been good to the child; but she was not a fit wife for him. It was a very young man's love for a beautiful face, and when that died out there was nothing left. Still he was good to her. But now, ma'am, I'm wanting to go away. I've been married four years, and I've two children of my own, and my husband's got a good offer to go to California, only here's the child."

"Nobody living but me knows of my sister's marriage; and Mr. Raymond, I can see, cannot make up his mind to tell you. The little girl is old enough now to be put to school, but he shrinks from that, too, because he must own her in some way. Now, ma'am, you know the story."

"Is this the child?" asked Helen.

"Yes, ma'am. Rosetta, speak to the lady."

But the child only looked shyly at her, while Helen scanned her face and dress. In the latter there was every evidence of the generosity of her father, and no less of the vulgar taste of her aunt. Rich material, ill-assorted colors, and gaudy trimmings, marred the beautiful face, and took away from it the refinement Nature had placed there.

"Wait here!" She must be alone; she must think.

"She's dazed like," the woman said to herself, as Helen rose and left the room; and dazed like she felt as she shut herself in her bed-room and tried to compose her mind.

If he had only trusted her! If he had only told her why the shadow rested so often on his brow! She would gladly have given the child a place in her home and heart if her husband had asked her to do so. But it was so hard to have such a story told her by stranger lips, to have the closed secrets of his life opened by such rude hands.

The woman and child were very weary of waiting, when Helen came to them again.

"Leave the little girl with me until afternoon," she said, "and come again for her."

Maria looked earnestly into the pale, sweet face, and then rose, satisfied. "I will come at four o'clock, ma'am. Rosetta, stay with the lady."

The child obeyed, and was soon talking freely. She told of her dear papa, who had been away so long, but was at home again now; of the pretty presents he had given her, and of the beautiful lady she was to see some day if she was very good, and who would perhaps be her new mamma, if she was very, very good. As she prattled the bitterness was charmed away from the listener's heart, and a great pity for the father and child arose there. The old year was dying, and she resolved to bury away all jealousy and bitterness, and prove her love as unselfish as it was strong and deep. So when Maria came, she told her that soon there would be no obstacle to the California voyage.

It was New Year's morning, and a heavy storm was raging. The wind blew and the snow whirled through the streets, while even the most ardent followers of fashion shrugged their shoulders at the idea of New Year's calls.

The morning was somewhat advanced, and Jerome Raymond sat in his library alone. Helen, he supposed, was receiving any callers who might venture out in the storm. He had been almost provoked with Helen, she was so bright and gay. All the pallor of the past few days was gone from her face, and when she challenged his admiration for her rich new dress, and wished him a Happy New Year, there was an animation in her manner, and sparkle in her eyes, as if she was anxious to welcome her guests and begin the festivities of the day. And now, she was probably the centre of an admiring group of callers, whilst he sat alone in the midst of his perplexities. Twenty times he resolved to tell Helen of Rosetta, and as often shrank back from the task. No, he would keep his secret still, and put the child in a good boarding-school, for he fully realized that she was getting too old for her aunt's house to be any longer a suitable residence for her.

The hardest part of the business was that he really loved his little daughter. Even in the happy year spent abroad with Helen, he had missed the child, and his heart had gone out to her on his return, with a yearning, fatherly love. With a heavy sigh, he pushed away the book which he had been trying to read, and rested his head upon his hands, thinking, ever thinking, but resolving upon nothing.

There was a soft tap upon the door, but he did not heed it. Then it opened, and a little figure came in softly. Glossy curls of dark hair clustered round a pure white forehead, and a dress of soft white cashmere, trimmed with pure swan's-down draped the little figure; the little feet were cased in white kid boots, and the only ornament was a slender gold chain encircling the throat, and from which depended a golden heart. With footfall as noiseless as the falling of a snowflake, the little figure crossed the room, and two tiny hands fell upon Jerome's bowed head. "Papa!"

He started as if a shot had whizzed past him, and gazed wonderingly at the child.

"My new mamma sent me here to say that I am a New Year's gift to you with Helen's love."

"Who sent you here?" he asked, hoarsely.

"My new mamma. The beautiful lady with the blue silk dress. See, here she comes!"

He could only open his arms to her. Words would not come to thank her, but he held her fast in a close embrace, while tears, his manliness would not disown, filled his eyes. The child, too, crept into the embrace, and Helen drew her in between them.

So the New Year opened with no secret to close the loving hearts, and Rosetta found a true home and parents.

DR. MAITLAND'S GRANDSON.

BY LOUISE S. DORR.

THE frosts of autumn were just coming on, and I was looking forward to a lonely winter. Elizabeth Prout, who had been both servant and companion to me for the last ten years, was going to leave me. It was a very foolish thing for one of her age to do, and I was greatly vexed with her. Elizabeth was going to be married. I had said my say about it pretty plainly, thinking she would come to see the matter as I did. She had always "set great store," as she termed it, by my opinion, but in this case she preferred her own, giggling like a girl when I told her what a ridiculous thing I thought it was, and acting, for aught I could see, as foolishly headstrong as if she had been sixteen instead of fifty-six. So I had now no hope of dissuading her, and, as I have said, I was looking forward to a lonely winter.

The house in which I lived was the old Maitland homestead. It belonged to Doctor Maitland, and I was Doctor Maitland's maiden sister. He was the oldest of our family, I the youngest, and there had been five between us. But the others had inherited consumption from my mother, and only John and I were now left of the seven. I had not seen him since I was a girl of fifteen, and now I was forty-five. I knew from his letters that it had been many years since Doctor Maitland's only son died, and that his wife's death had quickly followed that of his boy. Beyond these bare facts John never wrote me much about his family affairs, and I had forborne to question him. I think I had always stood somewhat in awe of my oldest brother, perhaps because he was richer than any of the rest, and quite famous. Some of his property came by way of his wife, but he had been unusually successful in his profession, and had also written valuable medical treatises, which gave him influence and reputation. For many years he had lived abroad, sometimes in Paris, sometimes in Germany, though I believe he had visited all the most famous medical institutions in Europe. The great aim of Doctor Maitland's life seemed to be to extend his knowledge of all things pertaining to his profession.

Just before going abroad, John came home for a visit, bringing his wife and boy. Mrs. John—her name, like mine, was Rachel, so we all called her Mrs. John—was a pretty, soft-hearted creature, very much in love with her husband, though they had been married a dozen years at that time, and fond to idolatry of her boy. Alick was a merry, active little fellow about eleven years of age, and as full of mischief as a clear night's sky is of stars. His father had great hopes of him then, I know, but the boy died before he had quite reached his majority, and the hopes which had once burned brightly for Alick Maitland went out in his grave.

I am conscious of going about my story in a rambling way, but I was not bred to authorship, so, if I set things down just as they come into my mind, I hope it will not be taken amiss. In consequence of my lonely way of living since the last of my sisters died, I had got a habit of thinking that my life had settled down into a stirless dead-level, and that I could look straight through it to the end. My income was amply sufficient for my wants. Consequently I had no need to worry about property. Year after year I lived on in the same place, with the same servant, visiting the same people, attending to the same little round of charities, and thought I should continue to do so until I died. If I had been younger, this might have seemed a dreary prospect. As it was, I accepted it with tranquil resignation.

Elizabeth's foolish start about getting married was the first thing to shake my belief, and then came John's letter. John was on the point of returning to America. After thirty years of absence, he was coming back to live in B——, the city where he had first begun the practice of his profession. His agent had bought him a house in Springvale Square, and John wrote that he wanted me to live with him, and matronize the new establishment. He expected to reach home about the 20th of November, and desired me to rent the house in which I was living, and get settled in the new residence before his arrival. I can hardly tell whether I was glad or sorry to go, but I had no thought of refusing John. It would be a great change for me, however, and I feared my simple country life had illy fitted me for being at the head of a grand house in a fashionable square in town. I mentioned something of this to Elizabeth, at which she flamed up directly.

"A lady's a lady the world over, and 'tisn't anyways likely you are going to begin to be unladylike for living in Springvale Square, which you never was before," said Elizabeth Prout.

This reassured me a little, though I feared Elizabeth's judgment was not much to be counted upon in such a matter, whatever it might be in questions of pickling and preserving, for on these points she was authority for all the country people around us. If Mr. Barnes was going to marry for a housekeeper, and men of his age as often marry for that as for anything, I suppose, he had made a judicious choice. Elizabeth Prout certainly was a good housekeeper.

It happened fortunately enough that Mr. Barnes was also in want of a house. So I rented the one I was living in to him, and, after seeing the ridiculous fond couple married, I went away regretfully at the last. I had written to my brother's agent, Mr. Craig, and he had a carriage at the depot for me when I arrived in B——. Mr. Craig was a tallish, thin-faced man, with stumpy, gray hair, and eyes that seemed to look straight through you, as Scrooge did through old Marley's ghost to the buttons on the back of his coat. He was very polite—I am speaking now of Mr. Craig, and not of Scrooge nor the ghost—and made free use of compliments in talking with ladies. He seemed quite anxious that I should approve of the house and its appointments, since everything, he assured me, had been left to him. In taking a survey of the rooms, I was considerably bewildered by the magnificence everywhere surrounding me, and noticed a variety of elegant articles either for ornament or convenience to which I could not possibly have given a name, but I did not consider it necessary to mention this to Mr. Craig.

"Everything seems to be in perfect order, and in as good taste as possible," I remarked, when we had returned to the drawing-room.

"You cannot think what a weight your approval has taken off my mind," replied the agent. "I must confess that I had some misgivings about the height of the terra-cotta vases and one or two other matters. I am greatly relieved by your commendation, feeling sure that what you have praised must be beyond criticism. But I forgot the other young ladies. You will want to see them, of course."

"I did not know there were to be young ladies here," I said, surprised.

"Except yourself you mean. Yes, there are two others."

"I am forty-five. If the others have reached that mature age, it is best to let the fiction of our youth go by."

"You must be jesting about your age. But for the girls. I am surprised the doctor did not mention them. He forgets everything except what concerns his profession. There are Miss Cranstoun and Miss Appleton, nieces of the doctor's late wife. They have but lately left school, and arrived here last night."

Speaking thus, Mr. Craig rang, and desired a servant to inform the young ladies that Miss Maitland had come. They entered the room presently, and Mr. Craig introduced them to me—Miss Cranstoun first. I said I was happy to see her.

"Oh! nobody minds me. You mean that it is my cousin that you are happy to see," replied Miss Cranstoun, kissing me nevertheless with what the French call empressement.

I wondered at her speaking in this way, but simply affirmed that I was happy to see them both, and that I hoped we should be friends. I felt a presentiment, however, that I should like Miss Cranstoun's cousin better than herself, not, I think, because she was more beautiful, though I do not profess to be above admiring beauty when I see it in a girl's face. And Hilary Appleton was beautiful. It was like looking at a picture to study her bright face, only a picture never changes expressions and color under your glance, as Hilary was always doing. Besides being beautiful, she was very spirited and lively, with a pretty dignity, too, which was capable of expanding into haughtiness when she was displeased.

Miss Cranstoun was not nearly so pretty as her cousin, though Selma was not really plain, as she had a habit of calling herself, some might have thought for the sake of being contradicted, but I do not want to judge her.

"What matter about a plain little body like me?" she would say. "Nobody notices me. I may see as much as I like; but it is Hilary who must prepare to run the gauntlet of all eyes, to endure the terrible ordeal—though I doubt if she finds it so—of being seen."

Such sayings were always punctuated like a sentence in a book, only caresses were used instead of punctuation marks. A tender touch of her cousin's hair or cheek, a kiss, or an embrace, standing in place of commas, semicolons, etc. It cannot be denied that Selma Cranstoun was very affectionate, being ready on the smallest provocation to hug or kiss Hilary, myself, and even Doctor Maitland, when at last my brother had come home. If I were speaking in a witness box, and obliged to tell the whole truth, I should have to admit that the girl's caresses were not entirely indispensable to my happiness. The Maitlands are not a demonstrative race. I had grown an old woman after my fashion, and my fashion was not that of the present generation. Hence it is not strange, I suppose, that some of Selma Cranstoun's ways were not altogether agreeable to me.

That wonderfully vigilant agent, Mr. Craig, had left little to be done in preparation for my brother, and it was rather dull waiting for him. It seemed impossible to begin anything, even getting acquainted with his wards until John had come. You will think it foolish, I dare say, but I missed Elizabeth Prout sadly in those days. Mrs. Binks, the new housekeeper, was a very good sort of woman for her place, but we could never have got along together at the homestead as Elizabeth and I had done.

There was bad weather at sea about the 20th, and the vessel in which Doctor Maitland had sailed was delayed several days beyond the time when it was due. It was a period of great suspense to me, but it ended at last, and John came home. I cried out my joy on his neck, forgetting the Maitland undemonstrativeness for once, and the doctor seemed almost equally moved. Then Selma and Hilary came in, and they clung to him too, and John asked, laughing, "What a man was to do with such an armful of women?"

"My dear uncle," cried Selma, "I am so glad you have come. You will prefer Hilary to me, of course. Everybody does, and do you wonder at that? See how radiantly beautiful she is." The punctuation used at this point was a soft touch of Hilary's cheek. "But I hope you will have some crumbs of affection left for plain, uninteresting Selma."

"Self-depreciation is my cousin's substitute for self-assertion," said Hilary, quickly.

It was not a pleasant glance she got from Selma for this little speech, but the latter kissed her cousin immediately afterwards, to show that she had no ill-feeling about it, I suppose.

My brother gave up two or three days to talking with us of the many things we wished to hear about, and then withdrew to his study, feeling more at home among his books, I suppose, than among us women. He was hale and vigorous, more like a man of fifty than sixty-five, though his white hair and beard gave him a venerable appearance. His coming home was much talked of in B——, and it was arranged to give him a public dinner in consideration of the distinction he had gained. I think he would rather people would let him alone, not that he was indifferent to the fact that he stood high among his fellows, but because he was naturally retiring in disposition, and did not like having a fuss made over him. But I was going to speak of something that happened on the day of the dinner.

Somebody had just made a complimentary speech, and Doctor Maitland had risen to respond, when Mr. Craig came in, and whispered a few words in his ear, upon which the doctor was observed to grow suddenly pale, though, after a moment, he went on with his speech. It was spoken of in the next day's papers as epigrammatic, witty, and effective. When he had done, he begged the gentlemen to excuse him, as an affair of importance called his attention elsewhere. This I heard from an acquaintance, and had an unquiet evening on account of it, though I did not mention my uneasiness to any one. It was late when the doctor got home, and, instead of coming into the parlor, he went straight on to his study.

"Why don't he come in here?" asked Selma, impatiently. "I am dying to hear about the dinner."

Miss Cranstoun was much given to the use of hyperbole in speaking. If she simply wanted a glass of water, she was very likely to be "dying" for it.

"Uncle Maitland has probably had enough of talk for one day," said Hilary. "If you are really anxious to know about the dinner, I advise you to put off dying until after the more convenient season for hearing about it has arrived."

"Now, Hilary, I have a presentiment that there will never be a more convenient season than the present. Procrastination is the thief of time. Put not off until to-morrow what you wish to do to-day. I am going to invade the doctor's sanctuary. He will never mind me, you know."

"Selma!" Hilary remonstrated; and I said, "Don't go," but she was already gone. She came back after a few minutes, looking slightly vexed.

"I can't get a word out of him about the dinner," she said, "and I guess something has happened, for he speaks as if his vocal organs had got the rheumatism, and were stiffened at their joints. He wants to see Aunt Rachel."

The girl's flippancy of speech sounded gratifyingly to me, and I could have found it in my heart to reprimand her severely, but I restrained myself, obeying the call to the study instead. My brother was sitting back in a lounging-chair, leaning his head upon one hand. He had a troubled look, and his brow was knitted, as I had seen it when he was thinking deeply.

"Did you want me, John?" I asked, threading to disturb him when he had on that thoughtful brow, but feeling that I ought to let him know I had come, for he seemed not to have noticed my entrance.

"Sit down, Rachel," he said, without changing his position, "I want to talk with you presently."

I did as he desired, and sat so long that I began to think he had forgotten about my being there. I had a strange, uneasy feeling, and dreaded quite as much as I desired to hear his communication. At last he spoke.

"Rachel," he said, "I have never told you about Alick."

"Only that he died a long time ago," I replied.

"Yes. He died a long time ago. It was a great blow to us, and I think the shock hastened his mother's death. Perhaps I was hard with Alick. I almost think now that I was. He had a superabundance of animal spirits, and was led into wild courses, but, if he had lived, he might have tamed down into a respectable man. I had great hopes of him once. It was a sad disappointment to have him turn out as he did."

I murmured that I was very sorry.

"He fell in with a lot of idle, dissolute companions, and grew defiant of all restraint. I was always in terror lest he should bring disgrace upon my name. Sometimes I think I was too proud of the honor in which I was held, of the respect my exertions had won for me."

"You had reason to be proud, John."

"I should have remembered that 'When pride cometh, then cometh shame,' and that 'Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord.' I had reason to remember it afterward. Alick grew more and more unmanageable. He spent a great deal of money. A young English lord, who had been sent abroad to escape punishment at home, was his constant companion, and their revels touched the extreme of recklessness. At last I lost all patience, and reproved Alick very roughly, telling him I would rather see him dead than disgraced. He did not come back that night. The next, he was brought home dead. A disgraceful quarrel had arisen between him and the young English nobleman, and Alick was killed in the affray."

"Why do you give yourself the pain of telling me about it?" I asked, for his limping speech, and the dampness gathering on his forehead, showed that he was suffering grievously.

"I should never have spoken of it, I think, but for what has happened to-day. Rachel, I have seen Alick Maitland to-day."

"John!"

"It is a strange story. Alick left a wife and child at his death, though I never knew it until a few hours ago. The woman was not a person I could have acknowledged as a daughter; but I would have provided for the child. She, foreseeing that I would insist upon separating them, never claimed my protection. She died a few weeks ago, and to-day I have seen Alick Maitland."

"Your grandson?"

"Yes. He is a wild, rowdyish youth, much such as his father was twenty years ago; and to-day he has been wounded in a street brawl. Not dangerously. He will not die of his wound. Rachel, what shall I do with him?"

There was something exceedingly pathetic in my brother's abrupt way of putting that question. He was not a man that was used to ask advice, his own clear head being ordinarily a sufficient counsellor; now, however, I could see that he distrusted himself. How much I wished for the ability to speak the right word in the right place then, but I was never very ready of speech when my mind was disturbed, and I could think of nothing to the purpose.

"I want to do what is right," John went on presently. "If it is true that I was too strict with this boy's father, and that if I had been less harsh at our last interview, my son might have lived to be a different man, I should not wish to repeat the fault in the case of my grandson. It is said that in every human heart there are some germs of good. Redemption may yet be possible for Alick Maitland. Shall we take him home, Rachel, and try to save him?"

"Is it for me to decide?" I asked.

"Yes. If the boy comes here, I shall trust more to your influence than my own to reclaim him. There is an atmosphere of quiet goodness about you, Rachel, which must affect him beneficially, if anything can."

My brother's praise moved me so much that I was unable to speak for a moment on account of a "lump" in my throat. When that difficulty was partially overcome, I said, "If you are going to leave it to me, I must see this youth before I decide."

"I will take you to see him in the morning."

"I am not sure that that will be best. He may think it necessary to appear reckless and defiant if a man be present. I was about to propose that Hilary should accompany me."

"Hilary?" said Doctor Maitland, doubtfully. "What good could she do by going?"

"I think I have discovered that she has great skill in reading character, and she is never at a loss for the right thing to say."

"You say you have great faith in Hilary. Could you say as much for Selma?"

"Selma's character is more hidden. I hope that when I know her better, I shall be able to say as much and more for her."

"Selma's character hidden? I thought she was frankness itself."

"Have you not observed that the frankness is only on the surface, and that one really knows very little of her true self from being associated with her?"

"Perhaps you are right."

Then, after thinking a little, John told me I might take Hilary with me to-morrow if I thought best, and said the boy was at Mr. Craig's rooms, giving me the number and street.

There was little sleep for me that night. Like Martha of old, I was troubled about many things. The tranquil perspective by which I had once thought my future to be represented, was quite broken up, and I could see only a little way before me. So, because the prospect was cut off, I kept straining my mental vision to look through the anxieties that disquieted me, not so much for my sake as for my brother's. The effort was just as fruitless as if, standing at the base of a hill, I had tried to look through it to objects on the other side; but I did not give up trying on that account, which made the night one of great weariness to me.

The next morning, when I asked Hilary to go out with me, Selma started up at once as if she thought herself included in the invitation; but Doctor Maitland desired her to be good enough to read to him a little while, and she went off to the library with great seeming happiness. After we had started, I told Hilary where we were going, and why.

"I am glad you took me with you," she said, simply.

Then the press of people became so great, for we were getting down into the business streets now, that there was no chance for connected conversation. When we reached the place Mr. Craig opened the door for us, and was immediately affected with a rush of compliments to the lips.

"I looked down into the street just now, and fancied myself gazing into a flower-garden in mid June; but the roses were all in your cheeks, Miss Hilary. The sight of you, Miss Maitland, is like a draught of generous wine. It exhilarates; I shall live two minutes in one, so long as you consent to glorify my rooms with your presence."

And so on, until Hilary stopped him by saying that we had come to see Alick Maitland; upon which Mr. Craig led us to an inner room, saying that we should find the young man in there, and he only wished the rogue was more worthy of such distinction as our visit conferred upon him.

The young man was dressed and sitting up, having one arm in a sling. He had on a brightly-flowered dressing-gown, whose sleeves were too long for him, and kept falling down over his hands; and embroidered slippers that were worthy of the name, since at every movement they slipped nearly off his feet, they were so large for him. Evidently these articles were borrowed from Mr. Craig. The youth was rather pale, and had a fair, boyish face, in which, at the first glance, I recognized the Maitland eyes and forehead. His hair, which was neatly cut, was light brown in color, and looked soft and glossy. There was a strong smell of tobacco smoke in the room, and I saw him fling a cigar into the grate when he perceived that his visitors were ladies. He took a step or two forward, then stopped, and looked at us inquiringly.

"Are you Alick Maitland?" I asked.

"Yes, I suppose so," he returned, stooping to pull up the heel of one slipper.

"I am sorry to see you here, or at least sorry for the cause of your being here."

"What is it to you?" he inquired, with a show of recklessness, though his face reddened quickly.

"I am Doctor Maitland's sister. This young lady is Hilary Appleton, and your cousin, though not in the first degree. We have come to see whether we can give you any help in your trouble."

"It's a bad egg, isn't it? But I'd have kept out of this mess if I could. I meant to behave myself after coming here. I suppose it was the wine. I heard that Doctor Maitland was celebrating with the nobles at the St. Stephen's House, and I thought I could not deny myself the pleasure of drinking just one glass to my respected grandsire; but the wine went straight to my head, and then the fellow was bent upon a quarrel with me. I tried to keep my temper down, but it got the upper hand in spite of me, and I struck him. I suppose it's all up with me now at the Maitland head-quarters. My grandfather will cut me outright, won't he? and think he is doing God's service in washing his hands of such a sinner?"

"What did you expect your grandfather to do for you?" asked Hilary.

"I thought likely he might give me some money, and set me up as a gentleman."

"How does it happen that you never applied to him before?"

"I never knew I was blessed with such a relative until my mother was on her deathbed, about three months ago. Her game was to keep dark till the old man died, and then bring me in for the heir. It was a pretty good trump card which she held, but she did not live to see the game played out."

"Have you always gone by the name of Maitland?"

"No; my mother gave me her own name. Until I came here, I always went by the name of Savage."

"If I had been you, then, having borne the name of Savage so long, I would have borne it yet longer, rather than take that of a man whom all good men love and revere, only to"—

"Why don't you speak it out? You mean only to disgrace it."

"I do mean only to disgrace it, and I will speak it out. Do you know with what honor your grandfather has covered the name of Maitland? Do you know that when a young man of your own age he had neither money nor influence, nor yet a liberal education? He has gained all these by his own tireless endeavors—by the indomitable exercise of such powers as God gave him as a man. If I had been you I would have died before coming to him, unless I could have come without bringing him dishonor."

"You are hard on a fellow," said the young man, again stooping to pull up one of those troublesome slippers.

"It is you who are hard on yourself," Hilary returned, speaking without hurry or heat, but in a grave, steadfast tone, as she had done from the first, "because, being endowed with reason, manhood, and physical strength, you are yet content to let your life go by without attempting anything worthy of such endowments. What is the career which, by your own confession, you had marked out for yourself? To get money from your grandfather and be set up as a gentleman; that is, to live in idleness and spend the money which some one else has earned in dissolute practices. Are there then no stones to break, no furrows to turn, no shoes to peg, nor anvils to smite, that you make deliberate choice of so useless an existence?"

"But, Hilary," I interposed, "you know that Alick had resolved to reform." I pitied the boy so sorely that I was glad to be able to say even this in his favor, though on the balance-sheet of a man's life broken resolutions may not count for much perhaps.

"Let him make that resolve good; let him add to it the resolution that his life shall be redeemed from the worthlessness as well as from wrong doing; let him adhere to both purposes for the accomplishment of something worth living for, and I will guarantee that Doctor Maitland will then acknowledge his grandson with proud affection rather than with heart-aching and forebodings of renewed disgrace. There, Alick! my lecture is ended. If it seems unkind, forgive me. I have spoken more in sorrow than in anger. Aunt Rachel, are you ready to go now?"

I rose, though a little unwillingly, for I wanted to say something kind to Alick, something to soften the asperity of Hilary's rebuke, which I thought unnecessarily severe; but I had not the right words at command. While I hesitated, the boy stepped quickly before Hilary, dropping off both slippers on the way, and leaving them to mark his path in approaching her.

"Hilary," he said, as gravely as she had spoken, and without a morsel of the reckless flippancy which had marked his speech hitherto. "Your scolding stirs something within me that might have made a man of me if it had been sooner roused. If it is not yet too late, if I succeed in redeeming myself, what will you be to me then? What shall we be to each other?"

"Cousins—as we are now; but I will consent to be lectured by you then, if you find me at fault," answered Hilary, smiling. Then, to me, "Come, Aunt Rachel. This young man is not in need of the sedative you are anxious to administer. He will do very well without it."

I slipped my purse into Alick's hand. "It is for your present needs," I said. "I shall report hopefully of you to your grandfather, and you may expect to see him soon. Good-by!"

"You are very good, Aunt Rachel. Aren't you going to give me your blessing before you go?"

This was spoken laughingly, but I think with more feeling than he would have cared should become visible.

"To be sure I will," I said, and down upon his knees he went, uplifting his bright, boyish face toward mine, and laughing still, but not in mockery, I am sure. I touched his head with my hands, murmuring, "God bless you, Alick," and then hurried out of the room, followed by Hilary.

"How do you find our patient?" asked Mr. Craig, jumping up to open the door for us.

"Much better than I expected. I have great hopes of him," I replied.

"Oh, yes. He'll be about in a day or two. The wound is much slighter than was at first supposed."

It was unnecessary to explain that I had not spoken with any reference to the boy's wound. So I merely bade the polite agent "Good-day," to which he replied, as was to be expected from him, by a compliment.

"Shall we take a car?" asked Hilary, when we were once more in the street.

I replied that I would rather walk, being conscious of inner restlessness, and feeling that a street car would be much too slow for me in that state of mind. The distance was a good mile, perhaps more; yet it was a surprise to me when we entered the square where we lived, for I had been thinking busily to take any note of our progress.

Doctor Maitland called me into the study as soon as we reached home, and when I had told him about our visit, he started up all in a tremor, and began putting on his overcoat. "My poor Alick," he said, and I knew, by the tender pity in his tone, and by the eagerness of his whole manner, that his heart was toward his grandson, even as of old David's heart was toward Absalom.

John would have gone out immediately, but was prevented by a visitor—a Reverend Doctor of some repute, and a great gift at conversation—who stayed to dinner, so that it was evening before John could leave the house.

"I shall not come back alone," he assured me, when at last he was left at liberty to go.

But, as if it had not been proved over and over again until one would think the fact quite clearly established, that human intentions are not infallible, we were furnished with a new demonstration of the axiom that night. The doctor was quite distressed about it, and wore a very sober face when he entered the parlor, alone, in spite of his expressed intentions.

"Why did you not bring Alick?" I asked.

"I did not find him. Read this."

It was a little note in which Alick left his love for Aunt Rachel, hoped Hilary would repent of her unkindness toward himself, and assured his grandfather that he did not intend just now to enlarge the blot which his worthlessness had made on the Maitland name, since he was going to renounce the name. If sought, he should not be found, though his precautions in that respect would be unnecessary, he presumed, since he had no doubt his disappearance would give satisfaction to all concerned. This note was simply signed "Alick," and directed to Doctor Maitland. Mr. Craig had been obliged to leave town for a few hours, and had found his rooms deserted on returning. The note was left on his desk, and he had picked up a lady's veil on the stairs, which he sent to Hilary, believing it to be the same he had seen her wear sometimes. It was a gauzy fabric of a pale lavender color. Hilary had been obliged to send to New York for it, since it was impossible to find one to match her suit in B——.

"But," said Selma, "you did not wear your lavender suit this morning, and you had on your brown veil when you went out."

"Yes," assented Hilary; "but this is just like mine, and, strangely enough, I could not find mine anywhere, when I looked for it after dinner."

I could see that his grandson's disappearance was a great disappointment to Doctor Maitland, and I seemed to miss Alick's boyish face as if it had always belonged to our household. Hilary seemed quite loth to speak of Alick, at which I wondered somewhat, and one day I mentioned it to Selma. She laughed outright.

"Singular that Hilary should not fancy talking about our dear, lost Alick? Not at all to my thinking. Has it never occurred to you that somebody is to blame for his sudden disappearance?"

"No. I have never thought of it."

"Now, how strange! I don't pretend to be very sharp-sighted nor very anything myself. I'm of no particular account, as I'm sure nobody can know better than I; but I do wish that you and that precious old knowledge-bin, your brother, could just look through my mental spectacles for one minute."

"Why, Selma?"

"Because you are such a precious, darling goose, and not a lineal descendant from the one whose cackling saved Rome, neither, or else you would see that Hilary has been making use of sharp practice in this affair. Don't you know that Alick was in a beautiful frame of mind when you left him, and that his note breathes a vastly different spirit, being sarcastic and bitter in the extreme? Then doesn't it follow that somebody is responsible for the change, and it's a little singular, isn't it? that Mr. Craig should have found Hilary's veil on his stairs. Oh, it's as plain as day to me, that Hilary was determined there should be no reconciliation between Alick and his grandfather."

"What motive could she have for wishing to prevent their reconciliation?"

"Sure enough! what motive? I don't see, unless she wishes to manage the thing so that Doctor Maitland shall disown his grandson, and give his property to her. She being the doctor's favorite niece, it is quite likely that if Alick don't get it, Hilary will; or, at the very least, so much of it as belonged to Aunt Maitland, since the doctor, with his fine sense of justice, would be sure to think it ought to go to some one of our family, and I don't know anybody that would be more glorified, in her own estimation, by being made an heiress than my well-beloved cousin—Hilary Appleton."

Though I assured Selma that she must be mistaken, I was greatly disturbed by what she had said. I did not mean to give the evil suspicion an inch in my heart; but it was not long in taking to itself an ell. I began to look distrustfully upon all that Hilary said or did. It is easy to fancy some ungenerous purpose lurking under the simplest actions when once you have learned to doubt one's sincerity. It was not long before I discovered that John also was displeased with Hilary, and this knowledge added strength to my own doubts of her. So just as "The creeping tide came up along the sand,

And o'er and o'er the sand,
And round and round the sand,
As far as eye could see," in the tristful little poem of "Mary of Dee," a creeping mistrust of Hilary came into my mind, and my old faith in her was quite lost sight of, buried as it was in the strong flood-tide of suspicion.

I had no wish to treat the girl less kindly than I had always done, but I am not good at disguises, and I suppose she must have detected some change in my manner. Sometimes I would feel her eyes fixed upon my face, and when I had looked up, unwillingly, but compelled as it seemed by some subtle magnetism, I was met by a look at once steadfast and yet so grieved, that if I had not accused her in my heart of being mercenary and unscrupulous, I must have softened toward her, as wax is softened in the sun's heat.

"How have I offended you, Aunt Rachel?" she asked me once.

"I am not offended. Why should you think I am?"

"Because neither you nor Uncle Maitland seem pleased with anything I do or say now. I thought you liked me at first, and I am sure you are disappointed in me. If I only knew in what particular, perhaps I might retrieve my fault."

"I have heard no complaint of you from my brother, nor have I any to make myself. You must not expect two elderly people who have lived alone so much as Doctor Maitland and I have, to be very entertaining company for gay young ladies. You have your young friends, your drives, parties, and such other amusements as the town affords. What do you complain of?"

She turned toward me her beautiful eyes, with the grieved look in them which I saw so often now, and the next moment left the room without a word. From that time she began to live almost wholly in her own room, except when company was present. If ever she came into the family sitting-room, and attempted to converse in her old animated way, I found it impossible to seem quite cordial, and it was a relief when she was gone again.

In society she was very gay, and had many admirers. Selma called her cousin a sad flirt; but I could never see that Hilary exerted herself to attract admiration, nor that she encouraged gentlemen to show her other than friendly attentions. Among her admirers, she seemed to favor none so much as Amasa Champlin.

"My cousin shows her usual prudence, you see," said Selma, commenting upon this preference. "If Amasa Champlin counted his dollars by hundreds instead of hundreds of thousands, you would see how much favor he would get from Hilary; about as much as she bestows upon poor Tom Truworthly, who they do say is dying about her."

"I suppose a woman may like a wealthy man for himself and not for his riches," I observed.

"Oh, yes, if he be honest; but you know what one of those sharp old divines—Swift or somebody, I don't remember which one it was—says, 'It is easy to see what God thinks of riches, by the sort of men he gives them to,' and I've no doubt the keen old satirist had known some just such fellows in his day as Amasa Champlin. Does that hairpin pull?"

For Selma was dressing my hair, which she often volunteered to do now, having a great fondness for so occupying herself, as she professed. I was getting used to Selma, and liked her much better than at first I had believed I would.

Doctor Maitland was very much engaged at this time in compiling a medical treatise, embodying, in a compendious form, a great deal of valuable knowledge with which his experience and extensive research had furnished him; and, except at dinner, we hardly saw him at all. So I had no opportunity to ask him about Amasa Champlin; but I spoke of the young man one day to Mr. Craig, who told me that "Champ was a first-rate fellow; had been a little wild, perhaps—all these swell chaps are—but that was thought nothing of in these days."

It might be thought nothing of in these days, but I was old-fashioned enough to think a great deal of it, and, remembering how hard Hilary had been with Alick Maitland, whose early training surely afforded some excuse for his wildness, I blamed her for allowing Amasa Champlin to be about her so much.

"A blinding mist came down and hid the land,"

Ah, poor "Mary of Dee!"

When we had been about a year in Springvale Square, there came a letter to my brother, informing him that his grandson was dead. It appeared from the letter that Alick had continued his dissolute courses, and he wished his cousin—Hilary Appleton—to be thanked for that, since when he had resolved to reform, it was she who had deprived him of the restraining influence of home friends. He had died of smallpox; and the letter, which was coarsely expressed, badly written, and worse spelled; was signed by Rhoda Mussey, who claimed to have been engaged to Alick, and to have spent money in taking care of him, besides having herself taken the disease of which he died, and been brought near to death in consequence of her devotion to her betrothed. With the letter a card photograph of Alick was sent, which, at his request was to be given to Aunt Rachel, whose kindness he had remembered until the last moment. The likeness was a very good one, and it was a comfort to me, in my grief, that he had thought of me.

Doctor Maitland was greatly shaken by this intelligence, but not so much as Hilary, whose grief seemed to me to be augmented by remorse. She grew quite pale and thin, and, though she indulged in spasmodic fits of mirth when with young people, it was easy to see that she was struggling in dark waters.

"It is no more than she deserves," observed

Selma, "though I wonder if she knows how much her beauty is set off by the contrast between her pretty, pensive airs and the wild gayety into which she breaks out now and then. To the beautiful all things are becoming, you know, Aunt Rachel; and how nice that is! because the infinite variety which it allows is one of beauty's strongest attractions."

My brother sent a check for a thousand dollars to Rhoda Mussey, and desired her to consider that as atonement in full for all the sacrifices she had made for his grandson. It was by Mr. Craig's advice that a clause expressing something of this sort was appended to the doctor's letter. The agent judged that she might become troublesome otherwise. Indeed, from the tone of her reply, I think Rhoda Mussey was disappointed, and had counted upon drawing money at will from Doctor Maitland; but we did not hear from her afterward.

The winter passed without bringing us any important changes; but toward spring John began to show signs of debility. Then followed a severe cold, ending in congestion of the lungs, and, for a time, we were seriously alarmed about him. Selma was all devotion, and Hilary shyly proposed to bear her share in nursing our beloved patient, though seeming to expect a repulse. John, however, in whose hearing the request was made, desired us to give her her wish. The tears sprang into her eyes, and her quick "Thank you, Uncle Maitland!" gave me an uncomfortable feeling, though I could not have told why.

"Hilary is behaving very handsomely for her," said Selma, a few days after. "I had begun to believe that nothing but an invasion of the fashionables would draw her from her den. If only we could believe now that her devotion is purely disinterested, we might have hopes of her, might we not, dear Aunt Rachel?"

"Why may not her devotion be as disinterested as your own?" I asked, for I was beginning to tire of Selma's persistent attacks upon her cousin.

"Mine! Oh, I have nothing to expect from anybody, you know. I am not the favorite"—Selma had always kept up the fiction of Hilary's being our favorite—"and somehow I cannot help thinking it a blessing that I am not. It is so apt to make one selfish. I have had a chance to see that for myself."

"Whom has it made selfish?" asked John, raising his head from his pillow, though I had supposed him to be asleep.

"Whom, indeed? I shouldn't wonder if it were Aunt Rachel, here," replied Selma, laughing, and fondling me affectionately.

"Selma was speaking of her cousin," I interposed, quietly.

"I have never found that Hilary was selfish," said Doctor Maitland. "I'm afraid, Rachel, that we have misjudged Hilary. I was disappointed because Alick went away, and, at first,

I blamed her as the probable cause of his sudden disappearance. But I see things differently now. Alick would have been no comfort to us, I fear, if he had come here. I should have pampered and indulged him. The temptations which assailed him elsewhere he would not have been free from here. I think the boy had good impulses, but he lacked stability, or he might have taken Hilary's advice, and redeemed himself. I confess I had hoped that he would, until we heard that he had died without reforming. Much as I regret this, I do not think Hilary is the one to be blamed for it. I am sure she did what she thought was best for the good of all. Even if she made a mistake, and I am not at all certain that she did, I believe her error to have been of judgment and not of the heart. I have so considered it for a long time, but I was too busily occupied to speak of it. Until I became sick I was not aware, indeed, of Hilary's position among us. It has given me surprise and pain to see that she is still distrusted—that she is virtually undergoing ostracism here where I could have wished her to find a pleasant home."

"What a pity!" cried Selma, spitefully, "that the long-suffering and much-abused Hilary is off riding with Amasa Champlin, or else we might have her in here to take part in a grand tableau of—The Reconciliation."

But just at that moment there was a light rap at the door, and we heard Hilary asking, "May I come in?"

"Come," said Doctor Maitland, and when she had entered, he reached out his hand to her. "Your cousin was just wishing that you were here to take part in a grand tableau of The Reconciliation. Now, Selma, how will you arrange your tableau?"

"Don't call it mine, if you please," Selma retorted, curtly, and immediately left the room, slamming the door as she went out.

"I am afraid to think what this means," said Hilary; "but if it is that I am about to be reinstated in your favor, I am happy indeed."

"Have you missed our affection?" asked John, tenderly.

"I have walked in darkness for the want of it."

"How if I assure you that affection is all you need expect from me, that my property is already disposed of, and I do not intend to make any change?"

"Then," replied Hilary, gayly, "I may at last love you as much as I please, may I not? without being suspected of wishing to barter happiness for money?"

I could no longer hold my peace, for my heart smote me repentingly. "My dear Hilary," I cried, "John has done you justice at heart all the time. It is I that have cruelly misjudged you."

Then came the tableau, as Selma would have called it. I will not try to describe it, affirming only that our reconciliation was complete.

"Did you have a pleasant ride?" asked Doctor Maitland, by and by.

"I have not been riding," returned Hilary, surprised.

"What! not with Amasa Champlin?"

"No, indeed. He called for me, but I did not wish to go."

"Shall I be prepared to give you two my blessing one of these days?" asked the doctor, playfully.

"Amasa Champlin will never come to you for a blessing on my account. He has been engaged to my friend Margaret Jayne more than a year."

"And you have known it all this while?" I asked.

"Yes, certainly. There were reasons why the engagement could not be made public at first; but they will be married very soon now."

After the reconciliation of that morning, Hilary became dearer to me than ever before. The engulging tide of suspicion was at last rolled back, and the blinding mist of misrepresentation swept away, leaving my faith a clear space to find its way back again.

About a month afterward Selma was married. It was a very hasty match. We knew but little about Pelton Bursage, and what we did know was not to his advantage. I believed that Selma accepted him only to get away from us. She had never appeared the same since our reconciliation with Hilary. We did not accuse her of wilfully misrepresenting her cousin, but I thought her conscience must prick her, for she chose to adopt a resentful, sneering manner, making herself so unpleasant that if we had been at all easy about her future, it would have been a relief to get her out of the house. We remonstrated against her marriage, however, but it was all of no use. It seemed to me that there was something singular in her way of receiving our remonstrances—something more than the mere wilfulness of a girl whose lover is assailed. I cannot express what I mean better than by saying that while resenting our interference, she appeared to be indulging in hidden laughter that we should think it worth our while to offer such interference.

When she was married, Selma received valuable presents of silver and jewelry, and Doctor Maitland gave her a handsome house in New York, where she was going to live, for his wedding gift. Perhaps I misjudged her, but I fancied that she was dissatisfied with her uncle's present, and thought it not enough.

Hilary grew wonderfully buoyant in spirit when she was left alone with us. She never spoke against her cousin, but it was quite plain that Selma's influence upon her had been depressing. She now disclosed so many endearing qualities that we were in daily fear lest some one should win her away from us, though

Hilary gayly declared that we need not look to be rid of her so easily, that for her part she wanted no better example than Aunt Rachel, in whose footsteps she meant to follow. And when two years more had gone by without bringing a lover whom she was willing to accept, I began to think she might really mean what she said.

When two years more, as I said, had gone by, we, the doctor, Hilary, and I, arranged to spend the summer at the homestead with Elizabeth Prout, or rather with Mrs. Barnes. One thing and another hindered our starting, however, so that we did not get away until early in August. The summer was dry and hot. The wind was like a breath from a furnace. There were frequent signs of showers, but they all "went round," and the air, instead of being cleared by the mutterings of distant thunder, grew more and more oppressive. People said it would be sickly, and their forebodings proved correct. A malignant fever began to prevail. As is common at such times, the majority of the villagers were panic-struck, and few were found to take care of the sick. Doctor Wright, who was old and asthmatic, did what he could, and was valiantly assisted in his labors by a young man who was studying with him. But what were they among so many sufferers? Then Doctor Maitland entered the field. He had given up practice since his return to B——, being wholly engaged in his literary labors, but he took it up again now, working as untiringly as if he were a young physician eager to win laurels in his chosen profession. Wherever he went, John heard sounded the praises of Doctor Wright's student, whom, singularly enough, he never met. Nor did I, though I was giving my brother such support as I could.

"That young man's course is suicidal," said John, one day. "For five successive nights I have heard of his being with the sick all night, and it is certain that he gives himself no rest by day. I must put a stop to this. The only trouble is that I can never cross his track. Hilary, do you ever meet him?" For Hilary was also much among the sick.

"No," replied Hilary. "It really seems as if he avoids us on purpose."

"I will bring him to bay yet," said the doctor. "He is doing a noble work, but his life is too precious to be sacrificed."

"Elizabeth, who is Doctor Wright's student?" I asked, when John and Hilary had gone out again. I was getting a little worn out, and had been forbidden to leave the house that day.

"His name is John Alexander, I believe, but if he'd ha' called himself John Maitland, I wouldn't a been the one to dispute but what he come honest by his name. I never saw a plainer Maitland forehead than his is, and I've seen a good many of the family first and last."

"He can't be a Maitland. There are none of the family left but John and me," I said, quite decidedly. Nevertheless, I could not get Elizabeth's words out of my mind. I began to feel a strange interest in this young man, who might be a Maitland, but who was John Alexander, and who avoided us all so cleverly.

"Elizabeth," I said, at last, "I can't stay in the house. I am going out again, but I shall not be gone long."

Elizabeth remonstrated, but I was quite decided. In the first house into which I entered, I met John Alexander. He was sitting by a delirious patient, resting his head upon one hand, and his eyes had a wild, feverish lustre. Elizabeth was not mistaken. He had a right to the name of Maitland, for it was Alick.

The fever was just upon him, and the sight of me appeared to make him worse. He seemed to regard me as a creation of delirium, and I was by no means certain that I was not a fever patient, and he a visionary Alick. My recollections of that time are too confused to tell how I got him home, or how a knowledge of my discovery was conveyed to Doctor Maitland and to Hilary. The fever dealt mercifully by our poor boy, and he was spared to us. About this time a fresh, strong wind from the northwest sprung up, clearing the air, and giving renewed vigor to the villagers. Some of those who had held aloof hitherto, through fear or lassitude, now came forward to aid in taking care of the sick, so that we were left at liberty to attend to our own patient; and a more docile, grateful, considerate patient was never seen than Alick, when he began to be convalescent.

We got his story afterward. It was Selma who had visited him when he was left alone in Mr. Craig's rooms, and not in the capacity of a comforter. She declared that he had nothing to hope from his grandfather, that Hilary had represented him as utterly and hopelessly bad, and that Hilary ruled them all as with a rod of iron. There could be no gainsaying what she had asserted.

"They are all in a commotion," so Selma assured him, "about the disgrace you have brought upon the family, or, at least, all but Aunt Rachel, and she is too soft to have any influence. I have said what I could in your favor, but, dear me! I'm of no account. No body minds anything I say."

So Alick resolved to trouble his relatives no more. Hilary's counsel, however, he did not choose to set aside. She might be his enemy, but he had the sense to see that she had placed the right course before him. He would place himself yet in a position where his haughty kindred need not be ashamed of him. He kept to his purpose manfully. For two years he worked hard, studying in his leisure moments, and laying up his money. Then he went to Doctor Wright. He was unable to conjecture who Rhoda Mussey could be, or why he was reported dead. When the card picture of himself was shown him, he at once declared it to be one that, by her request, he had given his cousin Selma when she visited him at Mr. Craig's rooms.

This we thought very strange, and could make nothing out of it. When we had gone back to town, Alick accompanying us, for he was to finish his professional studies with Doctor Maitland, we told Mr. Craig about the photograph, and asked him what he thought of it. He declined giving an opinion then. A few days afterward, happening to be present when a letter from Selma was brought in, he picked up the envelope bearing my address, and examined it carefully.

"It strikes me, Miss Maitland," he said, then, "that this writing is at least second cousin to that of Rhoda Mussey."

"What! This elegant hand like the scrawling penmanship of those Mussey letters? You must be mistaken."

It was I who was mistaken, however. Mr. Craig went into the matter at once, and with those penetrating eyes of his succeeded at length in looking through the whole mystery. He learned first of all that the check sent by Doctor Maitland to Rhoda Mussey had been presented, and the money received by Pelton Burrage. Hilary acknowledged that Selma had known Burrage while at school, and had narrowly escaped being expelled on account of the acquaintance. She had promised, however, to give up meeting him, and Hilary heard no more about him afterwards until he appeared in B—— as a suitor for Selma's hand. Mr. Craig, wishing to learn something further about this man Burrage, went to Stanley, the town where the girls had attended school. He there met a clergyman, living in an adjoining town, who certified to having married Pelton Burrage and Rhoda Mussey. Further investigation proved beyond question that Selma Cranstoun was Rhoda Mussey, or rather that the two were identical. Selma's marriage was contracted thus clandestinely because Burrage was not then in a position to support a wife, and she did not choose to give up the generous allowance of her uncle, whose principal heiress she also hoped some day to become.

Finding that she could not supply in the regular way the demands for money made upon her by her husband, the story of Alick Maitland's death, and of Rhoda Mussey's sacrifices for her betrothed, was devised by Selma, and the money sent to that devoted bereaved one passed into the hands of Pelton Burrage, as we have seen. That of which she had accused Hilary, the endeavor to get Alick out of the way in order herself to have a chance at his grandfather's property, Selma had actually attempted, combining with it an effort to destroy our faith in Hilary.

When this last scheme was found to have fallen hopelessly flat, Selma abandoned the hope of succeeding to the Maitland property, and, finding the restraints of her uncle's home irksome, she wished to join her husband. If she were to confess her marriage, however, she feared that revelation might lead to other unpleasant discoveries. Besides, she could hope nothing more from Doctor Maitland's generosity if he were made aware of the deception she had practised. She therefore decided upon the farce of a new marriage with the man who was already her husband, trusting to her own cleverness to keep the irregularity of her proceedings hidden in the future as she had done in the past. There! I have not patience to write another word about Mrs. Burrage. Let her rest in peace, if she can. I wish her no harm, but I should be sorry ever to have to look upon her false face again.

Alick endears himself to us more and more every day. John has great pride in him. I am foolishly tender of the boy, I fear, and Hilary—but at the outset I resolved that I would not make a love story of this, so I think I had better say no more about Alick and Hilary.

THE PARTING.

BY LEWIS MORRISON.

I've pressed my last kiss on thy brow,
I've breathed my last farewell,
And hushed within my swelling heart,
The love I dare not tell.
I sought to win thee for my own,
To wear thee in my heart,
That dream is o'er, I leave thee now,
And bless thee as we part.

The cherished hopes of other days
Time never may restore,
But, dear one lost, I love thee still,
As fondly as of yore.
Thy low sweet tones are in my ears
Where'er my footsteps roam,
And pleasant memories of thee
Will make my heart their home.

And when my barque, now passion-tossed
Upon life's wintry sea,
Shall sink beneath the stormy wave,
Wilt thou not weep for me?
Farewell, I dare not pause to gaze
Into those eyes of thine;
Heaven spare thy heart the agony
That now is breaking mine.

BAD company is like a nail driven into a post, which, after the first or second blow, may be drawn out with little difficulty; but, being once driven up to the head, the pincers cannot take hold to draw it out, but which can only be done by the destruction of the wood.—Augustine.

BESIDE THE STILE.

BY LOUISE BARTON.

It was the fairest spot in all the country side, that stile, overtopped by wild rose boughs, and standing as it did in a green nook between the dusky wood and the broad rounded stretch of upland meadow which, in front and to the left, appeared to overhang the sea. To the right a gorge stooped suddenly far down to a mill stream and a purple moor beyond. There gloomed the gray walls of a castle, and farther seaward rose the spire and roofs of a prosperous fishing village. Where the stream fell down toward the sea in foaming falls, a mill-tower started up among rocks of which it seemed a part. To the left, at the wood's verge, a peeked and gabled red-roofed farm-house clustered, with full fields and cackling, bustling barn-yard, among branching oaks.

Over the sea the sunset flush of dusky red slanted across the upland, and lit up a lingering group of haymakers, still raking up in stacks the new-mown hay. The evening breeze came laden with the balmy scent here to the stile, where leaned a man still young, though passed beyond the first years of his manhood. There was a weariness in the gray eyes that roved from moor to gorge and upland, a restless dissatisfaction, though the whole fair country side, far as his glance could reach, was his. Mill and farm-house, field and wood, belonged to yonder castle, and he was looking on them all for the first time since boyhood passed among them. The memories that dwelt here were all peaceful as this gloaming nook, where only the breeze fluttered, and the nestling birds were twittering, while distant waves washed nearer in the hush. Now and again a laugh rang from the hay field, or the black kine lowed, and a bell tinkled in the woodland pasture to which this stile led. But these sounds did not break on the serenity. That which troubled it was in Kenneth Macgregor's self, as he thought of the boyish hopes with which he had leaned there last, and how their brightness had withered in his hold like fairy gold, which in the light of day fades to a heap of yellow leaves.

Macgregor was no misanthrope who falls to idle hatred of the world because he is worsted in the first brush with it. He had stood up manfully in his place, but had been worsted, nevertheless. He began the battle with fair-seeming weapons of hope, rank, money, friends, and an untarnished name. The last a brother had flung down and trodden in the mire, and the first had slipped from his own grasp. Rank, money, friends; the first two might have kept the last, but he scorned to hold them so, and recklessly threw them aside, when perhaps they might have proved trusty and true. And then he had retreated here, at bay, though disdaining to keep the field with such ignoble weapons as remained to him.

Slander had whispered that he was a treacherous friend, a coward, murderer. Slander could not prove that whisper, but Macgregor could not disprove it, save by pointing to his only brother, "thou art the man." And so he bore the calumny in silence, after the first vehement denial. That silence was hard when the guilty one sneaked cowardly away in the crowd that turned the cold shoulder to him. But, having once closed his lips, Macgregor was not to be bullied nor exasperated into speaking. For a time he stood his ground in his London world, and then came seeking rest, not flight, to his hereditary home.

Here were at least no eyes to meet him on a level, taunting him with the dark story. The old tacksman, or hereditary tenant, in the farm-house yonder, the villagers and peasants round—although they doubtless knew that story, and believed it, yet remembered their allegiance to the laird, and, when he met them, greeted him respectfully. And there was certainly some sense of rest in the calm gloaming—some soft soothing in the breeze to which he bared his brow. Yet his lips parted with a heavy sigh, when just at that moment he heard a rustic close behind him in the grassy path that wound out from the pasture.

He turned quickly. They were the blue folds of a kirtle that had brushed against him, and a young girl paused there waiting to cross the stile. One dimpled arm steadied the full milking-pail upon her head, and with the other she had parted the rose boughs, and so came suddenly upon him. The red sun flushed the white kerchief crossed upon her bosom and her throat as white, and glanced and glittered in her braided, snooded hair, as if it left the darkening skies to shine in golden glory there. Macgregor gazed, forgetting to move, and then he stood aside to let her pass.

He had made a motion as if to help her over the stile, but his arm fell as he remembered there were few women of his own rank to whom he would venture to offer it. The lassie had her foot still upon the lower step, and saw and understood his motion. She stopped, half turned, and blushing held out her hand, raising her eyes as she did so full to his. Their frank blue glance told him as plainly as words could have done that he was recognized, and, as he helped her over in silence, her hand rested on his with that unshrinking touch which he felt could never have been had she believed his stained with crime.

It was but a second, and she had passed from him, tripping lightly over the brown stubble and the scented clover with a smile for this gleaner, and a merry word for that. Macgregor watched her until she disappeared among the oaks that skirted the farm-yard. So, then, she could be no other than the tacksman's granddaughter, his little foster-sister, whom he had left a plaything of four years old. He turned away when she was lost to sight, and went down to his lonely castle with a lighter heart than he had borne for many months. It was something to be believed in by one innocent soul.

Macgregor pushed away his book, where the sunbeams, dancing in and out through shadows of the shifting leaves overhead, were making strange blurs of the closely-printed text. He flung his arm above his head, and stretched himself at length upon the mossy crag which overhung the mill stream, and was shut in by the low sweeping alders and the silvery stems of a birken copse. A snowy heifer was browsing in the sedges yonder sleepily. The hum of the mill-wheel at a distance died away hardly louder than that of the bee burrowing in the yellow primrose, which leaned here against the brimming wave. The balmy noontide was a time to dream, not read. So Macgregor lounged there idly, watching through half-shut lids the sparkles flashing in and out among the ripples. Strangely enough, as he watched, ripples and sparkles wove a braid of sunny hair, from the contemplation of which he was hardly roused by a low distant singing. It came from a hazel copse that hid the path down from the upland, but presently the singer emerged. Who but Annot—not this time with her milking-pail, but carrying perched on her shoulder a little rosy child, clinging and crowing gleefully as she sang to it, and filled its chubby hands with flowers. Down the crag among the wild roses she sprang, until the gray birks closed around and snatched her away like a dream.

Macgregor had been dreaming too deeply. He rose up with an impatient gesture, as if to shake himself awake. It was very pastoral and pretty, perhaps, this idyl of maids and milking-pails, but the shorter the idyl the wiser for him who was no pastor fidus. Annot had passed up the glen, and he would take the path which led down where the bridge crossed the floss above the mill. But first he turned for a last glance. She had passed out from the birks, and stood where her pet heifer moved to meet her through the sedges. She had lowered the child to the tame creature's shoulder, and the shrinking boy, growing bolder, reached over to feed the strange steed with his handful of blossoms. A bright little picture it was, as the heifer trampled through the tufted grass, the child clinging to its shaggy neck with one dimpled arm, while the other hand was fast in the young girl's hold. Macgregor found it difficult to turn away, and yet he did so. But hardly had he taken the first step, hardly had he lost that picture of joyousness, when a shriek pierced the tranquil air. Another—one stride brought him round the intercepting crag.

There stood Annot on the bank where the milk-white heifer lazily stooped her fringed brow to the stream. There stood Annot, but the child? A plunge, a few strong strokes, and Macgregor had grasped a limp, white burden floating on the floss.

But how the current strove for it, then grappled with him, while its gurgling round about him mocked his utmost efforts. And the wheel, the great white wheel, that revolved weirdly as that of fate before his dimmed eyes, seemed with every laboring, groaning turn to draw two life threads nearer to itself. Those seconds drew out to long hours, while the struggle was uncertain. But, at last, at last, the bank was gained; two girlish arms reached out to the spent swimmer, and, in the gladdest sunshine that ever fell on him, he laid his burden on her bosom.

She knelt there in the quivering rushes, trembling more than they. She pressed her warm cheek to the cold one laid so still against her, and from which she stroked away the washed-out curls. She looked in wild despair into the blue eyes, glassed as if life's tide stood still in them. But, while she looked, they brightened to her gaze, a faint flush stole across the baby cheek, and presently a tiny hand stole up and nestled on her neck. With that, she rose from her knee, and stood before Macgregor. Blue as April skies, her eyes shone through fast-dropping tears, while radiant smiles lit up her face.

"I canna thank you," she said, softly, "but God kens. He thanks his creatures best."

And she lifted the child in her arms up toward him. Macgregor glanced at her, then touched the soft closed baby mouth her lips had pressed but now.

"Surely the laird will come hame wi' us," she said; "the gude-sire wad be blithe and fain!"

But Macgregor would enter no door, not even his tenant's, on any footing save that of an innocent man. He said gayly that he must forthwith convey his dripping self back to the castle. So, smiling on him through her happy tears, she hastened on the path that mounted to the upland.

Through the twilight which closed that day he paced the castle terrace, where at every turn the upland met his gaze. Lights glinted through the trees on which the farm-house hid; and then one tiny lattice highest of all flashed out like an unattainable star. He watched till it went out, and then he passed on slowly, and entered to the gloom of his lonely hall.

Many a twilight had gone by, when one night Macgregor rode along the upland verge beside the stile. In that other gloaming, hill and valley were a-leaf—now, shrouded snow enwrapped them all. Toward the bared wood hung clouds which, though they hid the moon, did not prevent its light from defining so much of the landscape as the fallen snow had not smoothed away in a waved surface. Above the ice-bound stream the mute mill-wheel hung, one glitter of icicles, when now and again the moon broke through its prison. Gray and bleak the sea stretched out, and black the pine wood on the moor's outer verge. All else was one cold white expanse.

But there was no cold for Macgregor. Color came to his bronzed cheek, light to his grave eyes, as he checked his horse beside the stile involuntarily, stopping as he looked back on the year, the sands of which had not an hour to run. It was a checkered way to look back on. The blackness of despair was uniform across its earlier parts; but since the summer, light and shadow alternated. The light—yes, it had come to this—the light was of the days when he had been with Annot; the shadows, those passed apart from her. Not a word of love had he yet spoken, hoping time might teach her what he feared to try to do too soon. Had it so taught? He could not tell—only her welcome was ever the most cordial of all the cordial welcomes at the hill-farm, where he was an honored guest. For slanders from the city had died away in "the Macgregor's ain kintin," like a whiff of noisome vapor in the fresh pure air. As for Annot—last week, when he walked with her from the kirk, recounting some narrow escape of his by sea, she paled and trembled, and her little hand touched his arm, moved by a quick impulse. Just there, however, the daft old gudesire had trudged up with his duty to the laird.

To-night, according to good Scottish custom, all the offshoots of the family from far and wide assembled in the farm-house to hail in the New Year. And when the clock should strike the knell of the Old Year, whoever set his foot first on the threshold, might claim a kiss from the lassie within, as her "First Foot," or Valentine. Macgregor had chosen this time to decide his fate yet further. He would lay it in Annot's hands, to do with it according to her will.

Gay Glamis sped across the snow, until the rane upon the byre glinted near, and beckoned, veering in the veering wind. Beneath a transient moonbeam, all the icy-armored oak-twigs twinkled in a flash of gold and red. But from the huge deep casement of the gabled house, a blaze of firelight was beckoning yet more brightly; and at its bidding Macgregor flung himself from his horse.

But he could not pass round to the entrance-porch at once. He had caught a glimpse within, and paused, hidden by curtaining ivy.

Well might he pause, for a brighter glimpse one could not have. The flames in the vast alcoved chimney leaped from wainscoted walls to polished oak beams overhead, and down again to the sanded floor. They just touched in their way the towering clock upon the stroke of twelve, the brass-linked chest of drawers, white curtains looped back from the lattice, and the shining centre-table heaped with brown nuts and bannocks, and the ruddiest of apples. There, too, gathered faces just as rosy, or as brown and wrinkled, as the homely cheer before them—met together to bind the tie of kindred close again with every renewed year. In the chimney-corner sat the grandame, with gray hair banded under snowy curch, her withered hand upon the curls of the prattling little one upon her knee. Opposite, the gudesire, his face like a frosted winter apple under his hoary pow, beat time with his stick to the chorus. But all this Macgregor hardly saw. For Annot knelt upon the hearth, the bairns about her, peeping while she frothed the wassail-bowl upon the embers, ready for the last stroke of the clock.

How fair she was—how graceful the lily-droop of the golden head—how sweet the smiling red lips which presently must pay the "First Foot's toll." Macgregor glanced at the clock opposite. One moment more—

A quick rap at the inner door. "Open, lassie, it maun be auld neighbor Miller," said the grandfather. But the children danced about in glee, clapping their hands, and shouting, "Annot's First Foot! Annot's First Foot tirling at the door-pin!"

Annot passed close by the casement. Macgregor saw how at the children's shout she flushed, then paled, and drew a deep though voiceless sigh. She lifted the latch slowly. And then the sighing lips parted in a thrilling cry:—

"Rob! Rob! come hame at last across the sea!"

Macgregor dropped the ivy boughs against the pane. For there upon the threshold Annot clung in the arms of a stripling sailor, her gold hair against his breast, her glowing face uplifted as his stooped to her. He staggered blindly from the lattice, the glad tones within taking away his very breath.

Only moments passed while he stood without beneath the oaks. But they were moments wherein gathered all the blackness of the bitter past—the blackness of the empty future. Yet he was calm when he entered the ben, and stood among the guests. "The Macgregor is pale wi' the frost-wind's skirling," they said, as they welcomed him.

He mingled with them, hailing in the New Year as if all the while he was not thinking of that dead year which had brought him—

"A friend and a true, true love,

And the New Year will take them away."

Bonnie Annot held the wassail-bowl for him to pledge, and, as he bent his head, she murmured, bashfully, with downcast glance:—

"Macgregor maun pledge joy to Annot, for the New Year fills her cup to overflowing."

He grasped her hand, and drained the bowl without a word. And then he drew her to the door apart, and there with down-dropped eyes she told her story.

"How well you listened, little Annot," he jested, shading his face from the light, "when all my talk was of the sea."

Her trilling laughter taunted him. "Eh, sirs, sic fearsome tales!" she cried. "You mind the day, laird, when you walked wi' me hame from the kirk? I tried to tell you all then; but it was no' that easy while Rob was still awa'. You maun ken it was at the stile where you and I first met, that we had parted—Rob and I—before you came back to the castle. We plighted troth mony a day ere that, but he—awee!, I had danced wi' the miller's Tam—and when Rob chid I flouted him. That night a ship sailed from the village, and Rob sailed in her."

"And yet all this while she was so gay, so blithe," he said, very low, rather to himself than to her.

She looked up quickly. "Eh, would ye hae folk say I was breaking my heart for one who left me? 'Sae blithe!' Muckle men ken! Though what for suld I greet, when I never doubted of his coming back to me? For Rob loves me," and she lifted her head proudly.

Aye, Rob loves me! but no more than Annot loves, Macgregor saw, as the young sailor came up at that moment. Unobserved, Macgregor passed out from the doorway, and flung himself upon his horse.

The gathering storm had burst at last. The moon had set; the sky was hopelessly overclouded; fast and fast the flakes fell through the pressing dark. The blast drove from the sea, howling and rending the desolate wood like a crazed thing. Bravely and steadily Glamis dashed on, and his master fiercely welcomed the strife with the elements, as some relief from the dull pain that numbed his heart. But the winds swept about, flinging snow-wreaths against blinded eyes, mocking and baffling the floundering steed with treacherous drifts and shifting walls.

The path down to the moor was gone. Woods, gorge, and field, all blent together undefinedly. Once and again Macgregor turned, crossed and recrossed the upland, still uncertain of his course. The farm-house light went out among the trees; no ray fell through the low-hung clouds; no glimmer rose up from the moor.

Benumbed, bewildered, drowsy, with a heaviness from which he could not rouse, Macgregor's head sank on his breast. And now when Glamis plunged, and rose to take the wild-rose hedge, now but a ragged thorn-brake half buried in the snow, his master swerved in the saddle, dizzily caught at empty air, and fell prone to the ground against the heaped-up stile.

The night went on, and heaped the snow yet higher as it passed. The storm blew over, and the stars came forth in the gray dawn. And when the New Year sun arose in skies of steely blue, it glinted on a drifted grave beside the stile.

UNSEEN REALITIES.

BY LIZZIE YORK CASE.

THE moon with her gay troop of stars
Drove the great sun away,
Night's gate put up its misty bars,
And so closed out the day.
A heavy cloudlet rolled between Earth and the stars I love;
I knew not how, but yet I knew
They still shone bright above.

I know not how the far off sun
Can pierce the frozen earth,
And call the flowerets one by one
A-laughing into birth;
But yet I know the swelling seed
Will push the clods away,
Come forth with crowned and perfumed head,
A very "queen of May."

But shall I doubt the starlight's glow
In heaven's fields divine,
Because awhile through clouds that roll
I may not see them shine?
And shall I crush the flowerets all
From out fair nature's hand,
Because their wondrous coming forth
I may not understand?

How very poor in beauties bright
Our lovely earth would be,
If robbed of all we could not grasp,
Or our dull visions see;
How comfortless our stricken hearts
In time of grief had been,
But for some strong, yet shadowy hand,
Some faith or hope unseen.

We may not see the angel feet,
That tread our pathway fair,
But when we find it smooth and bright,
We know they have been there.
We may not hear the fluttering of
The wings that just have flown,
Yet we walk among the roses
That the unseen hands have strown.

And so we're kept and guided by What here we call "Ideal,"
But when our sight is clearer made,
The shadows will be real;
True and immortal principles
That will not fade away,
Though all things seen and loved of earth
May sink into decay.

And so by unseen agencies
Our earth-life is made fair,
And led by dear, down-reaching hands,
We climb the golden stair;
When the watchword of admittance
At heaven's gate will be FAITH in those veiled realities
That this side none may see.

SOLITUDE is one of the highest enjoyments of which our nature is susceptible. Solitude is also, when too long continued, capable of being made the most severe, indescribable, unendurable source of anguish.—Deloraine.

NETTIE'S SACRIFICE.

BY INO CHURCHILL.

THE gorgeous tintings of the summer sunrise flamed up the east like banners heralding a king and all his loyal subjects; tree and flower, half-raised expectant eyes in joy, half-bowed themselves in homage, as the grand old monarch beamed his smile of benediction o'er hill, and dale, and wood, and lawn, and coppice. The birds took up the flowers' tremulous breath of heart-song, and made it audible with joy, and the old waving pines cast now and then a note that softened all to a sweet psalm of praise.

But it was not the reflection merely of nature's happiness that brightened Nettie Arnold's face as she hung over the garden gate, and nodded "good-morning" to her flowers, and I am almost afraid to tell that something more sordid than sunshine lent its gilding to her brow, and something more transferable to comfort than the lily's perfume deepened the dimples that played about her mouth. She was very happy, she acknowledged that in every gleeful laugh and graceful movement, and she felt benignant toward every one and particularly complacent toward herself, as she cast a thought back to the treasured box tucked away in her secret drawer.

She was peculiarly situated, this young girl of eighteen short, and not all happy years. Her mother had died long ago, and her father had after a time married a widow. Then her father died, leaving what little property he owned to his wife and infant son, giving his only daughter a life-rent in the house as her only portion. But the change in her circumstances was not apparent, until her stepmother, still a comely woman, contracted another alliance, and grew as absorbed in the interest of her third husband as she had been in that of her first. Mr. Stanhope, the present master of the house, was of very irascible disposition, and very difficult to please, and Nettie found, for her own peace of mind and her stepmother's comfort, she must withdraw herself to her own portion of the house, and seldom mingle in the family groupings, and she finally removed all her belongings to her own apartments.

Mr. Stanhope felt himself particularly aggrieved that she had any right in the house at all, most of all that the pleasantest part of it should have been assigned to her use. But there was no help for it, and he contented himself by growling at her, or overlooking her altogether. After the first surprise and regret, she found she respected him too little to make herself unhappy over the matter, and enjoyed herself in her quiet way, oftenest alone at her meals, though sometimes her prattling half-brother would come in with his hands full of cakes "to keep house with sister Nettie."

She had a remarkable talent for music and a ready power of imparting her knowledge of this agreeable science, but one of Mr. Stanhope's first acts was to sell the piano her father had purchased for her use, declaring it was lumber-some and useless. In vain his wife pleaded and remonstrated, and Nettie urged alike without avail that it could be removed to her own rooms if in the way; but he was determined, and it was sold under the auctioneer's hammer. That was nearly three years before, but by daily music lessons given at the homes of her pupils, she had laid by enough beyond her ordinary expenses to procure another instrument, and this it was that gave such a glow to her face this summer morning.

She was not going to spend the money that day, or the next, or the next after, perhaps; it was such a satisfaction to know that she possessed it, and had honestly and honorably gained it, and no millionaire could have felt more proud that his hands dropped gold coins than did she, who had only to will now for what she had so laboriously toiled. She had not seen her stepmother or her little brother for some days. She did not dare enter the rooms, for Mr. Stanhope kept himself at home, yet she felt there was some sort of a cloud hanging over them, though it had not enveloped her. She knew that a few nights before there had been a fearful storm, for she had heard the thunder of angry tones and passionate sobs in pleading, and a youth's voice in proud vindication; but she did not catch the words, and after awhile it was still, except low mutterings and now and then a wail, as though the storm had spent itself, but the murky atmosphere had not cleared, she understood, and anything electric like herself might call forth the lightning shaft again, and she wisely kept away.

She went in and ate her lonely breakfast, lonely in point of visible companionship, but merry with fairy visitors of hope and good feeling. She made her room tidy, and went out to her daily duties so cheerily that one who met her asked "if her thoughts were set to music?"

And she laughed as she told him "they were flowing out in rhythm."

"Well, child," he replied, "may their echo be always sweet when they lose the power thus to flow."

She thanked him, but he had saddened her a little. Yet, you know, after the most glorious sunshine, there is oftentimes a semblance of a shadow, that is not a cloud, nor yet a mist, but as it were a concentration of light itself, so intense that the effect has in it just the faintest premonition of what it might be to dwell for aye in darkness. And yet, I think, the fair morning seldom dreameth of the cloud that at night may settle blackly toward the west, any more than the star of Hope once risen on youth's horizon expects to wane away without some recognized fruition. We call things by their names reversely, and backwards spell the alphabet of blessings, till bad seems good, and good our greatest bane and peril.

It was quite evening when Nettie returned to her home for the fourth time that day; so busy and ambitious was she, that when there was work to do she could find time to do it, and her late tea was all the more refreshing that she had waited for it. She was all ready for her evening recreation, having swept her room, and glanced at her little possessions to assure herself of their safety, when she noticed that the curtain of her back window was disarranged. She stepped forward to adjust it, and a note fell from its folds to her feet. She looked out hastily, but no one was in sight, and rather nervously she opened the missive, and grew pale as she comprehended its contents.

"Oh! how can I?" she exclaimed, "how can I? It is wrong and selfish of him to require it of me. It is not my duty, and I cannot make the sacrifice. Oh! why did I keep it thus long? If it were but impossible to grant his wish! But it is in my power," she pondered, after awhile. "It may, as he says, save him from ruin. Now, if I had a rope, would I refuse it to a drowning man? Or a crust, would I begrudge it of hunger?"

She rocked back and forth uneasily, then took up the note again. "To-morrow night, the seventh, I am to meet him, he says, at the beechwood tree. But I cannot, I will not." And she closed her room, and sought her couch, not to sleep, indeed, save fitfully, to wake and find her treasure vanished, and herself defrauded. Then she put the information in the note and the storm in the adjoining household together, and could understand in some manner how the youth who had appealed to her benevolence was situated. How his character was being subjected to its severest test, and how her friendly face turned away might confront him with the wily tempter. How her selfishly closed hand might be the sealing up to him of honorable escape.

She tossed about dissatisfied but undecided, till dawn again chased away Nature's doubts; then she rose and prepared herself for the new day's duties. She did not seek to bask her form in the new-born light; the rays of warmth and kindness were struggling in her soul for being. How thickly incrustated with ice one dark night had left her heart. If one, or two, or more succeeded, could any kindly beam find entrance there? The day's duties were not as yesterday, but pleasures with a business name. Her pupils were dull, instruments out of tune, music itself bereft of melody, and early at eve she went home, listless and dissatisfied with the world and all things in it.

She drew her curtain, took out her treasured store, and counted it. Four hundred dollars, no more, no less, laid carefully away for the instrument she must and would have. Why should she not? If she could give him half, but the other half would be of no use to her, but to call for an accession she felt she could not make. It had been hard for its sake already, too hard, but for the pleasure it would bring, to deny herself an unpretending jewel or bright ribbon, while the other girls blushed at their enhanced beauty under such an ornament. She could not even afford gloves for the last party, though she longed to go, and she despised herself now that she had then playfully caressed the hand that had so nearly accomplished its task. She put back her bills, clean and fresh every one of them with pure and honest purpose. Not filthy lucre, with taint of sin upon them, or clank of chain, or stain of blood, or soil of unholy contract or unrighteous bargaining.

What if they were withheld? Would links of vice entammel a young heart? Or signs of shame grow quickly visible, as rust corrodes the soonest what healthy use and action have hitherto kept untarnished? But she would not answer; she stifled her conscience, and sat with her eyes closed till the stroke of the clock aroused her. She had yet fifteen minutes to the appointed time of meeting. She lifted the curtain; the twilight had nearly faded, and the faint gleam of the young moon was asserting its power over the departing day. The great joy-giving sun had gone away. The lesser orb was sweet and peaceful in its ministrations. A tender light it shed, like that evolved from quiet, secondary duty, calmly and well performed. There is a happiness that scorches and withers, even while it holds triumphant sway; and there is quieter pleasure that enriches while it gives joy, and subsoils most deeply while it blooms forth its beauty, and spreadeth its fragrance abroad.

Nettie started suddenly and looked at the clock; five minutes more, and he no doubt was waiting, trusting; should she fail any one in such a strait? No! Shame on the heart that held itself back from accomplishing what good it might. She opened the drawer, and took out the box without looking at it, threw a light shawl over her shoulders, and was off like a fawn down the path to the beechwood tree.

A youth with his hat pushed over his face, with a disconsolate air had just struck into the opposite path; a moment more, and he would be concealed from her view. Should she let him go? Was it not his fault if he had failed to wait for her? And would not her intention to help be recognized by a higher power?

"George," she called, faintly, half-hoping he would not hear. But he did, for his ear was strained by long listening for her footstep, and he turned.

"Heaven bless you, Nettie! I thought you would not come. I was turning away from all good, I fear, for I was losing my trust in my kind."

"O George!" Nettie could only gasp, "here it is, all of it, four hundred dollars; it will help you, I am sure," and she thrust it into his half reluctant hand.

"I am ashamed to take it, Nettie, I can feel the blood flame up in my veins; but what could I do? I am not used to the world. Oh! you do not know how terribly even now I have combated with temptation. If you had not come, Nettie! if you had not come! I had even turned to walk recklessly over the brink of destruction. But, my dear girl, one-quarter of this sum will do till I can get employment, then I will cancel my money obligation to you, though I never can all that by this act you do for me."

"Keep it all, George; nay, you must," as he insisted on returning part; "I shall not be content unless you do. You said you should go to the city; with a whole city full, you may not succeed at first; I shall not need it."

"Is that true, Nettie? Do you in no way make a sacrifice in relieving me?"

She hesitated. "No, George, none but what I now most cheerfully offer. O George, be a noble man for the sake of this hour, that has revealed to us so much to be hoped for, so much to be shunned."

"Heaven be my witness, Nettie, I will," said the youth, folding the girl in his arms, and kissing her tenderly, almost tearfully. "I have not offended?" he asked, as Nettie hastily withdrew herself from his embrace. "I knew not how else to express my gratitude."

"No, it is not that; good-by, I must not remain longer," and she turned into the homeward path, while he watched to see that no harm befell her.

She had been out of her room scarce half an hour, but its aspect was changed. The deep recess beside the mantel whose broad vacancy her imagination had many a time filled, looked barren and drear, and the easy chair she hastily pushed into the corner, left another place without furniture, and she hardly knew whether she were glad or sorry when she sat down and viewed her surroundings from a hitherto unoccupied quarter. But then, may be, there was something added to some secret passage of her soul where adornment had been thought of so little moment, that even now the new presence was unheeded, like the gossamer drapery of the window of some long unused room, scarce noted, because so delicate, that softens the glare of the searching light, and casts artistic figures where only the floating bar of dust were else revealed.

Nettie's sleep that night was sweet and unbroken, and the cheerful morning sun dispersed her gloom, and with a heart scarce understanding its own experience, she went about her usual avocations.

After a week or two Nettie seemed to be conscious of a change in the atmosphere around her; not anything very distinct, but noticeable, as is the cool autumn breath sweeping the summer air, though one's heart is a little more susceptible to chill than one's cheek. Then after a while the wind seemed to grow frosty, and ice to form in shallow places, for some avenues were closed against her. Whenever her music term had expired she was notified distinctly, but pleasantly, that her services would be no longer required. She could not understand the matter at all, but kept up a show of cheerfulness, and a brave heart, and even inquired of Sarah Maria Green, who had superseded her, "how she liked her pupils."

Miss Green, with a boarding-school air, replied: "That where the foundation was so unstable, one could not expect much of the superstructure."

Nettie laughed in spite of her uneasiness, at this thrust at her armor.

Nettie's most beloved pupil was Carrie Davis, a young girl near her own age, so petite in figure and childish in manner, that she seemed much younger. Carrie was in Nettie's confidence about the piano, and was almost as anxious to see it in the place reserved for it as was Nettie herself. Carrie usually took her lesson after school hours, and one night, about a month after Nettie had given her money into other hands, while she was at Carrie's house giving her instructions, there came up a shower, so severe that it was inexpedient for her to return home; indeed, Mrs. Davis would not permit her to go, and she was nothing loth to stay, as she had often done before. And this night she felt a double security in this house of wealth, and with this family of influence as her friends; so many of late having looked coldly upon her.

The storm lingered late into the evening, and the two girls, after the lesson, linked their arms lovingly together, and walked softly up and down the room in slow march, as though subdued by the terror of the storm, starting timidly as now and then a flash of lightning more vivid than the rest lighted up the room, while Mrs. Davis sat quietly with shaded eyes apparently absorbed in deep thought. There had been another occupant of the room in the earlier part of the evening, Mrs. Davis' brother, Frederick Carrol, a man of some twenty-eight years, whom Carrie called her "bachelor uncle." While the girls were engaged, he had stepped unobserved into the embrasure of the bay-window, and dropped the heavy curtains to exclude the blaze of artificial light, the more distinctly to witness the play of heaven's artillery. He possessed a strong, brave nature, and loved the storm, as the war-horse loves the excitement of the fray.

He had paid no attention to what was going on in the room, and it was some moments after Mrs. Davis had dismissed Carrie that he was startled by hearing his sister repeating to Nettie a story in circulation about her. It was too late to make his presence known without giving additional pain to Miss Arnold, and he could not escape through the window without the noise of opening it. He tried not to listen, but, after all, his ear was painfully alert, for he could not but feel an interest in the young girl he had met almost daily, although he looked upon her as somewhat of a child, with a character hardly formed.

"Well, my dear?" said Mrs. Davis, inquiringly, as Nettie, too shocked and indignant to reply, kept silent, the eloquent blood flashing forth its protest. "I do not believe the story, my child," continued the lady, "but I deemed it friendly to tell you; and now I want authority to refute it. I am almost ashamed to ask you the question, but did there a young man enter your room privately late at evening?"

"No," said Nettie, in so strained a voice, that for the first time Mrs. Davis believed there was some foundation for the report.

"Excuse me, but did you meet one by appointment, one evening, at the old tree in your orchard?"

"I did," replied the girl, flushing at the construction placed upon the act.

"Did you put something into his hands, at which he embraced and kissed you?"

"Yes, yes! Oh, spare me, Mrs. Davis!" gasped the tortured girl.

"One question more," said the lady, growing very grave, "is this young man a relative, and has he a claim on you?"

"No, no! Heaven help me, no! But believe me, dear friend, I am innocent of an evil thought in this matter."

"Tell me, my child, how it all came about, that I may clear your character from suspicion," urged the lady, laying her hand on Nettie's arm.

"I cannot; oh, I cannot!" faltered Nettie, feeling that she must not reveal the secret of another.

"Then, my child, if you will not vindicate yourself, I cannot allow you to associate with my Carrie. Already your name is spoken as though your virtue were held in light esteem. Your services as my daughter's teacher will not be longer required. Good-night; if in the morning you see fit to confide in me, I will do all I can for you," still hesitating, as if she hoped for some word of explanation. "I will send a servant to show you to your room, then, Nettie, if you have nothing to say."

But Nettie sat white and mute as a statue, and Mrs. Davis went out and closed the door. Then Mr. Carrol heard a quick, stifled sob, a piteous call on God for help; then the outside door open and close hastily, and saw the white face of the young girl revealed by the lightning's flash, as she darted by the window, her head and form unshielded from the dripping rain. His first impulse was to spring through the window and offer her protection, but a second thought deterred him; it would be better for her sake, and kinder to remain. He believed her innocent of guile, though circumstances seemed against her, and he could not interfere with his sister's desire to keep her young daughter from questionable companionship.

Nettie reached home breathless and almost stupefied, and threw herself on her couch too wretched to pray; even doubting if there were any God at all, or anything but the bare round world that had turned to rock, and rolled itself upon her heart. But the morning came, and the rock had shaped itself into a smooth glittering sword, cutting keen and sharp into the throbbing flesh and shrinking heart, and painful nerve. This, then, was her reward! But then she had not looked for reward, excepting so far as the one she had helped would be influenced toward the right; and if she had acted rightly, the deed itself would some time bring compensation, if the motive power were pure. Her thoughts stopped here; she was not sure the motive was single. She wished the past were a blank, and she could begin the volume of her life anew; how very fair the characters should be; how full of truth and all things good the under thought become. But who could tell how soon again a careless or a wilful hand should mar the unsullied record, or overset the ink of slander on the well-lettered page? But this day's leaf, at any rate, was fresh, and crowding down the bitterness that kept welling up in her heart; she again went forth to duty, to return discouraged, and almost disheartened. So many met her coldly; and some brushed by without a recognizing glance whom she had called her friends; and others whispered meaningly together as she passed. Only one glint of kindness in all that dreary day; that summer day, aglow to other hearts, drearier and more barren than the icy plain to her. Mr. Carrol's frank "good-morning" and respectful lifting of the hat as he passed her on the street, was treasured more than all the kind words he had said to her in their frequent intercourse. But then, alas! perhaps he did not know, she thought. So jealous we become of any's grace, if some behave unfriendly.

Two weeks had passed away, and she had received her dismissal from every family who had employed her. She made no remonstrance and asked no questions, and as the weeks went by she shrank within herself, and away from others, as though she were the guilty thing they thought her; growing distrustful of mankind, and thankless toward her God; breathing because she could not help it; sleeping from dull weariness, and waking to vague pain; existing merely as things exist that have no aim or purpose, no seed to germinate, no bud to flower, no fruit to ripen and mature. At last she woke to find that even such a life must be sustained; her means of livelihood had been cut off, and every cent expended, diminished the treasury whose store she could not augment.

Mr. Stanhope, having heard the circulating stories, and quickly divining who it was that sought clandestine interviews with her, with characteristic meanness forbade his wife to have any communication with the girl, and she dared not disobey him.

Friendless and forlorn, approaching with steady steps extreme poverty, Nettie found she must shake off the incubus, and exert herself to supply her daily needs. It was useless for her to apply for a situation anywhere in her native place, and were it not, she was too proud to sue. So she went to a neighboring village round and round in fruitless search of honorable employment, and returned with scarce a dollar left. There was one way open to her, only one at all accessible; she might find work in a factory where many of the girls bore doubtful reputations. She shrank from this with a dread that only the pure and innocent can understand.

She took a seat by the window, and leaned her head on her hand, disheartened. Had it come to this? She with her independent spirit, proud nature, and innocent life, forced in her native town to a choice between dishonor and starvation. In two days more it would come to that. Or, if by a pitiful crust thrown at her, she did not starve when the winter came, that autumn even now forewarned her of, could she live through the darkness and cold of the fearful nights, though she might cuddle at day where the sun's slant rays gave niggard cheer? How strange it seemed. She had heard that people sometimes starved, but that was far off in great cities, and she deemed their own improvidence and mismanagement brought them thus low, and held that as half excuse for not growing sick with pity. Were there too many in the world, that God sometimes was cramped in his resources, and hungry lips and glazing eyes petitioned Him in vain? Oh, thoughtless world! Oh, cruel denizens thereof! that one for need of sustenance or sympathy should perish from thy midst. Oh, gracious God and pitiful! that one should weary grow of life, yet live, and dyingly live on.

Alone, among a city full, almost more desolate than though living a hermit life apart from men, a youth wandered at night where the blaze of light cast a glamour over all visible things, and fluttered brightly and temptingly about the passages to unseen resorts. Pleasant and alluring they must be, for there was something mysterious and beckoning in every motion of the noiseless door; in every wave of fluttering light that wafted out like summoning hands; and many went in, but none seemed to come out. He had noticed that, and wondered where these avenues might lead to, and whether he best enter. He was not entirely ignorant of the folly and sin that might hold sway behind those smoothly-gliding doors. He had thought never to enter them; he had hoped to be a man, but the opportunity seemed lost. He had come to the city with the noble hope of a young, manly heart, to make his mark in the world, and repay with interest the debt he had necessarily put himself under. He was without friends, where all were hurrying and scrambling for themselves. He could strike no current that would flow upwards; he held himself from that, gliding swiftly downward, though it strove to encircle and bear him on, till the opposing forces twirled him round and round with bewildering power. But his strength was giving way. All the weary two months he had unwaveringly adhered to his purpose. No one anywhere needed help or wished a clerk. Every niche seemed full, every store had its complement of salesmen, every shop its full number of workmen, every express package its forwarder, every load of dirt, or stone, or coal its special trundler, every bundle and box its specific motive power. Where could he seek for work?

He would not heed the voice that bid him turn from the city. He was not willing to give up anything he had undertaken; besides, there was a spell of witchery about him such as city scenes extend over the youthful heart and unwary mind. It was a moment of indecision with the youth whether or not he should seek society in one of those enchanted places, when he was accosted by a young man with:—

"On the lookout for fun, stranger? If so, come in, and I will introduce you to something rich," placing a hand on his shoulder as he spoke, and partly forcing him toward the door.

The countenance of the stranger was pleasing, and his tones winning, and the youth yielded, as much perhaps to his own wishes for companionship as to the other's persuasions.

It was the first time he had ever stepped his foot over the threshold of such a place, but he felt the charm of the surroundings almost instantly. There were light, and music, and good cheer. Convivial glasses touched each other, and the clear wine sparkled pleasantly. Young men, whose carefully arranged dress, and easy grace of manners, and familiarity with the elegant appointments of the room, betokened the fact that in all things that go to make up the show and glitter, if not the solid happiness of this life, they had daily part; and our stranger felt a little glow of pride at being received as one of their number, and almost forgot his own anxiety in his desire to be considered an acquisition to the party. It is true he had glanced a little uneasily at the baize-covered table, and a vague thought of shame once or twice shot through his mind, and, but for the dazzle and fascination about him, he would have been shocked when he was asked to join the game where large sums of money must be lost or won.

He was sorely tempted; he was in such desperate need. He held a debt that must be paid; honor, and right, and all things good insisted that it must. If in playing he should win? He put his hand into his pocket almost ready to stake what he had left. But if he lost? Ah, well! It would be loss of money, character, reputation, and all. Something, he did not know what, held him back from the act. A backward thought over a space that memory constantly, and conscience tauntingly, bridged for him. Did the two spirits, so weak in themselves, and yearning so for help they could not grasp, each almost in the last surge of despair, meet that night, and in the contact grow strong, as counter waves rolling on toward each other with equal force and volume meet and mingle into perfect calm? Or, did the good angel who attends our steps lay on the arm one moment a detaining hand?

"Not now," he said to those who urged him. "I am unused to this; let me look on." And he sat down, seemingly absorbed in the progress of the game.

But it was not the game before his eyes that held his gaze. A deeper one was going on in his heart, the issues of which were less manifest. There was a wily mover there. The well-arranged board was disordered; the least prominent pieces took the foreground, and those to which he trusted most dropped out. From whence? To what? the question came. From truth and honor; to evil, maybe, and perhaps remorse. He looked around the room. Just as these young men were dropping, fair-faced and fresh most of them, and promising. Dropping out of homes and hearts from all over the city, leaving vacuums that could not be filled, hollows, agasp and sickening, where pain's strococo blew hot and fierce, and yet as empty as the wind. But he? The only hand he had a right to look to, and that should have held him, had opened purposely and dropped him out. Yes, he could fall and leave no unclosed wound.

The game progressed. The chances were desperate now; two pieces now disputant—right and wrong, good and evil. The game at the table was closing; should he play the next? Should he drop like the rest? He leaned his head on his hand in the struggle. Once in dire necessity a girl's fair hand had helped him. Were those her fingers now, almost phantom-like and shadowy in their beckoning? Were they losing the eagerness with which they had pressed the succor on him, and now half-listlessly motioned him toward the right, little recking if he took the wrong? He wavered. The subtle mover held his skilful hand upon the piece, kept his wary eye on the place he meant to occupy. One moment more!

"O George," the echo came, "for the sake of this hour, in which we have seen how much there is to be hoped for, how much to be shunned, be a brave, true man."

"I will, so help me, Heaven!" the answer came again, so loud it startled those around; and with one determined stride the youth reached the door, the outlet from his great temptation, and in the fresh, pure evening air, that swept Nettie Arnold's cheek with such dread premonition, he brushed his eyes free of the glamour that shaded them, and threw back the brown hair from his clear, broad brow, that yet held the signet of purity upon it.

Frederick Carrol, Carrie Davis' "bachelor uncle," was a man of wealth, and some of his superabundance was invested in the large business firm of Maxwell, Hanford, & Co. in the city. Mr. Carrol was the silent partner, and the day after the one in which the youth we have mentioned had so nearly fallen, he sat with Mr. Maxwell in the large and pleasant office. The day had well passed noon, and the conference of the gentlemen was over. Mr. Maxwell had turned to his memoranda, and Mr. Carrol had taken up a newspaper to read a paragraph that had caught his eye, when a clerk sought admittance for a stranger. It was granted, and he proved to be one of the numberless applicants that daily throng our stores and offices in search of employment.

"There is no vacancy, young man," replied the senior partner, rather impatiently, as the great need was urged.

The youth flushed and hesitated. All day long he had been the rounds, to be greeted by the same uncompromising answer. He must succeed, and he turned an appealing glance on the wealthy merchant; but he, used to such expressions, waved the applicant aside.

The beseeching eyes grew almost tearful, as he murmured, "Will no one save me from destruction?" and then the frank face clouded, and the hands clenched, as opening the door, he turned to say: "If I go down these stairs with my present feelings, I walk directly to perdition."

The two gentlemen were startled with the dreadful meaning of his words, and Mr. Carrol suggested that he should be called back and questioned.

"How is it you are seeking employment?" asked Mr. Maxwell, as the youth returned; "have you no home and no money?"

"I have a father in the country, and two hundred dollars in my pocket."

"Ha! ha! then your needs are not so desperate after all, and I advise you to go back to your father; the city is no place for young men out of work."

"I cannot go back; my father has thrown me on my own resources."

"For what reason?"

The young man flushed, and did not speak.

"Out with it, sir!" said the blunt old man; "anything you are ashamed of?"

"No, sir," throwing his head back a little proudly. "I was at school some distance from home; father had allowed me a small amount of spending money, that was to be furnished by the professor, and included in the bill for tuition. An exigency arose which called for some fifty dollars more. I wrote to father, but not receiving a reply in time, my preceptor willingly advanced the money, then wrote to my father in explanation. Father was very angry, refused to repay the loan or the year's bill, and recalled me. He says he did not get my letter. I acknowledged I was wrong in not waiting a reply, but he would not hear. I am his only child, but he turned me off without a cent;" and the youth covered his face a moment.

"How came you by the two hundred dollars you mentioned?" asked Mr. Maxwell, rather sternly.

"It was four hundred when I received it, sir. I am ashamed to say that I borrowed it of—of my sister."

"Ha!" said the old gentleman, frowning, "I thought you were the only child; your stories do not support themselves."

"She is worthy the name of sister, though she is not related to me; she is the step-daughter of my father's second wife, and only in the two short vacations I have been home since father married again, have I seen Nettie. I had no claim on her; she is a year older than I, and I know her help and counsel have at least delayed my ruin, and made me wish to be a man."

"Is this young lady rich?" pursued Mr. Maxwell, determined to get to the bottom of the matter.

"No, sir, she is a music teacher, and no doubt carefully saved the money she loaned me."

"She has a piano, then?"

"No, sir; she had one, but father sold it," said the youth, flushing again.

"Humph!" said Mr. Maxwell, glancing at Mr. Carrol, who was listening so intently that he had leaned forward, with an excited color playing over his face.

"Oh, sir, give me employment!" urged the youth; "the debt I hold to my tutor I must pay, and to my sister I shall return the money I have left, if with it I relinquish my last hope." Then, as if a sudden thought had struck him, he started up, and gasped: "Tell me, sir; would four hundred dollars buy a piano?"

"Yes, certainly, a very good one; do you wish to purchase?"

"Good Heaven! what a shameful brute I am," he exclaimed, the blood dyeing his fair face to crimson, as he paced excitedly up and down the room, shaking his head as if held by a hand he could not throw

"What is your name, young man?" asked Mr. Carrol, speaking for the first time.

"George Stanhope, sir, of R——, though I have scarcely spent a month there."

"How long have you been in the city?"

"A little over two months, sir."

"Tell me how you have spent your time."

And with a pathos and eloquence fired by his overwrought feelings, young Stanhope gave him a history of his hopes and failures. Of the temptations that had assailed him, and would have overcome him but for the thought of the girlish hand that seemed to hold him back, and he groaned aloud, as the truth forced itself upon him, that to supply a need his father had made obligatory she had toiled to save, what she afterward kindly sacrificed to that unmanly father's son.

Mr. Carrol could see the torture he was enduring as he forced himself through the recital; but he skillfully drew the thoughts to the surface while Mr. Maxwell silently looked on. When the questioning was over, he brought his fist heavily down on the desk:—

"Mr. Carrol," said he, "I'll make a place for this young man for that girl's sake; what say you?"

But Mr. Carrol did not say much, his thoughts were too deeply occupied in thinking of that young girl, and what he knew of the result of her sacrifice. But it was arranged, and the papers signed that should give young Stanhope a liberal salary as second bookkeeper for the firm.

"Now," said Mr. Carrol, after the young man had recovered his voice enough to express his thanks, "I am acquainted with Miss Arnold, whom you call your sister, and I know what you have said is true. I am going to R—— in an hour. If you wish to send a line to her, I will carry it. You will find pen and paper at the desk."

Stanhope bowed; he could not speak, and the two men watched him, as his pen flew over the paper. They could guess at the characters it formed, and by what it was prompted; and they smiled at each other as his face lighted up with noble beauty, and they divined that their names were receiving grateful mention.

Mr. Maxwell drew his hand across his eyes, and Carrol shaded his face a little, as the two hundred dollars were carefully folded and inclosed, and a boyish tear, half of shame, half of irrepressible feeling, fell upon it.

Nettie Arnold had cleared her scant table again; she had not the wherewithal to procure another meal. Her face had grown hard; she had decided. The next morning would find her at the factory. She could be as innocent there as anywhere; her fair fame was already tarnished; this overt act might corroborate the evil thoughts of her, but she was pure, and some time God would set the matter right. She scarcely heeded the knock that sounded at the door, she was locked within herself. But at last she arose and admitted the caller. It was Mr. Carrol, who, seeing the look of settled anguish on her face, immediately made his business known as the bearer of a letter from George Stanhope.

"Read it now, in my presence, if you please; I think I know its contents."

She obeyed, holding the paper near the window to catch the fading twilight, and the surges of joy that welled up into her heart, and spread over her face as she read on, nearly took away her breath, and, faint with joy and thankfulness, she slipped down upon her knees, and forgetful of all else, uttered her thanksgiving in words so trembling with emotion and fraught with tenderness, they were inaudible save to Him who bent His gracious ear to listen.

"I beg you will excuse me, sir," she said to her visitor, as she recovered a consciousness of her surroundings. "You cannot know what I have suffered."

"But I can conjecture in some slight degree," he said, bending his dark eyes upon her. "I overheard my sister that dark night, when she repeated those dreadful words to you, and I have seen how bravely you have borne up under the ungenerous suspicions that have hung over you. I did not believe you other than the pure angel I now find you to be, though I had no power to stay the current of public sentiment in regard to the matter, save by always treating you with that respect and esteem which every woman should inspire."

"O Mr. Carrol," said Nettie, extending a hand, which he clasped warmly, "yours was the only kind face I met. If it had not been for your hopeful smile and word, I should have died. Oh, how I have thanked you! how I thank you now;" her beautiful face upturned to him in its quiver of feeling and happiness.

"I am going to Mr. Stanhope now, Miss Nettie, and, if shame has a blush, his cheeks shall grow red as his heart is black. Your brave character, your noble self-denial, and stainless purity shall stand out in their fair proportions, and all who sought to malign, shall delight to praise you. I envy you this fair white hand, that it did not fear to reach into the miry clay and draw forth the victim that was in danger of sinking there; that did not shrink from thrusting itself into the flame to pluck from the burning, one brand the untoward world had heedlessly cast there."

Mr. Carrol fulfilled his promise, and many a tearful, repentant face was held for Nettie's forgiving kiss, and rough lips begged pardon for slighting words that had been allowed to pass them.

Nettie did not get her piano until after she became a bride, and Carrie Davis was nearly wild with delight when her "bachelor uncle" woke up to find that girls were sometimes something more than playthings, and sued for and obtained the gentle heart that had borne itself so bravely against the storm that had beat upon, and nearly overcome it.

Mr. and Mrs. Carrol now count among the number that go to make up the city full. No petitioning hand of friendless girl, or beseeching eye of homeless boy appeals to them in vain. Their sympathies are free and large, their hands are closed to none.

George Stanhope, having steadily risen in the favor of his employers, is now the junior partner of the great firm. His step is elastic and proud, his head erect, his eye clear with the light of a happy heart and an unstained life. Never a day passes that he does not seek Mrs. Carrol's home, and somehow he never can leave her without taking her hand, and though he seldom utters his thanks, there is something in his lingering touch that reminds her of the day when her slender fingers proved stronger than the cords of vice to him.

Nettie Carrol is happy in her home, and in the adoration of her husband, yet there lingers something in her face that speaks of days not always bright. I think we never entirely lose the shade heart-suffering has cast athwart our features. Yet, as in the material world, there are pleasant shadows; such as fall through the amber cloud, that for a time obscures the sun. ~~On that life~~ nestled eastward of the great rock over which the king of day has travelled; and yet, methinks, those that follow up the sun, and go creeping down the rock's western slope, and sweep toward the horizon, have in them a warmer tinge, like the subdued light, may be, that softly radiates from the star just rising, bearing likeness to the star of eternal hope.

Fathers! mothers! sisters! there are dropping, out of our homes, out of our lives, out of our hearts—young men—into the soil, and slime, and filth of this evil world! Hedge up the way; stretch out the hand; haste to the rescue; for there are shadows that envelop the sunlight and swallow up hope, going gloomily, greedily on till lost in the darkness that knows no morning. If there were no sunlight there could be no shadow; better that the home-shield should prove the shadow to stunt the growth, than that the young plant should shoot quickly above and from the roof-tree, to a premature ripeness and enforced decay.

Every morning hath its fresh altar, clean swept, with its wood prepared, its fire made ready. Perhaps it waiteth a sacrifice that shall result in salvation to some youthful heart, hovering, wavering, twixt right and wrong.

NARROWNESS of mind is often the cause of obstinacy; we do not easily believe beyond what we see.—La Rochefoucault.

REWARD a good servant well; and rather get quit of a bad one than disquiet thyself with him.—Fuller.

ACTING CHARADE.

FRENCHMAN.

BY M. S. S.

Characters.

CHARLES, a young student.

MRS. GLENN, his aunt.

AMELIA, her daughter.

SCENE I.—FRENCH.

SCENE.—A parlor; sofa, table, chairs. Enter AMELIA, in a morning costume, with a book in her hand.

Amelia. (Yawning.) Was ever girl's life more harassed, or brain more tormented than mine is by this tiresome study called French? I'll be the victim of mamma's ambition I'm sure, and drop off one of these days, and the verdict will be an overtasked head, a lesson to cruel, aspiring mothers. Mamma thinks I'm afflicted with what she calls an unrefined, disgraceful indisposition to intellectual improvement. And Aunt Prue (spiteful old thing!) accuses me of suffering from a disordered imagination and most unbecoming fancies on the shocking subject of beaux, love, and so on. As if (contemptuously) any girl in her senses ever listened to the croakings of an old maid in the sear and yellow leaf. Oh, dear! (Leans wearily back on the sofa.) Mamma might as well discard all hopes of making me a French scholar, for it is clear that whatever my mind does run on it is not French. Oh, me! oh, me! (Sighs.)

Enter CHARLES.

Charles. Dearest cousin, what troubles the fair Amelia? Frowns are foreign to her brow.

Amelia. O cousin Charles, 'tis this dull, tiresome French which upsets me so.

Charles. (Taking a seat by her on the sofa.) Let's see the difficulty, coz. (Reads.) Aimer, to love. (Aside.) A most auspicious circumstance. (Aloud.) My charming Amelia, call me a dolt if I do not lead you through the mazes of this interesting verb and—

Amelia. (Joyfully.) You are a dear, delightful cousin.

Charles. (Admiringly.) And you the most adorable, beautiful little girl in Charleston.

Amelia. (Smilingly.) Now, Charles, I—I declare you are—

Charles. (Kissing her hand.) The most infatuated adorer of cousin Amelia's charms.

Amelia. (Coquettishly.) How very tiresome and stupid you are to-day, Charles.

Charles. Well, cousin, a truce to nonsense, and I will endeavor to be more agreeable. And let us begin now to unravel this "inextricable tangle" in your brain. My name is not Charles Grey if I do not prove myself a capital teacher. Trust to your cousin, and your delicate comprehension will soon understand the whole state of my affect—Ahem!—of—of—the case. (They read together.) Now, cousin, repeat after me. J'aime—I love.

Amelia. (Repeats.) J'aime—I love.

Charles. (Very tenderly.) Je t'aime—I love thee.

Amelia. (As if very much astonished.) Why, Charles, that's not right.

Charles. (In astonishment.) What! not right? I assure you it is as true as the sun shines.

Amelia. (Affectedly.) How very foolish and ridiculous.

Charles. (Warmly.) Why, dearest, I really flattered myself that I was giving the most lucid of explanations, and agreeable of lessons. Now, cousin, you must learn by heart, and impress upon your memory this important fact, viz: Je vous aime—I love you. One point conceded, we'll go on to the next. (They read together aloud until they come to "nous aimons," when CHARLES falls upon his knees, and takes AMELIA'S hand.) Say, beloved Amelia, that nous aimons—we love. If I have not been presumptuous and mistaken, those flattering smiles, tender looks, and tell-tale blushes—do we not love, indeed?

Amelia. (Very much confused.) This is—is most improper, most unbecoming.

Charles. (Vehemently.) I will never rise until your sweet lips have confirmed my hopes by an entrancing yes, or blasted them by a cruel no! Say, Amelia, say!

Amelia. (Softly.) Yes, Charles.

Charles. (Rising gayly.) Truly, cousin? Don't you agree, dearest, that I am a capital teacher, and that French is a most agreeable study? I'm delighted and so elated by my success as instructor, that I am of the opinion I merit a richer reward than this cold pressure of the hand. (Attempts to kiss her, while she resists.)

Enter MRS. GLENN.

Mrs. Glenn. (With uplifted hands and eyes.) Charles! Amelia!

Charles. (Starting forward.) This—this is a—a—most unexpected pleasure, my dearest Aunt Harriet.

Mrs. Glenn. (Sarcastically.) And a most unwelcome intrusion. (To AMELIA.) Leave the room. (To CHARLES.) Well, sir? (Sternly.)

[Exit AMELIA.]

Charles. Dear aunt, you—you see I've been assisting Amelia in her French lesson. My aid has been most efficient, I assure you.

Mrs. Glenn. (Scornfully.) And the occupation of the most satisfactory nature, I presume. You will adjourn to the parlor, sir, where I will follow to learn the meaning of this most outrageous, ungentlemanly conduct.

[Exit CHARLES, bowing low.]

Mrs. Glenn. I see very well how matters are tending with those two simpletons. All efforts on my part to make Amelia an accomplished French scholar will be nipped in the bud, if I do not at once and resolutely put a veto on that sentimental popinjay's advances. Amelia has inherited all of her father's plebeian ideas about love. Love and marriage, indeed! Marriage and money has a more comfortable sound now. A mere boy, won't come into his inheritance for at least two years, and Amelia but fifteen. I'll stop it, I'll stop it! (With determination.) French and nothing but French is the order of the day in this house. [Exit.]

(Curtain falls.)

SCENE II.—MAN.

SCENE.—The same parlor. MRS. GLENN and CHARLES sitting at a little distance apart.

Mrs. Glenn. (Sneeringly.) I am prepared to hear what you have to say, sir.

Charles. (Boldly.) I'll just tell the truth, dear aunt, and say that I love Amelia.

Mrs. Glenn. (In great astonishment.) Love! Amelia! What next, young sir?

Charles. The fact is, dear madam, Amelia loves me.

Mrs. Glenn. (Indignantly.) You are a presumptuous coxcomb, sir! Both of you are in the incipient stages of insanity, and fit subjects for Bedlam. My daughter was an unsophisticated, obedient, studious girl until she became contaminated by your teachings, boy.

Charles. You astonish me, dearest aunt. My conduct has been throughout our intercourse most manly, my conversation marked by the utmost discretion and affection of which a man—

Mrs. Glenn. (Impatiently and sarcastically.) You a man, or act as a man! That presupposes the brains of one, sir, and the years of one. You a man! Ha! ha! The boy's conceit amuses me.

Charles. (Aside.) What in the fiend's name does the old harridan understand me to be? (Aloud.) Mrs. Glenn, I beg leave to say that your language is perfectly incomprehensible. If I am not a man at this moment, there will be no period in which I can arrive at that state of dignity. I stand six feet in my boots, an elevation few attain to. (Dramatically.) A generous, manly soul; a tender, loving spirit.

Mrs. Glenn. Cease your superfluous rhapsodies, boy.

Charles. Boys love as warmly and vehemently as men do. (Impatiently.) And my deluded aunt, what film or mist obscures your vision, that you persist in the absurd fol—the delusive fancy that I am no man?

Mrs. Glenn. (Rising.) No more of this. My will is as unchangeable as the law of the Medes and Persians.

Charles. (Earnestly.) But, beloved Aunt Harriet, you would not surely be so cruel as to blight two loving spirits by the "black frost" of a heartless, brutal separation? Oh, listen to my beseeching, and give Amelia to my arms!

Mrs. Glenn. Patience assist me. Hear this eighteen year-old stripling, with the slight suspicion of down upon his lip, a very Tyro in love, ha! ha! Two love-sick nonentities, with heads full of groves, and love, moonlight, and starlight. The maudlin sentiments of—

Charles. Stop, aunt, I will not suffer my heart and its sacred affections to be the football of your relentless sarcasm.

Mrs. Glenn. Enough, sir. You set not foot within the portals of this house until you are old enough.

Charles. (Aside.) To come into my property.

Mrs. Glenn. By years, and a corresponding improvement in mind and manners to merit the much desired appellation of man.

[Exit MRS. GLENN.]

Charles. Jupiter and Mars, what an old Jezebel! I'll blow up with indignation, like a balloon. To tell me to my very face that I'm not a man. Why, I've been a man, in my own estimation at least, and that's something, for the last five years. I believe I'll marry Sally Jones to spite her. But no, that would be most unmanly to thus break poor Amelia's heart. So I will set to work and outwit old Zantippe, and will prove myself a craven if I'm daunted by the raffery of a woman. Pshaw! the weaker, inferior creature. My precious auntie, you are pleased to call me a boy, but in less than a week I'll prove to you that I possess the brains of a man, if not the years of one. [Exit.]

[Curtain falls.]

FRENCHMAN.

SCENE III.—The same parlor. Enter MONSIEUR PERSIFLAGE.

Mons. Persiflage. Je suis sharmed zo see zo madame zis matin.

Mrs. Glenn. Take a seat, monsieur. I presume that you are the French teacher in answer to my advertisement?

Mons. Persiflage. (Bowing very low.) Monsieur Persiflage at votre service, ma chère madame.

Mrs. Glenn. (Aside.) There is quite a finish about his style, and such elegance in pronunciation. (Aloud.) You see, monsieur, it's my dearest wish to see my daughter an accomplished French scholar, and to that end it is absolutely necessary to place her under the superintendence of a Frenchman.

Mons. Persiflage. C'est ça, madame. One who is familair vis ze langue, and vrainment, ze education of ze female exige ze profundity and ze firmness of ze esprit masculin zo guide zem in ze manair comme il faut.

Mrs. Glenn. (Delightedly.) Monsieur, my own sentiments are completely in accordance with yours.

Mons. Persiflage. (Aside.) For the first time in our lives, then. (Aloud.) I'm enchapté zo hear ze madame say so.

Mrs. Glenn. We agree precisely on that point. In order that my daughter may be entirely devoted to her studies, I've debarred her all society until such time as with refined judgment and matured vision she may understand life as it is, and not see it with the eyes of fifteen, to whom everything seems—

Mons. Persiflage. Couleur de rose, madame, couleur de rose.

Mrs. Glenn. Exactly. Now, monsieur, it is with entire satisfaction that I yield my daughter's education to one like yourself, who has arrived at that dignified age which leaves youthful follies behind.

Mons. Persiflage. (Solemnly.) As you say, madame, ze society of ze young man is zo very—

Mrs. Glenn. Oh, very detrimental, indeed!

Mons. Persiflage. Ah, madame. (Sighs.) Ze storms of troubles and ze weight of care have changed zese locks.

Mrs. Glenn. (Sympathizingly.) That's the experience of us all, poor earth worms. Teaches experience, my friend, teaches experience.

Mons. Persiflage. Certainement, of course.

Enter AMELIA.

Mrs. Glenn. Here is my daughter. Amelia, Mons. Persiflage, a Frenchman of scientific attainments, and an instructor of no common merit.

Amelia. (Aside.) An odious, bewhiskered Frenchman, and old as the hills, too.

Mons. Persiflage. (Bowing.) I am from Paris, mademoiselle, where I took ze first honneur for ze Belle-lettres, and evaire since I have been devoted to the interests and enseignment of ze demoiselles.

Amelia. (Aside.) A conceited old acknapes!

Mrs. Glenn. I go to order lunch, in the meantime, Amelia, you can improve your acquaintance with your future instructor.

Exit MRS. GLENN.

Mons. Persiflage. (Goes up to AMELIA, and takes off his wig and moustache.)

Amelia. Charles! Is it possible! How could you be so rash? What will mamma say?

Charles. My dearest, she will know nothing of it until after luncheon, for I'm as hungry as a horse, having travelled twenty miles to-day. After I've partaken of the good cheer I'll make everything all right. Trust me, my darling; but here comes madame!

Enter MRS. GLENN, followed by a servant, bearing a tray of refreshments.

Amelia. (Aside.) I know I'll betray myself.

Mrs. Glenn. Will monsieur partake of some refreshments? (They all sit around the table.)

Mons. Persiflage. Madame is one vraie Lady Bountiful, and zis is one wondrous contree, where ze ladies (looking at AMELIA with admiration) is zo beautiful and ze productions zo bountiful. (To the ladies, and himself largely.)

Mrs. Glenn. (Aside.) Monsieur certainly appreciates the latter.

Mons. Persiflage. As I said, madame, zo teach and direct ze female mind was my forte, my strong point, ze sujet is vraiment charming, charming (glancing admiringly at AMELIA), who drops her handkerchief. (MONS. PERSIFLAGE drops on one knee to return it, and shyly kisses her hand, which MRS. GLENN perceives.)

Mrs. Glenn. (Stiffly.) Will Monsieur Persiflage resume his seat? Monsieur forgets himself!

Mons. Persiflage. Madame, I zee you not understand ze manaire Française, si demonstratif, si entusiastique is ze manaire Française, ha! ha!

Mrs. Glenn. (Aside.) I must keep my eyes on this demonstrative Frenchman, who has transgressed the rules of propriety by kissing Amelia's hand, and the rules of decency by eating like a gourmand. (The servant in adjusting something on the table, knocks off MONS. PERSIFLAGE'S wig.)

Mons. Persiflage. (Starting up.) Scelerat! Villain! (Aside.) Audacity befriend me, for the game is up now!

Mrs. Glenn. (Surprised.) Charles, what does this mean?

Charles. That I'm Mons. Persiflage, a Frenchman, teacher to Cousin Amelia, or plain Charles Grey, if you so desire it.

Mrs. Glenn. (Rising in great anger.) Leave my house, sir! this moment, sir! How dare you steal this thief's march upon two virtuous, unprotected women?

Charles. I'm sure, dear aunt, that I took a most legitimate course. You advertise for a Frenchman, I personate him to your entire satisfaction; for I think we agreed exactly, a few moments ago.

Mrs. Glenn. Leave my presence, sir! Your conduct has been scandalous. You have outraged every principle of decency and honor. I discard you henceforth from my house and heart. From my house, sir, which you have entered like a—a burglar, a vagabond, and from my heart, as I would uproot from my affection any iniquitous scion of my honored name.

Charles. Reflect, dear aunt, on your cruel words, which, at this time of affliction, leave a sting of untold bitterness. You are now the only near relative I have left to me in this world. Poor Uncle Tom Hilton died last week.

Mrs. Glenn. What! your father's brother dead?

Charles. Alas! it is too true; and, indeed, my trials are not over yet; for, to one of your superior wisdom, you will understand how embarrassing the management of his large estate will be to me. A mere boy. At my tender age!

Mrs. Glenn. (Laughing.) Don't speak of it, you rogue. You have acquitted yourself of the charge of a lack of brain, and must forgive and forget, my dear boy.

Charles. (Aside.) How tender she is. I always knew she had a substratum of softness in the granite of her heart, which I have touched at last.

Mrs. Glenn. (Delightedly.) My dearest nephew. What a glorious fortune!

Charles. A cool two thousand a year, besides my own fortune when I'm a man; and Hill-side farm, too.

Mrs. Glenn. Don't speak of it, you amusing scamp. As if I could ever refuse you anything for long. How you did act the part of Frenchman! You are a clever fellow, Charles. Ha! ha! ha!

Charles. (Modestly.) And you will give me the dear Amelia, aunt?

Mrs. Glenn. Most undoubtedly, dear boy, for you have acquitted yourself of a want of ability. To be sure you both are rather young, but that is a matter easily got over.

Charles. (Kissing her hand joyously.) Heaven bless you, beloved Aunt Harriette. You have made two hearts blest, and I begin to think that, with a few hints and a little sensible advice from yourself, I may really undertake my responsibilities, and if I play my part as husband as well as I have done that of Frenchman, do you think, dear folks, that Amelia need regret the venture?

GODEY'S COURSE OF LESSONS IN DRAWING.

LESSON X.

IN the sketch of an old oak, given in Fig. 33,

the weeds and small patch of foliage are kept in shadow, so as to support the tree. If these were kept light, the whole effect would be lost.

The moss-rose in Fig. 34 must be drawn in the same manner as the other flowers.

Fig. 35 is a scroll from the antique. In the first place, the outline must be carefully put in; the shading of the ground next done as flat and as even as possible; next, the details of the leaves; and, lastly, the shadows and the broken part round the whole.

The sketch in Fig. 36 is treated under a broad effect of light, the upper part relieved by the foliage in the background, the old fence on either side being kept dark. The pupil will do well to look out for an object in the fields similar to this, and sketch it from various points of view.

The mule sketched in Fig. 37 must be carefully outlined, then pencilled in a vigorous manner, so as to give the rough effect.

LINES.

(Affectionately inscribed to Mrs. T. R. BIGGS, near Milford, Ohio.)

BY JENNIE D. LANGDON.

In the hushed sweetness of that summer evening
The heavenly music thrilled upon her ear,
As she lay drifting far from our caressing
Without a single fear.

Pure as a flower, her life was gently closing
As some fair blossom fades,
So sweetly calm, we knew not she was dying
When fell the twilight shades.

But to her purer eyes the pearly portals
Of heaven were open wide;
Its shining ones were waiting to receive her
To waft her o'er the tide.

"I'm dying now, mamma, I hear the angels,"
Murmured our precious one, so briefly lent.
Now in their song around the Throne Eternal
Her own sweet voice is blent.

MY VALISE AND I.

BY EDGAR WAYNE.

I.

THEY all said it was nonsense; mother, and uncle, and all, all but Celia. She never at that time condemned any project of mine in any such harsh and impolite terms. What she may take license to do hereafter in our new relations to each other will be as she pleases, and I cannot help myself.

Besides, there was a quiz of a fellow, Jack Curtis, who had been everywhere, including New York and Philadelphia, and had made a trip down the Mississippi to New Orleans. And he could talk like a book, and romance like a traveller—yea, even like that prince of romancers, a commercial traveller—about all the things, the persons, and the places he had seen, and a great many that he had not. But I, poor I, knew nothing but Boston, and Nahant, and a few leading places in New England. I had tried Mount Desert, but Jack told me that was nothing to the Balize. I don't think the lobster packing place is much like the mouth of the Mississippi. Jack flanked Bangor with St. Augustine, and capped the White Mountains with the Alleghanies. Produce whatever I would, he went "one better," and threw me constantly into the shade with "I've seen, and sure I ought to know." Celia and I found some satisfaction in deciding between ourselves that he was only a travelled donkey. But still the facts remained that Jack had travelled, and I had not. The woman who loves does not like to see her lover placed at any disadvantage.

So, Celia abetting me, I resolved that I would spend my summer vacation in travel. I was not quite equal to undertaking a voyage to Europe; time and money were too limited for that. And Celia and I agreed that some such flight should be reserved for our wedding tour. I would "do" New York and Philadelphia—

"Take heed, young man," said Jack Curtis, "that you do not get done."

I scorned to notice the interruption—Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Detroit, Buffalo, and Niagara, and come home by the way of the Lakes, the St. Lawrence, and Montreal. My uncle insisted that I should also have an eye to business. I did not like that. I desired to "sink the tailor," and be purely a gentleman travelling for pleasure. The most that Jack Curtis could boast was that he had travelled on business. But I could not hold that course of reasoning with my uncle, whose old mercantile ideas of the honor of travelling were quite the other way. He was not ashamed of business, and I did not quite dare to let him perceive that I was. He sugar-coated the pill with the promise of a double commission on all my negotiations. Besides, the correspondents of our house, to whom I had letters, would stand to me in the light of hosts and entertainers. And I farther comforted myself with the fact noted in my hitherto limited experience, that customers who want "extension" are always readiest in the "extension of hospitalities." There are compensations in this world even for commercial travellers.

Mr. Punch, celebrated for wisdom, gives minute instructions how to pack a gentleman's valise. It is no inconsiderable art, let me tell you. Wives are supposed to pack their husbands', and not a few, after the honeymoon is over, are only too glad to send their gentlemen packing. But I am—I mean I was—a bachelor at the eventful time when my valise was packed on its memorable journey. I would not trust my mother to do it. She would be sure to put my cigars—you cannot depend upon hotel cigars—where my razor would infallibly immolate them. And, failing in that mischief, she would have been too eloquent upon smoke. It is not wise to permit the ladies of your household—mother, sisters, or wife, to see more than two or three of the weeds at a time. A larger number provokes arithmetical calculations. So I packed my valise up to a certain point according to Mr. Punch's directions. Everything was carefully "repositied," as Doctor Johnson has it, in its precise place and compartment. So far from Punch. But I did not follow his last direction, which is, when your carpet-bag is full to take your spare boots, and cram them in with your heel.

Off, then, we started, my valise and I. "Going to Squam for a day?" asked my inveterate foe, Jack Curtis, whom I met on the way to the early train. I did not vouchsafe a reply, but walked past Celia's house, who, as per agreement, was at the window to wave her adieux. She was on her knees; her face clad in smiles, and her body, I guess, in her robe de nuit, for she did not rise as I passed, or even expose her arm when she kissed her hand to me. I had eaten but a scanty breakfast, which was wise; but had gone out of the way to feast on Celia's smiles, which was not, as thereby I came near losing the train.

Jack Curtis, who was comfortably seated, having reached the station by the shortest cut, smiled intelligent sarcasm at me as I came puffing in. I knew what the scamp meant, but did not give him a chance to put his meaning in words by making any remarks. I gave myself to silent contemplation of my Celia, and also to the mental enumeration of the contents of my valise. All young travellers do that. The contents of the trunklet (there's a new word for Webster's next edition) need not be specified. They may appear in the course of my narrative. I need only observe that they were as valuable to me as a Wall Street broker's tin box is to him. It must be conceded, however, that, as to most of the articles, their chief value was to the owner thereof, as I had occasion afterward pathetically to remark in an advertisement.

Jack Curtis took an affectionate leave of me in Boston, the end of his daily journey, as it was usually of mine. The rascal! I could have bitten his nose off. For he whispered in my ear, while tears seemed to stand in his eyes, and his voice trembled with emotion, "My dear fellow, don't let any creature eat you."

The villain! to intimate that I was verdant.

I like travelling, especially do I like railroad travelling. A man who is not too much absorbed in himself to care for other people may make so many delightful acquaintances—the amusement of an hour with no troublesome claims on your attention afterward. It is pleasant to talk of yourself and your plans. Be thus confiding to a brother whom you meet every day, and he may utterly supplant you. Confessions in a railroad car are like confessions to the moon or to the sea; and they are unlike such confessions, too, because you secure an equivalent in talk, whereas all the poets say the moon is a silent moon, and all the noise of the water reported phonographically is still deficient in ideas. For these reasons it is, I suppose, that the tongues of the passengers emulate the speed of the locomotive, except when husbands and wives are travelling together. They can always have talk enough at home, and sometimes too much.

I was very much attracted by a gentleman who was going all the way to Philadelphia. He claimed to be a denizen of that rectangular city, and I have no doubt he was, for he could not sufficiently express his contempt for New York and all its belongings. Upon the dangers which travellers encounter there he was especially eloquent. I concluded to improve so delightful an opportunity as this new acquaintance opened, to "do" Philadelphia first, and take New York on another journey. My new friend had some pressing engagements which would detain him in Third Street, and with delightful frankness informed me that it was necessary for him at once to divest himself of his responsibilities. He would not like everybody in the train to know his business, he said, and I fully believe now that he told the truth when he said that. But he would join me at the Continental Hotel, and show me the capacities of such a restaurant there as no hotel in Europe could excel. I knew nothing about Europe, and had a new respect for a gentleman who had that experience.

We safely reached the City of Brotherly Love, my valise and I. Throughout the land the common impression is, like that of my ingenuous fellow-traveller, of whom I lost sight on the ferry boat, that New York excels in roguery as well as in all the other charms of a great city. My experience has shown me that there are knaves outside of that ambitious metropolis, and pretty adroit knaves too. I put my valise down—oh, woful me!—in what I deemed a safe place. I don't know how many times I could have said "Jack Robinson" before I returned in the full faith of resuming my cherished and only item of baggage. The name of that mythical personage, Mr. Robinson, did not occur to me, and, of course, I did not repeat it. But, when I came and looked for my treasure, my vade mecum, it was not there.

Plenty of people saw the man who took it. A colored porter said he "cotched it up just permiscuously as if it was his own." The gentleman from Africa tendered his services to "tote" it, but the obliging lifter declined the proffered assistance with some abruptness. I made instant and earnest inquiries regarding his appearance. He was accurately described by the bystanders as neither short nor tall, of no particular height; neither dark nor fair, of no noticeable hue; with eyes that might have been blue, or black, or hazel; with a kind of a slouched hat, and a sort of a light travelling coat, and pantaloons of a neutral tint; with either boots, or brogans, or shoes, or gaiters. I was trying to make out a description for the newspapers, when a policeman suggested:—

"No use. Them sort of travellers don't wear the same togs two days—no, not two hours together. They change as often as a bang-up young lady at Cape May."

I called on the detective police, and was very politely treated. They made an entry in a register; but, while they were making their entry, my reliever was making off, and I was left lamenting. I did write an advertisement, and, if the valise had contained matters of any great negotiable value, I might have offered "handsome inducements." But the par price of "memory's treasures" and the "wealth of associations" do not warrant any extravagant outlay in the recovery. So I wrote a modest advertisement, and when I took it to the office discovered that somebody had relieved me of my purse also. "Here was a pretty time of day," I said, and, apropos to the exclamation, felt for my hunting-case Waltham watch. That was gone too. I went to the Continental and registered my name.

"Baggage?" inquired the clerk.

Alas! for my valise, my warrant of respectability, my pledge of capacity to pay. I had no such voucher. I waited confidently for my friend of the railroad to make me all right on the hotel record. But, alas! my confidence was confidence misplaced. I ventured to tell my story to the clerk. He politely informed me that if I waited till that gentleman arrived, I had better class myself among the permanent boarders in the establishment.

I withdrew to a chair in the parlor, and sat down to think. And whom do you suppose I thought of? "Celia, of course," you answer.

Yes, some; but I thought a vast deal more of that dreadful Jack Curtis and his ominous warning.

II.

I WALKED out into Chestnut Street. I found a friend whom I had never seen before, nor have I seen him since, but we have corresponded, and he has received back the advance he made to me with many thanks. And we are now literally as well as emblematically "on the square."

Under different and more auspicious circumstances I have since found Philadelphia a very pleasant place. But then I would not have stayed in the city for all of Stephen Girard's old boots, which are carefully stored away in the marble buildings of the college, and where no clergyman is permitted to enter the place and look at under any pretence. I repaired to the hotel office with mens conscia recti, and a pocket conscious of greenbacks, paid my reckoning in advance, and secured a railroad ticket in the earliest train. Then, having fortified and lubricated the inner man, I consoled myself with the reflection that things might have been worse, which is a pleasant thing to consider, you know, and full of consolation. To be sure those elegant neckties which Celia embroidered for me, and various other much considered trifles, were gone forever and forever. And uncle's letters of introduction—they too were lost, and they had cost the old gentleman so much trouble. But why would he persist in forcing them upon me?

I made no stay in New York, but booked myself through to Boston. Right glad was I to be again in sight of the "hub." But I did not tarry there. My vacation had still three weeks to run, and I had nothing to say to my uncle which required haste or of which I was particularly proud. And when I was safe at home again, and had survived the ordeal of all the gentle questionings, the "how could you be so careless?" of my mamma, the indignant comments of my Celia (indignant on the thief, but hurting me somewhat in the recoil), and the mock commiseration of my bete noir, Jack Curtis; when I say I had survived all this, and replaced my fancy meerschaum, there came such a renewal of my vexations as mortal man never could have anticipated.

My name is—well, say Norval. That will do as well for the country which confesses the three mounts for its capital as for the Graupian Hills. I called one evening upon my Celia, and was made to look as sheepish as any of old Norval's flock. Celia was pouting. Now that was not quite a surprise, for I had on previous occasions observed a tendency in her lips to aggravate themselves into a tumorous and protuberant development. But it was not a symptom any the more pleasant for all that. Repetition does not make all things tolerable. My dear young ladies, young Norval begs you to make a note of that sage remark when you are tempted to repeat tears and frowns. Once in a while they will answer their end, but not too often. Men's hearts are hammered hard by too frequent showers of tears, and their faces become set as a flint when their loves petrify them too often with frowns.

But, as the French say, Celia had reason. The village newspaper had in its "poet's corner" a sonnet to Celia's eyes. It was supposed that Celia had, in the casket in which she keeps her jewels, the only copy in existence, of the sonnet, the author's excepted. The author's copy, alas! was in that valise. The wretched thief, whoever he was, in the refinement of unprovoked malice, had sent it to some newspaper. To trace it to its first appearance was impossible. For when an estray of that kind once gets afloat, it soon loses all marks of its origin. You might as well try to ascertain from a chip, drifting in the dock, at what place it started.

This trouble was soon surmounted. Celia was only too glad that they could not also print in the newspapers the lock of her hair which was wrapped up in the sonnet. We decided to keep our own counsel; and as the poet's corner in a newspaper is the last thing read, and the first forgotten, and as Jack Curtis—whose turn is not for poetry, did not chance to discover the sonnet, we might soon have forgotten this contretemps, even if worse had not happened.

But my mother received, one morning, from her brother, my uncle, a note, the contents of which were sufficiently stunning. It read:—

"When your graceless son returns from his wild excursion, if he thinks that he has accomplished enough in the way of abusing my confidence, and disgracing his family, tell him to condescend to come at once to me, that we may examine accounts, and close a connection which I can no longer endure."

This was an astonishment. I certainly ought to have called upon the old gentleman before, having been home full three weeks. It was not very respectful. But I had had no desire to meet anybody unexpectedly, or to account to more persons than I could help for my sudden return. No doubt Jack Curtis had told all our fellows in Boston of my mishap; and it had come to uncle's ears, with notes and glosses, and emendations. But I could not think that so simple a thing as losing a valise was really so "wild" and "disgraceful." Neither was the theft the abuse of anybody's "confidence," except my own. I was willing to confess to carelessness—but, "disgrace?" Nonsense. I would confound the old gentleman with the air and words of injured innocence.

When I entered the little glass box in which I had often received advice and admonition, uncle rose, as I thought to welcome me. I had my hand ready, but he did not offer his. He opened a drawer and produced a western newspaper. Without saying so much as "good-morning," he pointed me to a paragraph under the head of "Amusements :"—

"The 'First Appearance on any Stage,' at the Congo Opera House, night before last, was a tremendous success. The young gentleman from the Eastern States who made his débüt, demonstrated that high art!"—

And so on, through all the rest of it, for which see the newspapers everywhere. But in another part of the paper, under the head of "Latest Locals," there was quite a sensation paragraph. The young gentleman who was to have made his second appearance, did not appear, much to the disappointment of the public, more to the disappointment of his landlord, and most to the chagrin of sundry "patrons of the drama," who held his "I O U's." He had decamped from his hotel, sure of the remembrance, kind or otherwise, but rather otherwise, of his host and fellow boarders. He had left his valise behind; and though, on opening, it proved to be full of paving-stones, they were not of such current value as is expressed in the western phrase, "a pocket full of rocks." Nevertheless there was found something to reward the search. The supposed real name of the adventurer was discovered by a tender letter addressed to him in a lady's hand, and signed "Celia." (Oh, murder!) And the address of the letter was found to correspond with the remains of an inscription on a brass plate, which had been partially obliterated. That name the editor kindly suppressed, out of regard to the feelings of a merchant prince, etc. etc. [N.B. The newspaper inclosed a circular with terms of paper and advertising, and assertions setting forth that the said journal circulated more extensively than all the other newspapers on the continent combined.]

The landlord was not so magnanimous. From him my respected uncle received a letter with a demand for board and "extras," the latter item including spoons, trinkets, and other light articles, the disappearance of which was simultaneous with that of the aforesaid negro minstrel. And the epistle concluded with a request for prompt payment, and a threat of exposure in default thereof.

"Well?" said my respected relative, after I had perused the documents.

I told my story.

"Careless," said my uncle, "con-found-ed care-less! I don't wonder you slunk home to your mother. Don't let Delia or Delilah!"—

"Celia," I interposed, vexed, but half laughing.

"Don't let Celia hear of her letter in the hands of the newspaper reporters, or she will turn Delilah and remove your hair without shears. I told you that you had better stay at home." And the verification of the soundness of his advice removed all his displeasure. Such is human nature. Let events indorse anybody's "I told you so," and his or her anger is removed at once. I had to write a letter explanatory, the old gentleman added a line of indorsement; and the newspaper was furnished notes for such an article of romantic intelligence, served up with rhetorical ornaments and reportorial flourishes, as it had not indulged in before for many a day. Of course uncle "subscribed," and forwarded an advertisement. Never was there one which told better. But this is running before my story.

I resumed my work forthwith. Uncle thought I had taken vacation enough. And so did I. But little did I guess what profitable work the next day was to bring me.

There came a telegraph stating that certain bales of cotton had been negotiated for, to be delivered at Cincinnati. A draft on Norval & Co., drawn by Norval, Jr., was offered in payment. "Would it be honored?"

"Telegraph no!" said my uncle, in a fury. "This scoundrel has got our signature, and will play the deuce with us!"

"Cotton is up, and going up," said I. "Suppose I telegraph 'yes,' and order it shipped to New York instead of Cincinnati?"

"Good again," said my uncle. "You are not quite a fool. And you shall have the profits for your cleverness."

It is not necessary to detail all that the newspapers brought us; or to mention the half of the notoriety which my poor name obtained through the proceedings of the rogue who had made such use of the contents of my valise. Fortunately there was but one of Celia's letters among the papers, and I telegraphed for that, secured and burned it; a process which I recommend henceforth to all lovers who are not ambitious of notoriety.

In due course of mail came the bill of lading for my cotton. In the letter inclosing it the factor stated that the young gentleman was quite indignant at the change of destination.

"You must go to New York and meet that consignment yourself," said my uncle.

And so I did. Jack Curtis was in the same train, which I did not regret, as I wished to show him that once a fool is not always a fool. We walked together upon our several errands. Just as we entered the consignee's office a man slipped out, whom I thought I had seen before. I followed to the street, and called after him. But he did not hear, and I lost sight of him.

"Mr. Norval!" said the consignee, opening my letter. "Why, there has been a party here already about that cotton. I think he said his name was Norval."

"Indeed!" I answered. "There must be some mistake."

I was just in time. As I turned the matter in my mind, I was convinced that the retreating party was no other than my travelling companion. I talked it over with Curtis in the evening. "Not a doubt of it," he said. "O Norval, but you were precious green! I would like to see the man who can rob me!"

He saw that man sooner than he desired. We went out after dinner. I felt safe with Curtis, and he felt safe under all circumstances. There was what the New York boys call a "muss." He rushed in; while I would have kept him out. It was nothing but a dog in a fit; and as we backed out of the crowd, Curtis gave tongue:—

"Stop thief!"

I throttled the man who stood next to me. I was all unmindful of his handsome "getting up." For I had learned that fashionable costumes do not necessarily imply that honest men are in them. The fellow struggled away from me, but left part of his outfit in my hand. He stayed for no questions, and did not even remonstrate on my rough treatment. Jack Curtis was minus his pocket-book and watch. Of course we did not catch the thief, though there was a run, and a hue and cry. I was pretty sure that the felon was the last in the race, and that he called "stop thief!" with more energy than all the others. There was nothing for us but to go back to our hotel. "Will you lodge information with the police?" I asked.

"Bother the police!" answered Curtis. "If you have not newspaper notoriety enough, in that direction, I do not want any. When I lost my watch before"—

"Oh, ho!" said I.

He had made a careless admission. And it was now my turn to be sarcastic. He endured roasting for a few moments, and then broke out:—

"Say, Norval! I don't deserve any favors of you, I know. But if you will keep dark on this, I never will tease you again."

We struck hands on that. And then he admitted me into his confidence, relating divers mishaps, of a similar nature to that in my one great experience. While I was listening to his narrative, my hand found its way to my pocket to be sure that I too had not lost something in the late encounter. I felt an unexpected deposit; and drew forth—one of Celia's neckties, which I had pulled from the neck of the thief, pocketed and forgotten. Jack and I had then been the victims of the same rogue, or gang of rogues. First we—well, no matter what we said. It was not complimentary, at any rate.

I realized on my cotton, just as the market was on the turn; and, for once, a forged draft was converted to the benefit of quite another person than the one intended by the forger.

Jack was as good as his word, and better—not only never insinuating jokes at my expense, but pronouncing me, in all companies, one of the keenest business men he had ever met. I do think, myself, that cotton operation was a good one. It furnished the money for the first and heaviest payment on my new house in Boston. And uncle soon after took me into his firm.

We were married in due time, Celia and I. Uncle at the wedding was mysteriously witty on careless correspondents, but we let him enjoy his own fun. I had before that taken good care that nobody else should surprise my bride with the story of her letter and the newspaper comments thereon. So uncle was anticipated. If you don't want secrets betrayed to the wrong person, the best way is to take that person into the mystery yourself.

And now for the last circumstance in this history of my valise and I. In consideration of the loss the Western landlord had sustained through my carelessness, I commissioned the editor of the Western Hemisphere to pay the board bill, rejecting the claim for spoons. And as a memento of my adventure, I desired him to forward that valise by express. He filled the vacuum, which the abstraction of my personals had caused, with "exchanges" of late date, that is to say newspapers, an article on which the true editor places the highest value. In one of these, printed in an out-of-the-way corner of the world, I read:—

"The outraged sentiments of this community found vent upon two horse thieves last night. They had escaped from jail, where they were awaiting trial, but it was an escape from a long trial to a short shrift. The citizens recaptured them, and hung them for safe keeping to the boughs of a tree. The sheriff regained possession of the prisoners after some parley with their captors. But it is scarcely necessary to add that it was not until all danger of their running away again was effectually stopped.

"One of the outlaws was a coarse wretch who commanded no commiseration. The other had evidently been the object of higher hopes and aspirations than thus to perish by the spontaneous and summary, though just indignation of our citizens. His clothing, though tattered, showed the former care of affection, and we could almost have wept for her whose delicate fingers pencilled 'Norval' on his linen with indelible ink."

This "pathos and bathos delightful to see" moved my risibles, even though it were a hanging matter. It is remarkable how quietly the "independent press" can speak of murder, while the tree still stands on which the subjects of it were suspended. Well, I certainly did not desire that the rogue should have been hanged because he took my valise. But, since he was hanged, it was only justice that he should swing in one of my stolen shirts.

Here endeth the chronicle of my valise.

THE human heart is often the victim of the sensations of the moment; success intoxicates it to presumption, but disappointment dejects and terrifies it.—Folney.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

FICHU FOR THE HEAD OR NECK (CROCHET).

Materials.—Two colors are required, or one color and white, in Pyrenees wool, and half an ounce of each color in Andalusian; No. 12 crochet hook.

If worn on the head, it should be so folded that the fichu is 3 doubles in the centre, with a small point formed by the corner on each side; the other corners then hang down in the shape of lappets. It is placed on the head in the same manner as the little morning caps so much in vogue. It can be used square, as a neckhandkerchief, and we recommend the stitch most strongly, working in elder yarn or Shetland wool for a shawl.

(this is to form the increase for the corner), 7 ch, 1 dc in the 4th ch of 4th lp, 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th ch of 5th lp, 7 ch, 1 dc in same ch as the last dc, 7 ch 1 dc in 4th ch of 6th loop, 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th ch of 7th loop. Work another loop of 7 and dc in the same chain as last dc, 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th ch of 8th loop, 7 ch, 1 dc in the 4th single at the commencement of the round, 7 ch, 1 dc in same loop again.

Continue the work in this manner, always increasing each round on the corner loops by making an extra loop. Work 15 more rounds in gold.

17th. Join the dark shade, and work 4 rounds.

21st. Join the gold; work 2 rounds.

The pattern is worked in gold and maroon; 2 skeins of gold, 1 of maroon.

Make a chain of 12, unite (with gold), 7 chain or ch, 1 plain or double crochet dc in first of the 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in the 3d of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 6th of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 7th of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 9th of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 10th of 12 ch, 7 ch, 1 dc in 12th of 12 ch.

2d round. Work 4 single crochet on the 1st 4 ch of the first loop of 7, then 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th ch of 2d lp of 7, 7 ch, 1 dc in 4th ch in next lp of 7, 7 ch, 1 dc in the same chain as the last dc

23d. Join the dark shade, and work 4 rounds.

27th. Join the gold and work 2 rounds. Fasten off neatly.

THE FRINGE.—Take 6 very long lengths of both shades of Andalusian wool, 5 or 6 yards each length. Fasten the ends together. Wind off on a ball one longer length of the dark color. Tie the 12 lengths together tightly with this ball, without cutting the wool on the ball every half inch. Leave the wool rather easy between each tie; then there will be no fear of cutting the wrong thread. When the whole length is tied cut across the 12 threads, exactly in the middle of the distance between each tie, leaving little fluffy knots on the thread that tied them together. To mount the fringe on the fichu tie the connecting thread with the same colored wool into the middle of a loop of 7. Miss 8 tufts of fringe, tie again just under the 9th tuft in the 4th loop of 7 from the last. Tie all round in this manner. A second row is put on in exactly the same manner, but must be tied to the 2d of the 3 loops left between the connecting links in the 1st row of fringe. The wool sewn over is cut between each tie.

KNEE CAP.

Materials.—One ounce and a half of fine white knitting wool, four steel knitting needles No. 14, bell gauge.

CAST on 112 stitches on three needles, knit 2 and purl 2 alternately, so as to rib it, for 47 rows. With the 48th row begins middle piece or knee cap, which throughout is worked in back and forward going rows of purl 4, knit 4. To form little squares, begin the first of the first four rows with purl 4, knit 4, the first of the second four rows with knit 4, purl 4, and so on, changing the commencement of the first of stitches is reduced to 12. Then pick up 29 stitches on each side, which completes the original number of 112, and work 47 rows all round, knitting 2 and purling 2 alternately, as before, which, practically, finishes the knee warmer. A pink or blue border in crochet work will add greatly to its appearance.

BLOTTING-BOOK COVER.

THIS blotting-book cover is worked on black cloth, with cloth patterns of different colors sewn on in appliqué. The small circle in the centre is of red cloth, with green knotted stitch in the centre, and rays formed of long black stitches. On the oval, pattern of white cloth, edged with blue coral stitch, work four flowers, the two longest of which are of yellow cloth, edged with garnet-colored Mexico stitch; the veining in the centre is worked with chain stitch in black silk, between two other blue veinings; the two smaller flowers are of blue cloth, edged with yellow Mexico stitch, with veinings in chain stitch worked with red and white silk. After the white oval pattern, cut out a large piece of red cloth, embroidered with 4 stars in railway stitch, black silk and yellow knotted every 4 rows. Now let off 12 stitches of the last knitted row on a needle, knit on them the first row of the middle piece, and at the end of every following row the nearest of the stitches which are remaining on the other needles, so that the number of stitches of the middle piece is augmented by one at every needle or row. Do this till only 42 stitches of the ribbed part remain. Now knit the middle piece as before, but take off one stitch at the beginning as well as at the end of every row till the number of stitch in the centre, and four branches worked in the same manner with green silk. On the edge of the red cloth work yellow herring-bone stitch; close to this, on the black cloth, work a row of herring-bone stitch with lighter yellow silk, and then a third row with white silk. The branches on the black ground are wood-colored between two green shades, and another shade of wood-color between two blue ones. The corner patterns are cut out in red cloth, edged with green Mexico stitch; the veinings in coral stitch are worked with different shades of yellow, the lightest shades in the middle. The branches are blue, in coral stitch, on the black ground. For the border, the lines which form the frame are worked in chain stitch with red silk. Inside these lines work dark green herring-bone stitch, then a light green row with long white stitch. Between the lines work diamonds in long stitch, blue on one side and yellow on the other, with crosses alternately green and red. The cloth remains without embroidery on the other side of the blotting-book, which must be lined with watered-silk paper; leaves of blotting-paper are fastened in the centre.

MUFF CROCHETED IN IMITATION OF FUR.

THE following articles crocheted in imitation of fur are recommended for the warm winter toilets of young girls, as they are not expensive.

With a fine bone hook, No. 12 Bell gauge, and the gray wool, single Berlin (of which you require six ounces), make a chain of 78 stitches.

1st row. Dc (double crochet), at the end 1 ch. 2d. 1 dc in the first dc, taking up the back of the loop, which is done throughout the work, take up the back of the 2d loop, draw the wool through, pass the wool round the needle, take up the same loop again, making 3 loops on the needle in this one stitch, draw the wool through these 3, then through the 2 on the needle; take up the whole of this row in this manner. 3d. Plain dc worked from the back of the loop as before. Repeat the 2d and 3d row. Work a piece wide enough for your muff, then make it up; for this you require blue silk in the piece, two pair of black tassels, some blue ribbon to run in the runner, and a sheet of wadding. Lay your wadding the size of the piece of crochet you have worked, cover it on both sides with silk, then sew together; make a slot at each outer edge, sew up the piece of crochet, place it over the silk, run the edges of the crochet to the extreme edge of the slot, then pass your ribbon in; add the tassels by the join.

THE BOA.

This is also crocheted in the same stitch as the muff. You require five steel knitting needles, No. 12, for the head as it is knitted, 2 jet buttons for the eyes. For the length of the body make a chain of 117 stitches. Commence with a row of double crochet, then a row of pattern, always working a ch stitch at the end of each row. Work about 8 inches of this crochet for the width of the body. Sew it together, and stuff it with wadding covered with silk. The tail is worked separately, and is crocheted in looped crochet. Make a ch of 20. 1st row. Dc. 2d. Take up the back of the loop, pass the wool three times round a mesh one and a quarter inch wide, or your 2 fingers of the left hand, put the needle under these loops, loop the wool over, then take up the st again, draw through, and draw through the 2 on the needle; work the row in this manner. Work these 2 rows until you have ten rows of loops; then work 2 more rows, decreasing one stitch on each side row, cut the loops in the middle and comb them with a fine comb. Sew the tail together, then to the body.

The Head is Knitted.—Cast on 10 stitches on each of the 4 needles; knit a round. Then 3 rounds knit plain. 4th. Knit 17. You now commence the increase for the forehead. In the 18th st work 2 st thus: knit 1, then purl 1; work the 19th st in the same manner; 20th st, knit plain; the 21st and 22d st like the 18th and 19th; the rest knit plain. 5th. Knit plain. 6th. Increase like the 4th round in the 2 st on both sides the 22d st. 7th. Plain. 8th. Increase like the 4th round on both sides the 24th st; rest plain. 6 plain rounds. 14th. K 7, k 2 together; k 1, knit 2 together; knit plain until the last 12; then k 2 together, k 1, k 2 together. 15th. Plain. 16th. K 5, knit 2 together 3 times; knit plain until the last 11, when knit 2 together 3 times; knit 5. 17th. Like 14th. 18th and 3 next rounds plain. 21st. K 5, knit 2 together twice, knit plain until the last 9, then knit 2 together twice, knit 5. 22d. Plain. 23d. K 7, join the black, knit 2 together in black until the last 7, which knit plain in gray. Knit 8 rounds plain, knitting the black stitches with black, and the gray with gray: cast off. Wad the head to the shape, stitch on the buttons for the eyes, add some shreds of black wool for whiskers, then stitch on the ears, the directions for knitting which follow.

The Ears.—Cast 12 st on 1 needle with gray wool. Knit back. 2d row. Purl. 3d. Knit 2 together, knit 8, knit 2 together. 4th. Purl 2 together, purl all but the last 2, which purl together. Repeat the 3d and 4th rows until you have only one stitch left, then cast off, and sew to the head.

THE CUFFS.

You work the cuffs in the same manner as the body of the animal and the muff. Make a chain of 30 st. This is for the height of the cuff. Work as the muff, until you have enough to pass over the hand. Make a lining of white quilted silk over wadding; sew neatly to the edges of the crochet, make a runner at the top of the cuff, in which you draw through a ribbon to tie it to the shape of the hand.

Fig. 3.

JEWEL-STAND OF CRYSTAL BEADS.

Materials.—Large crystal beads, large cut crystal beads, round beads, and eight round crystal buttons, some fine and coarse silver wire, white knitting cotton.

THIS pretty stand is made of crystal beads and wire. First make the frame in the following manner: Take two circles of silver wire, one of which must be eight inches and three-quarters round, and the other eight inches; the ends must overlap each other about two-fifths of an inch, and be fastened tightly. Wind some knitting cotton closely round these circles. Then cut four pieces of wire, each two inches and three-quarters long, cover them also with cotton, and fasten one large crystal button at the end of each piece of wire; bend them as seen on illustration, and fasten them on to both wire circles. This frame is then covered with crystal beads threaded on fine silk. For the cup take one large cut crystal bead, draw two ends of fine wire, taken double, two inches and two-fifths long, through this bead, which must be in the middle of the wire; fasten a row of larger crystal beads, strung on wire, by drawing the end of the wire through the middle bead, and turning it back underneath it; then wind this row of beads in coils round the middle bead; fasten each coil by drawing the beads at regular intervals through the double ends of wire, and crossing two ends of wire close above the row of beads. After the 3d coil fasten another piece of wire between two ends of wire, so that there are now eight double ends of wire all round. On our pattern the cup consists of thirteen coils. Lastly, fasten some large cut crystal beads round the upper edge of the cup, and secure the latter to the frame with silver wire.

GENTLEMAN'S KNITTED SHIRT.

THIS shirt is knitted with white wool. The back and front are worked separately, and sewed together on the sides and on the shoulders. For the front make a foundation of 140 stitches, and knit backward and forward 240 rounds. Then, in order to form the slit, divide the stitches, taking the first 70 on another needle, and knit further 120 rounds. In order to form the contour of the neck, cast off in the 121st round 20 stitches on the widest side next the slit, then in the second following round six stitches, and after this to the 148th round only two stitches in every second following round. On the left side of the front, which counts only 70 stitches, cast off in the 121st round only six stitches, and in the following alternate rounds only two stitches. Besides this it will be necessary to narrow for the shoulder 27 stitches in the following 40 rounds. The narrowing must be as regular as possible. Lastly, knit 12 rounds more without widening or narrowing, after which cast off the front. For the back cast on 130 stitches, beginning on the under edge. Knit first 360 rounds without widening or narrowing, and then 40 rounds, in which narrow as regularly as possible 27 stitches at the beginning and end of the rounds, after which cast off. Join the back and front on the shoulders and on the sides, with the exception of the upper part for the arm-holes. For the sleeve cast on 100 stitches, beginning on the upper edge. Knit 248 rounds, after which work in the round with finer needles for the wrist 58 rounds, alternately one stitch purled and one knitted. Sew the sleeve up, and sew into the arm-hole. Bind the neck and slit, and face the slit, after which arrange buttons and button-holes for fastening.

NEEDLE-CASE IN THE SHAPE OF A FAN.

(See Engraving, Page 32.)

THIS case is made of white card-board and purple glacé silk. It consists of twelve parts of exactly the shape seen in illustration, placed so as to form a fan. Six of the silk parts are embroidered in point russe with black silk; in the middle of each part sew on the number of the needles. Then cover the card-board with the silk, always placing an embroidered piece on one side, and a plain one on the other, and piping each division of the fan all round. Each division remains open at the top to push in the papers of needles. At the bottom a bronze screw is fastened in the six parts together; this screw is fastened by means of a bronze button. Instead of a screw two small buttons or beads can be taken, which must be joined together with thick silk or wire, inserting the needle through the six parts at a time.

CROCHET MAT.

Materials.—Middle-sized gray crochet cotton, red wool.

THIS mat, which can be used for candlesticks, decanters, vases, etc., consists of ten lappets; they are worked alternately with gray cotton and red wool in ribbed crochet stitch, and are sewn together in the manner seen on illustration. Begin each lappet on a foundation chain of 4 stitches, miss the last of these stitches, work 1 double in the 3d and 1st foundation chain, and 3 double in the 2d. Then work 1 chain, turn the work, and work again 1 double in every stitch, and 3 in the middle stitch. Continue to work on in this manner, leaving, however, the last stitch of every row untouched. Work 30 rows in all. In the 31st row work after every 3 double stitches 1 purl as follows: 5 chain, draw the cotton again through the last stitch, keep the loop on the needle, take up a similar loop in the next stitch of the preceding row, cast off the 3 loops on the needle together. The lappets, when finished, are sewn together on the wrong side; the last seam is made only after having worked the centre of the mat in the following manner: Insert the needle into the lower chain of the foundation, and work in each lappet 3 long treble; these stitches are not cast off separately, but together, when all the stitches have been worked, so that the middle opening is completely closed. Then only join the last two lappets together.

TOILET CUSHION.

THIS cushion is made of scarlet satin, embroidered with gold thread and gay-colored surings four inches in diameter. Upon this fasten a scalloped strip, thickly plaited. Above this are six oval-scalloped pieces, measuring two inches by one inch high, and alternating in color. The patterns shown in the engraving are worked upon them with cordon of a contrasting color. A button, covered with silk or silks. The cushion is made up round shape, and trimmed with two rows of quilled satin ribbon; the upper one quilled through the centre, and caught together with small gilt buttons.

crochet, and ring for a handle, hide the place where the separate parts are fastened to the double round underneath. They are fastened firmly at the back to each other and to the folds.

NECKLACE IN RIBBON AND BEADS.

THIS elegant necklace is made of black or and a half inches, fasten a double round of colored velvet ribbon, on which large crystal dark-colored cloth, scalloped at the edge, mea- beads, edged with gold braid, are sewn. The cross, fastened on to the ribbon, is made of garnet beads, edged all round with buttonhole ner, as also the loop of wire by means of which the cross is fastened on the ribbon.

stitch of gold thread. To work the cross, first make the outlines, from illustration, with strong silver wire, the ends of which are joined together; then draw four ends of silver wire in the long and in the cross way inside the cross, and fill the spaces between the ends of wire with beads, as can be seen on illustration; the beads must be threaded on silk, which is carried alternately over and underneath the rows of silver wire. In the middle of the cross work two slanting stitches of gold thread, and fasten a flat crystal bead, edged all round with buttonhole stitch of gold thread. The wire which forms the outline is covered in the same man-

GENTLEMAN'S SLIPPER.

(See Plate Printed in Green in front of Book.)

THESE slippers are worked in cross-stitch on canvas with single Berlin wool and floselle. The outline of the pattern is traced with black wool; the grounding is green wool. The design, with the exception of the dark green (which also looks effective in deep claret), is worked with white crimson and orange floselle. Worked on finer canvas, these slippers would also be appropriate for a lady.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

To Boil Rice for Curry.—One pound of rice, water. Thoroughly wash the rice in three separate waters, then place it in a very large saucepan nearly full of water, let it boil gently until it is quite tender, which may be tried by pressing a grain between the thumb and finger. Pour the water off from the rice, and shake it over the fire in a smaller saucepan until it is quite dry. Turn it into a hot basin, and cover with a plate, place before the fire, let it stand five minutes, then turn it out into a hot dish ready for the table.

Boiled Vermicelli Pudding.—Stir very gently four ounces of vermicelli into a pint of new milk over the stove, until it be scalding hot, but not more; then pour it into a basin, and add to it while hot one ounce of butter and two ounces of sugar. When the above is nearly cold, mix in it very gently two well-beaten eggs, and immediately put it into a basin that will exactly hold it. Cover carefully with a floured cloth, and, turning the basin the narrow end upwards, move it round for ten minutes, and boil an hour. Serve with pudding sauce.

To Roast Partridges.—Rightly, to look well, there should be a leash (three birds) in the dish. Pluck, singe, draw, and truss them; roast them for about twenty minutes, baste them with butter, and when the gravy begins to run from them, you may safely assume that the partridges are done. Place them in a dish together with bread-crumbs, fried nicely brown, and arranged in small heaps. Gravy should be served in a tureen apart.

To Fry Partridges.—Take a brace of cold partridges that have been either roasted or braised, cut them into quarters, dip them into beaten and seasoned yolk of eggs, make some butter perfectly hot in a frying-pan, put into it the birds, and do them over a moderately hot fire until they are beautifully browned.

Potatoes and Fish.—Carefully mash half a dozen very mealy potatoes, boiled or steamed, without the addition of salt; add some butter or cream, and season them to your taste. Beat in a mortar about two tablespoonfuls of cold boiled salt fish; add a little milk or cream, a small quantity of grated nutmeg and lemon-peel, and a whole raw egg; when quite smooth, mix it with the potatoes; place all together in a mould, buttered and sprinkled with rasped toast, squeeze over it some lemon-juice, and bake it until it begins to brown, turn it out to serve.

Potatoes à la Crème.—Put into a saucepan about two ounces of butter, a dessertspoonful of flour, some parsley and scallions (both chopped small), salt and pepper; stir these up together, add a wineglassful of cream, and set it on the fire, stirring continually until it boils. Cut some boiled potatoes into slices, and put them into the saucepan with the mixture; boil all together, and serve them very hot.

Fillet of Veal Boiled.—Bind it round with tape, put it in a floured cloth and in cold water, boil very gently two hours and a half, or if simmered, which is perhaps the better way, four hours will be taken; it may be sent to table in bechamel or with oyster sauce. Care should be taken to keep it as white as possible.

Real Essence of Beef.—Take one pound of solid beef from the rump—a steak would be the best—cut it into thin slices, which lay upon a thin trencher, and scrape quite fine with a large and sharp knife

(as quickly as possible, or the juice of the meat would partially soak into the wood, your meat thus losing much of its strengthening quality); when like sausage meat, put it into a stewpan or saucepan and stir over the fire five or ten minutes, until thoroughly warmed through, then add a pint of water, cover the stewpan as tightly as possible, and let it remain close to the fire, or in a warm oven, for twenty minutes, then pass it through a sieve, pressing the meat with a spoon to extract all the essence.

To Boil Calf's Head.—Split the head in two parts and remove the brains; wash the brains in three waters, and lay them for an hour in cold salted water. Wash the head clean, and soak it in tepid water until the blood is well drawn out. Put it in cold water; when it boils remove the scum, and simmer gently until a straw can be run through it. A head with the skin will take three hours, if large, and without the skin two. Scald the brains by pouring over them boiling water; take them out and remove the skin or film; put them in plenty of cold water, and simmer gently fifteen minutes. Chop them slightly, stew them in sweet butter, add half a teaspoonful of lemon-juice, or not, as desired, and a little salt; when done, skin the tongue, lay it in the centre of the dish, and the brains round it. Send the head to the table very hot, with drawn butter poured over it, and more in the tureen.

Boiled Neck of Mutton.—Four pounds of the middle, or best end of the neck of mutton, a little salt. Trim off a portion of the fat, should there be too much, and if it is to look particularly nice, the chine-bone should be sawn down, the ribs stripped halfway down, and the ends of the bones chopped off; this is, however, not necessary. Put the meat into sufficient boiling water to cover it; when it boils, add a little salt, and remove the scum. Draw the saucepan to the side of the fire, and let the water get so cool that the finger may be borne in it; then simmer very slowly and gently until the meat is done, which will be in about one and a half hour, or rather more, reckoning from the time that it begins to simmer. The turnips should be boiled with the mutton; and, when at hand, a few carrots will also be found an improvement. These, however, if very large and thick, must be cut into long thinish pieces, or they will not be sufficiently done by the time the mutton is ready. Garnish the dish with carrots and turnips placed alternately round the mutton.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Custard Fritters.—Beat the yolks of four eggs with a dessertspoonful of flour, a little nutmeg, salt, and brandy; add half a pint of cream; sweeten it to taste, and bake it in a small dish for a quarter of an hour. When cold, cut it into quarters, and dip them into a batter made with a quarter of a pint each of milk and cream, the whites of the four eggs, a little flour, and a good bit of grated ginger; fry them of a nice brown; grate sugar over them, and serve them as hot as possible.

Queen of Puddings.—Take one pint of bread-crumbs, one quart of milk, half a cup of sugar, four eggs, taking only the yolks, butter the size of a walnut, one lemon grated. Bake until done, but not watery; then spread a layer of currant jelly or any preserved fruit over it, take the whites of the eggs and sugar, in which has been stirred the juice of the lemon, beat to a stiff froth, pour it over the pudding and brown it. Serve cold with cream. It can be made without a lemon; flavor with nutmeg.

Marmalade Pudding.—Chop six ounces of beef suet very fine, and mix with it four ounces of bread-crumbs, the same of powdered loaf-sugar, two beaten eggs, and a gill of milk. Beat the above well together and set it aside for about one hour, and then beat it again for ten minutes, after which put it into a mould in alternate layers with the marmalade. Any kind of marmalade may be used. Bake the pudding slowly for about one hour and a half or one hour and three-quarters, and then turn it out carefully from the mould.

Another Way.—After mixing the ingredients as above, work in the marmalade; then place the whole in a mould, and steam it for about one hour and a half. Care must be taken that the water does not rise above the mould, and that it is kept boiling.

German Sponge Cake.—Mix in a pudding basin six ounces of pounded sugar and twelve egg yolks. Beat these well with a wooden spoon for fifteen minutes; then add the whites of eight eggs beaten to a snow, and stir again for fifteen minutes; add two spoonfuls of rum or brandy, a little candied peel chopped quite fine, one and a half ounce of currants, one and a half ounce of raisins, the latter chopped fine; finally six ounces of best flour sifted. Bake in a buttered tin in a quick oven.

A Good Pound Cake.—Beat one pound of butter to a cream, and mix with it the whites and yolks of eight eggs beaten apart. Have ready warm by the fire a pound of flour, and the same of sifted sugar; mix them, and a few cloves, a little nutmeg, and cinnamon in fine powder, together; then by degrees work the dry ingredients into the butter and eggs. When well beaten add a glass of wine and some carraways; it must be beaten a full hour. Butter a pan, and bake it a full hour in a quick oven. The above proportions, leaving out four ounces of the butter and the same of sugar, make a less luscious cake, and to most tastes a more pleasant one.

Lemon Puffs.—Bruise a pound of double-refined sugar, and sift it through a fine sieve. Put it into a bowl, with the juice of two lemons, and mix them together. Beat the white of an egg to a very high froth, put it into your bowl, add three eggs, with two rinds of lemon grated. Mix it well up, and throw sugar papers; drop on the puffs in small drops, and bake them in a moderately heated oven.

Cranberry Tart.—Take half a pint of cranberries, pick them from the stems and throw them into a saucepan with half a pound of white sugar and a spoonful of water; let them come to a boil; then let them stand on the hob to cool while you peel and cut up four large apples; put a rim of light paste round your dish; strew in the apples; pour the cranberries over them; cover with a lid of crust, and bake for an hour. For a pudding, proceed in the same manner with the fruit, and boil it in a basin or cloth.

A Nice Yeast Cake.—One pound and a half of flour, half a pound of butter, half a pint of milk, one tablespoonful and a half of good yeast, three eggs, three-quarters of a pound of currants, half a pound of white moist sugar, two ounces of candied peel. Put the milk and butter into a saucepan, and shake it round over a fire until the butter is melted, but do not allow the milk to get very hot. Put the flour into a basin, stir to it the milk and butter, the yeast, and eggs, which should be well beaten, and form the whole into a smooth dough. Let it stand in a warm place, covered with a cloth, to rise, and, when sufficiently risen, add the currants, sugar, and candied peel cut into thin slices. When all the ingredients are thoroughly mixed, line two moderate-sized cake-tins with buttered paper, which should be about six inches higher than the tin; pour in the mixture, let it stand to rise again for another half hour, and then bake the cakes in a brisk oven for about an hour and a half. If the tops of them become too brown, cover them with paper until they are done through. A few drops of essence of lemon, or a little grated nutmeg, may be added when the flavor is liked.

Orange Soufflé.—Melt one ounce of butter in a saucepan, stir to it one and a half ounce of flour, then a teaspoonful of boiling milk. Stir the mixture for three minutes over the fire, turn it into a basin, add the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, one and a half ounce of pounded sugar, the juice of three oranges, the rind of one, either grated into the sugar or chopped quite fine, and finally the whites of the three eggs beaten quite firm. Bake in a quick oven, and serve immediately.

A Good Pudding.—Four ounces each of flour, suet, currants, raisins, and bread-crumbs, two tablespoonfuls of molasses, and half a pint of milk. Mix all well together, and boil in a mould three hours. Serve with wine or brandy sauce.

CONTIBUTED.

DEAR SIR: In your LADY'S BOOK I see you ask for receipts. I will send mine, which are said to be very nice.

White Cake.—One cup of butter, two of sugar, beat to a cream; the whites of eight eggs beaten to a stiff froth; three cups of flour, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved and strained into the cake, and lastly, one cup of sour cream.

Delicate Cup Cake.—One cup of butter, three of loaf-sugar, pulverized; the whites of ten eggs, five cups of flour, in which two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar have been sifted; measure the flour before sifting, and then again after the cream of tartar has been put in; one teaspoon of sweet cream with a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in it and strained.

Jelly Cake.—One pound of sugar, one pound of flour, half a pound of butter, six eggs, one cup of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of soda, two of cream of tartar. This makes two good-sized cakes.

Preparation for Chocolate Jelly Cake.—One teaspoonful of milk, seven sticks of vanilla chocolate grated into the milk, one egg, and sugar to make it very sweet; put it in a bowl and stand on a tea-kettle of boiling water; stir it constantly until quite thick; then use it the same as jelly for the cake.

Graham Bread.—I make the sponge for this the same as for any other bread, the night before baking, using the brown flour; it must be moulded quite soft; it can be done better with wheat flour, as it makes the loaves smoother; a little lard is an improvement.

Crawlers.—One pound of butter, one pound of sugar, three pounds of flour, ten eggs.

In reply to the question asked about the eradication of dandruff, I know borax and camphor (equal quantities of each) put in warm water and applied to the head with a small brush, to be very good.

Charlotte Russe. No. 1.—Make a custard of three eggs and half a pint of milk, half a pound of sugar, leaving out the white of one egg to glue the cake.

No. 2. Half a box of gelatine dissolved in half a pint of water; simmer and strain in custard; stir until cold.

No. 3. Whip to a froth one quart of cream, flavor with vanilla; when stiff enough mix custard and cream. Line a dish with lady-fingers or sponge-cake.

Will be happy to give you information whenever I am able to. MRS. D. W.

An Excellent Soup.—Dress a rabbit and put on to boil with three Irish potatoes sliced, a quarter of a nice cabbage, one onion, a turnip, two carrots, a sprig of parsley and thyme, a few celery-seed, and salt and pepper to taste. Thicken with a little flour, and boil till done. Add tomato catsup, and send the soup to table without the vegetables.

Milk Custard.—Take the yolks of two eggs, half a cup of butter, half a cup of milk, two cups of sugar; beat these well together, and bake on a rich crust.

Wafers.—Four cups of flour, two of sugar, yolks of three eggs, one cup of butter, a little soda and buttermilk. Bake in wafer irons, and roll them while hot. A supper or breakfast dish.

PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS FOR GARDENERS.

1. PERFORM every operation in the proper season.
2. Perform every operation in the proper manner.
- This is to be acquired in part by practice and partly also by reflection. For example, in digging over a piece of ground, it is a common practice with slovens to throw the weeds and stones on the dug ground, or on the adjoining alley or walk, with the intention of gathering them off afterwards. A better way is to have a wheelbarrow or a large basket, in which to put the weeds and extraneous matters as they are picked out of the ground. Some persons, in planting or weeding, whether in the open air or in hot-houses, throw down all seeds, stones, and extraneous matters on the paths or alleys, with a view to pick them up, or sweep or rake them together afterwards. It is better to carry a basket or other utensil, either common or subdivided, in which to hold in one part the plants to be planted, in another the extraneous matters, etc.
3. Complete every part of an operation as you proceed.
4. Finish one job before beginning another.
5. In leaving off working at any job, leave the work and tools in an orderly manner.
6. In leaving off work for the day, make a temporary finish, and carry the tools to the tool-house.
7. In passing to and from the work, or on any occasion, through any part of what is considered under the charge of the gardener, keep a vigilant lookout for weeds, decayed leaves, or any other deformity, and remove them.
8. In gathering a crop, remove at the same time the roots, leaves, stems, or whatever else is of no farther use, or may appear slovenly, decaying, or offensive.
9. Let no crop of fruit or herbaceous vegetables go to waste on the spot.
10. Cut down the flower-stalks on all plants.
11. Keep every part of what is under your care perfect in its kind.
- Attend in spring and autumn to walls and buildings, and get them repaired, jointed, glazed, and painted where wanted. Attend at all times to machines, implements, and tools, keeping them clean, sharp, and in perfect repair. See particularly that they are placed in their proper situation in the tool-house. House every implement, utensil, or machine not in use, both in winter and summer. Allow no blanks in edging, rows, single specimens, drills, beds, and even, where practicable, in broadcast sown pieces. Keep edgings and edges out to the utmost nicety. Keep the shapes of the wall trees filled with wood according to their kind, and let their training be in the first style of perfection. Keep all walks in perfect form, whether raised or flat, free from weeds, dry, and well rolled. Keep all the lawns, by every means in your power, of a close texture and dark green velvet appearance. Keep water clear and free from weeds, and let not ponds, lakes, or artificial rivers rise to the brim in winter, nor sink very far under it in summer.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Skeleton Leaves.—There is a quicker way of skeletonizing leaves than the usual one of maceration, but it is at best an uncertain process, though occasionally it may succeed. Half an ounce of caustic soda should be dissolved in a pint of water for the thinner leaves, and one ounce of soda to the same quantity of water for the thicker ones. In this liquid the leaves must be placed, and kept near a fire until the cuticle can be easily detached, which will probably be in a day or two. After being skeletonized by this process, the leaves are very tender, and the bleaching in chloride of lime becomes a difficult matter in consequence. The maceration is certainly a tedious affair, but the result is more certain, and in some respects less troublesome.

Curled Butter.—Tie a strong cloth by two of the corners to an iron hook in the wall; make a knot with the other two ends so that a stick might pass through. Put the butter into the cloth; twist it tightly over a dish, into which the butter will fall through the knot, so forming small and pretty little strings. The butter may then be garnished with parsley, if to serve with a cheese course; or it may be sent to table plain for breakfast in an ornamental dish. Squirred butter for garnishing hams, salads, eggs, etc., is made by forming a piece of stiff paper in the shape of a cornet, and squeezing the butter in fine strings from the hole at the bottom. Scooped butter is made by dipping a teaspoon or scoop in warm water, and then scooping the butter quickly and thin. In warm weather, it would not be necessary to heat the spoon.

Buckwheat Cakes.—One pint of buckwheat meal, one quart of water, salt just to taste, one gill of home-made yeast. Mix the water—which should be lukewarm if the weather is cold—with the meal, add the salt and yeast, beat it well; when light, bake them on a griddle. Grease the griddle, pour on a little of the batter, spread it so as to form a cake about the size of a breakfast plate. The cakes should be very smooth at the edges. When they are done on one side turn them, when brown on both sides, put some butter on the plate, place the cake on it, butter the top, bake another and put it on, butter it and send them to the table. Buckwheat cakes are much better if they are sent to the table with only one or two on a plate.

Nourishing Soup for Invalids.—Boil two pounds of lean veal and a quarter of a pound of pearl barley in a quart of water very slowly, until it becomes the consistency of cream. Pass it through a fine sieve, and salt it to taste. Flavor it with celery seed, if the taste be liked, or use fresh celery, if in season. A very small quantity of the seed would suffice. It should simmer very slowly, as otherwise the barley does not properly amalgamate with the soup. It is called barley cream, and will not keep more than twenty-four hours. Beef may be used instead of veal.

To Take Stains out of Silver Plate.—Steep the plate in soap lye for the space of four hours; then cover it over with whiting, wet with vinegar, so that it may stick thick upon it, and dry it by the fire; after which, rub off the whiting, pass it over with dry bran, and the stains will not only disappear, but the plate will look exceedingly bright.

Cold Feet.—Cold feet are the precursors of consumption. To escape them, warm your feet well in the morning, and covering the sole with a piece of common paper, carefully draw on the sock, and then the boot or shoe.

Editors' Table.

THE NEW YEAR AND THE NEW IDEAS.

We greet our friends with warm wishes for their happiness.

"There is so much inviting us, what are we to take? What will nourish the growth toward perfection?" said Matthew Arnold, as he saw the immense fields of life and literature lying before him. Such questions press constantly on those who have the care of periodicals. We must have novelty, variety, the amusing, the improving, in short something to suit the taste of each reader; and yet a leading idea sufficiently interesting and important to command the attention of all, and make each feel that there is progress towards that perfection for which human nature is sighing, and should be striving.

Looking back over the past twenty years, we see such rapid strides made in the practical application of ideas we then advanced concerning woman's need of better education for her own duties, that there seems now some fear lest she should, in her eagerness to show the world what she can do, aim rather at doing men's work as the best proof of her ability. This would be a serious mistake. Woman needs the highest culture and most perfect training of all her faculties for her own important offices of womanhood, with their practical bearing on the character and condition of the human race. We hope, in the opportunity now open to us, to bring these subjects in their personal bearing before our readers.

The wisdom of history is found in personal examples of excellence rather than in theories or doctrines of goodness and perfection. The recent decease of an eminent lady in England, whose life we have noticed in our next article, leads us to remark the peculiar power and efficiency of a woman who confines herself to her own sphere. Lady Palmerston could never have done so much good to her husband or to her country in Parliament as she did at the head of society. One thing is not mentioned in the sketch which we think our readers would like to know. Lady Palmerston took a warm interest in popular education. She was Patroness of the Hertford Grammar School, whose announcement, now lying before us, shows what thorough and healthful training can be given on the old English endowments at a very low price. We are sure that Americans will appreciate a trait so fully exemplified in our national character and national institutions.

LADY PALMERSTON.

ONE of the brightest lights of the last generation has expired. Lady Palmerston, the wife of the great statesman, died on Saturday, the 11th of September last, at her country seat.

The slight sketch which follows is selected from a notice written by some one well acquainted with her life for the London Times of the ensuing Wednesday.

Among the pictures at Earl Cowper's seat in Hertfordshire is one by Sir Joshua Reynolds of two boys seated on the trunk of a fallen tree, and a girl with a basket of flowers. The figures are portraits of William Lamb, second Lord Melbourne; Frederick Lamb, third Lord Melbourne; and Amelia Lamb, Viscountess Palmerston. The eldest boy grew up to be one of the most remarkable men of the age, and the girl one of the most remarkable women. The brother rose to be Prime Minister of England, without commanding eloquence or lofty ambition, lazily and loungingly, as it were, by the spontaneous display of fine natural abilities; by frankness, manliness, thorough knowledge of his countrymen, and good sense. The sister became the undisputed leader of English society, equally without apparent effort: without aiming at the fame of a wit, like Madame de Staël; or that of a beauty, like Madame Recamier; or that of a party idol, like Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire; without once overstepping by a hair's breadth the proper province of her sex; by the unforced development of the most exquisitely feminine qualities; by grace, refinement, sweetness of disposition, womanly sympathies, instinctive insight into character, tact, temper, and—wonderful to relate—heart.

Born in 1787, she was daughter of the first Lord Melbourne and of the sister of Sir Ralph Milbanke, the father of Lady Byron. Lord Byron spoke of Lady Melbourne in 1813 as "the best friend I ever had in my life, and the cleverest woman." Little is known of Lady Palmerston's girlhood. She married Earl Cowper in 1806, and took her place at once in the brilliant galaxy of beautiful and accomplished women who adorned the English Court after the peace. But what may be called her public life dates from 1830, when she married Lord Palmerston, Lord Cowper having died in 1837. Her intense interest in her husband and in his political fortunes made her a politician. To place him and keep him in what she thought his proper position; to make people see him as she saw him; to bring lukewarm friends, carping rivals, or exasperated adversaries within the genial atmosphere of his conversation; to tone down opposition, and conciliate support—this was henceforth the fixed purpose and master passion of her life.

The attraction of Lady Palmerston's salon at its commencement was the mixed, yet select and refined character of the assemblage, the result of that exquisite tact and high breeding that secured her the full benefits of exclusiveness without its drawbacks. The diplomatic corps eagerly congregated at the house of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. So did the politicians; the leading members of the fine world were her habitual associates, and the grand difficulty lay in recruiting from among the rising celebrities of public life, fashion, or literature. Her visiting book was kept as regularly as a merchant's ledger. So long as her health allowed, she made a point of filling up her cards with her own hand. Her good nature was quite inexhaustible, nor was it ever known to give way under any extent of forwardness or tiresomeness. Instead of interrupting, or abruptly quitting wearisome or pushing visitors, she would listen till they ceased of their own accord, or were superseded and went away.

Whoever was fortunate enough to be once received on a cordial footing of intimacy might count securely upon her enduring regard. She would tolerate no doubt, suspicion, or depreciation of a friend. She was also placable in the extreme towards un-friends, so long as they did not cabal against Lord Palmerston or transgress the limits of fair party warfare in assailing him. Then a change came over her; the patte de velours shot out its claws. But her anger was short lived. She never forsook a friend, and always forgave a foe.

Lady Palmerston never pretended to understand the bearings of a complicated subject. "You must write that down," she would say, if a communication struck her, "and I will show it to Lord Palmerston." The bell was rung, the servant was sent with a simple message, and the summons was immediately obeyed. Long experience had taught him that her tact was infallible in such matters. Her services to the great statesman extended far beyond the creation of a salon. What superficial observers mistook for indiscretion was eminently useful to him. She always understood full well what she was telling, to whom she was telling it, and whether the repetition would do harm or good. Instead of the secret that was betrayed, it was the feeling that was put forth; and no one ever knew through Lady Palmerston what Lord Palmerston did not wish to be known.

His death was a terrible shock, from which she slowly recovered. She afterwards expressed her belief that it had actually prolonged her life. She sat up for him every night when he attended the House of Commons, and was wearing herself away with anxiety.

She undertook the entire management of the household at Brocket, Cambridge-house, and Broadlands, as well as that of her own property; personally inspecting the accounts, leaving nothing to agents, stewards, or head servants, but what fell strictly within their respective departments. The consequence was that she was admirably served, and that an air of ease and comfort pervaded each of her establishments. She kept a journal, which, some time or other, will furnish valuable aids to history.

She possessed a keen insight into character, and was singularly happy in conveying a hint by an epithet, or a graphic sketch by a phrase, letting fall her felicitous touches with ease and unconsciously. She was rigidly just in her firm estimates of character; chary, with rare exceptions, of her preferences; mild, yet firm, in her disapproval; warm, but not extravagant, in her praise. Her memory will live indissolubly blended with one of the most brilliant episodes of the social life of England, with many a sweet scene of domestic happiness, with many a delightful hour of "social pleasure ill exchanged for power;" with all that is winning, high-minded, warm-hearted; with nothing that is petty, ungenerous, ungraceful, uncharitable, or false.

ALICE.*

BY MRS. G. J. BEEBE.

You told me that "you loved me best—
That though your heart was sore
In losing one who ne'er would rest
Upon your bosom more;
Yet in my heart, so true and pure,
Your own should find sweet peace;
And in each other's love secure,
Till death should give release,

"We would together walk the vale,
The vale of doubt and tears;
And Katie's hand should smooth my brow
In my declining years.
That now the cold earth lay above
Your Mary's pure white face,
I was the one of all the world
To take her sainted place."

You said that "though her face was fair,
'Twas not more fair than mine."
You told me "she was good and pure
And I not less divine."

* An answer to the poem "Mary," which appeared in the January number 1869. Both poems are well written—and on the same subject; but the sentiment differs. Which is right?

You clasped me to your cold, cold heart,
O God! I thought it true!
That holy boon, a woman's love,
I freely gave to you.

In my own guileless childhood days
('Twas years and years ago)
My mother slept the sleep that knows
No waking here below.
At night, before she crossed the stream,
She said, "Dear heart, I go."
My childish grief then burst its bounds—
I wept aloud my woe.

"O mother! mother! let me go
With you; the path is drear.
The thorns will pierce my weary feet,
And phantoms dire appear.
I cannot live when one so dear
Is laid beneath the sod!"
She opened again her gentle eyes
And said, "Sweet, trust in God."

And sad I grew to maidenhood,
Until I saw your face;
You wooed me with the sweetest words
And smiles of winning grace.
Oh, then, my soul was filled with joy!
Oh, then, the world was fair!
The perfume breathed from every flower,
And music filled the air.

I hoped to be a loving wife,
A gentle mother, too,
To the dear child, like me bereft
Of mother pure and true,
Until one eve in summer time
(You dreamed not I was near)
You spoke the words that set me free—
That froze my soul to hear.

You said you "loved me not, your heart
Was laid with Mary mild;
In wedding me you only sought
A mother for your child."
You said that it was sacrilege
To rob the sainted dead;
Ah! if you have no heart to give,
'Twere sacrilege to wed.

I doubt if mortal has the power
To rob the peaceful dead,
But he who wrongs the living brings
God's curses on his head.
Yet you would at the altar swear
To love but me alone;
Then kiss me with your perjured lips,
And say "Love, we are one."

Thank God! I found that you were false
Before my doom was sealed.
Leave me! I scorn your proffered hand,
Your baseness stands revealed.
But you have quenched the fires of hope
That light my path below,
And henceforth on my pilgrimage
In grief and gloom I go.

Sweet Mary sleeps a blessed sleep
Beneath the cypress shade;
Ah! would that such a peaceful couch
For Alice might be made.
O mother! guide with angel sway
Thy weary, lonely child;
O Father! from Thy Throne above
Bid me be reconciled.

GLAUCOMA.

Of all the great advances which surgery has made within the last fifty years, none is more striking than that which concerns the human eye. Almost all of the inventions and methods of treatment, by which ocular diseases are cured or alleviated, are the product of our own century; and this though the ailments themselves were known to Hippocrates and Galen. Indeed, the particular affection which we are now about to describe, or something like it, received its name from Hippocrates, who wrote in the fifth century before Christ.

GLAUCOMA was applied by him to all opacities behind the pupil of the eye, especially the greenish ones. The resulting disease was for many centuries the despair of surgery; but, finally, as late as 1851; Helmholtz, a famous German oculist, invented the ophthalmoscope, by which the eye could be examined. From that time the disease has been thoroughly observed and analyzed. Finally Von Graefe, another eminent German, and the greatest of modern oculists, discovered the fundamental cause of the derangement. It consisted in augmented tension of the eyeball. To decrease this tension became the object of oculists; and, by the great operation called tridectomy, they have succeeded in providing a cure for most cases of glaucoma.

We have not space for a detail of the symptoms or of the operation. Our readers who are suffering trouble with their eyes, which every year increases, will do well to inform themselves on the matter. We have taken our information from Doctor Wells' Treatise on "Diseases of the Eye," published this year in England, and sold here by Messrs. Lindsay & Blackiston.

AN AMERICAN NOVEL.*

HAWTHORNE has spoken of the peculiar difficulty of writing an "American novel"—whose scene should be laid among the people with whom we are familiar. We are deprived of one great resource, in the absence of a long and eventful past; of another, in that equality of social condition which offers no sharp and picturesque contrast of thought and feeling. "The glow of common day" is too pitiless for mediocrity: none but the greatest, none but the fellow of Thackeray or George Eliot, can bear the revealing brightness; and, until we have a giant in the land, we must be content when we escape folly and sensation writing.

"Walter Oglby," the work now before us, is entirely free from both; and possesses a quiet interest that will more than compensate any reader of good taste for the absence of violent color. The scenes and characters are distinctively American, and several of the personages seem to be copies of originals known to the authoress. The incidents are such as most of us have gone through, and the talk is simple and unpretending. There is perhaps a somewhat stilted diction; but it never waxes into pomposity, and will not mar the pleasure of the story. When we see the fictions that now flood the book-sellers' shelves with their morbid and worthless contents, we welcome heartily a natural, truthful story, whose influence will be all for good upon its readers.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

AN AMERICAN NOVELIST.—The name of Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz will be familiar to most of our readers. Her books have been popular all over the country, and the news of her death came with a pang to thousands of hearts. The feeling which her works excited was one of unalloyed pleasure. There were invention, wit, and fancy in them all; and there was nothing deleterious or unwholesome. They have been for some years out of print; and a new edition was loudly called for. It is now to be supplied. T. B. Peterson & Brothers, of this city, have already published five volumes, including "Linda," "Robert Graham," and "Ernest Linwood," and are issuing the remaining seven at the rate of two every month. The series will be complete in twelve; they are printed on good paper and strongly bound in fine morocco cloth, with gilt back; making a handsome row of books for the library, and agreeable companions for the fireside. Mrs. Hentz's many admirers will be glad to learn where their favorite works may be procured.

PRACTICAL EDUCATION.—Mr. Lowe, in one of his eloquent speeches, gave his opinion on the uses of learning in these remarks, which are as much needed here as in England:—

"I think it will be admitted by all that we live in a universe of things, and not of words, and that the knowledge of things is more important than the knowledge of words. The first years of a child's life are employed in learning both, but a great deal more time is spent in making itself acquainted with the world than with language. That is the form nature takes. She begins with a knowledge of things, and words follow after. To illustrate: I think it more important to a man to know where his liver is situated, and what its functions are, than to know that it is called Jecur in Latin and Hepar in Greek. I think it more important to know the history of our country than to know the mythology of the ancients. I think it better to know those transactions out of which our political and social conditions arise, than to know the lives and loves of all the gods and goddesses that are contained in the Iliad. Then, again, as we cannot teach everything, I think it is more important that we teach practical things than speculative things. For instance: I think it more important that a man should be able to work out a sum in arithmetic, than that he should be acquainted with the abstract conditions of argument as detailed in 'Aristotle's Logic'; that modes, syllogisms, and figures are not so important as the 'Rule of Three,' or 'Practice,' or keeping accounts, and, therefore, if I must choose, I confess I should lean to the practical side."

THE "WOMAN QUESTION" IN ENGLAND.—To what an extent the "Woman Question" is occupying the English mind may be judged from the titles of some of its leading magazine articles within a short time. The Spectator has a paper on "Women as Religious Teachers;" the Theological Review discusses "The Subjection of Women;" the Idealist has an essay on "The Present Condition of Women;" the Fortnightly Review has an article on "The Woman of Business;" the Contemporary Review treats of "Girls' Grammar Schools;" the author of "John Halifax" is writing about "A Brave Lady" in Macmillan's Magazine; the Pall Mall Budget sets forth "The Cruelties of Flirtation;" Temple Bar has a paper on "Young Husbands and Wives;" the Argosy talks of "Love and War;" the British Quarterly Review has an article on "The Condition of English Women in the Middle Ages;" the Saturday Review cuts up John Stuart Mill's "Subjugation of Women;" and a London bookseller publishes "The Book of the Season," in which "Maiden Hours" and "Maiden Wiles" are illustrated in twenty plates.

HIGHER EDUCATION FOR LADIES.—The British in their Dominion of Canada are taking up the subject of woman's improvement. In connection with the University of Toronto three courses of lectures for ladies have been arranged by responsible gentlemen, as the following list shows:—

"In response to this invitation Rev. Dr. Scadding, Rev. Dr. Lille, Rev. Prof. Hincks, Rev. Mr. Porter, Rev. Mr. King, Rev. Mr. Cavan, Mr. Murray, Dr. Canniff, Mr. Lauder, M. P. P., Dr. Wright, and others addressed the meeting."

The committee were as follows:—

"The Lord Bishop of Toronto, the Rev. Provost Whitaker, the Rev. F. Marling, Drs. Bovell, Oldright, and Temple, and Messrs. R. L. Denison and George Barker, together with the gentlemen present at the meeting."

The movement in England and Canada for supplying to women an education fitted for their wants, by opening to them schools and universities, and founding institutions of learning expressly for their benefit, has already gained such strength that its success is virtually insured. In this country, while many are clamoring for women's suffrage, we have not bestowed nearly so much thought upon the far more important matter of fitting the sex for what lies close to our hands. Let all who are now endeavoring to obtain the suffrage for women strive first to throw open to them the colleges and academies of this country. The Agricultural Schools, endowed by Congress, might be so arranged as to admit of Domestic Science for young women under their charters, where they might become accomplished in scientific house-keeping, and thus a substantial benefit be conferred upon our whole country.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—These articles are accepted: "The Chimes"—"Waiting"—"Fireflies and Stars"—"Bon Soir"—"Song"—and "Earnest Love."

These articles are not needed: "Thoughts"—"All for Love"—"A Retrospect"—"A Reminiscence"—"Cora Dale" (and other poems by the same writer. We cannot use them as suggested)—"My Pearl"—"Home"—"Hope"—"The Adventure"—"Sonnet"—"My Mother"—and "Come to Me."

To "F. C. S." (St. Albans). The articles sent as requested.

The MSS. (stamps inclosed) have been returned, as requested.

We have received a poetical reply to "Crowned"—a poem in our Table of last September. The sentiment of the reply is good—the versification has some faults. We give the closing stanza:—

"I've seen a home of mutual care,
The lodily toil not all man's share,
The mental freedom, not his alone,
Each, equal to each, on their own hearthstone.
The husband loving, true, and just,
Sweeping over his brow no passion gust;
Generous still, to the fearless wife
That his love has crowned with a royal life."

NOTICE.—Manuscripts must in all cases be accompanied with the name and address of the authors, and stamps for their return, if not accepted. The utmost care will be taken and all possible expedition used with regard to them; but it must be understood that the Editor is not responsible should a M.S. be mislaid or lost.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

FOOD FOR REFLECTION.

BY DR. CHAS. F. UHLR.

In this world of ours, amid its cares and perplexities, how seldom do we pause to think upon the wonders and mysteries of our existence. Day by day we enjoy the breath of life, eat, drink, move, and have our being, unmindful of the wondrous powers by which these ends are realized, ungrateful, many of us, to that Divine Being "whose hands have made and fashioned us," and whose infinite wisdom hath so beautifully adapted our organization to the requirements of our life and comfort. The science which unfolds to us the wonders of the human frame, and exhibits the workings of all its intricate machinery, shows us upon what an infinity of springs, and motions, and adaptations our existence depends. Whether we are sleeping or waking, sitting or walking, there is going on within such a multiplicity of curious phenomenon, such a variety of movements and muscular action, as would overpower us with astonishment and even with fear, were we to behold them. We should be apt to feel alarmed on making the least exertion, lest the parts of this intricate machinery should be broken or deranged, and its functions interrupted.

The steam engine, constructed as it is of the hardest and most durable materials, will run but a few months without some of its essential parts being worn or disabled, even though its action be frequently discontinued. But the animal machine, though constructed for the most part of the softest and most flabby substances, can go on without intermission in all its diversified movements by night and by day for the space of eighty or one hundred years, the heart giving 96,000 strokes every twenty-four hours, and the whole mass of blood rushing through a thousand pipes of all sizes every four minutes.

It is not very generally known what an immense amount of labor is performed by the various organs and parts of our body in every year of our short lives. We have made some estimates relative to this point, and will present the odd results for the benefit of those who seldom think upon the subject.

Our heart at each successive pulse or contraction, by which it protrudes the blood out of the arteries into the veins, exerts a force of about 100,000 pounds. It contracts 4000 times an hour, and in one day seven hundred and fifty gallons, or twenty-three and a half barrels, of blood pass through its cavity, and at this rate upwards of 8577 barrels in one year. This quantity seems enormous. The idea of over 8000 barrels of blood passing through this little organ in this time, and it capable of holding only about two ounces at one time. It seems almost incredible, but then there are many incredible truths in our strange existence, and "figures very seldom lie."

Our liver secretes three barrels and one-fifth of bile, salivary glands four barrels of spittle, stomach five barrels of gastric juice, and our kidneys upwards of eight barrels of their secretion in one year. There passes off through the skin, by means of twenty-eight miles of little "sweat tubes," three barrels or more of water in the form of insensible perspiration, and about the same quantity by the lungs through the breath. In addition to this there are the secretions of various other organs and glands of the body in proportionate quantities, which in itself cannot be less than two barrels at a very moderate estimate. Making an aggregate of the whole, we find that there are about seven hundred and seventy-six gallons, or nearly twenty-five barrels, of liquids of various kinds discharged from our body by its various emunctories in one year.

These calculations, based upon facts gathered by the researches and experiments of our physiologists, bring to light the huge amount of labor these fragile organs of ours are capable of performing. But there are other curiosities in our economy, and we will pass on to them.

There are four hundred and forty-six different muscles, two hundred and forty-five bones (sixty of which are in the hands), and upwards of three hundred ligaments in the human body. Each muscle acts in at least ten different capacities, that is, it has ten different intentions or qualifications to serve; each bone has been estimated to have forty. Taking these together, we find that the muscles and bones alone have upwards of 14,000 different adaptations or intentions. If we were to attend to the many thousand ligaments, tendons, membranes, humors, fluids of various description, the skin with its million of pores, and every other part of the organical system, we would have another sum of many hundreds of millions to be multiplied by the former product in order to express the diversified ideas which enter into the construction of our wondrous body.

One hundred and three muscles are brought into use every time we breathe, and the combined force of these muscles in accomplishing this act has been estimated at 3000 pounds at each inspiration. As regards the strength of the other muscles of our body, Doctor Dicks says that "when a man lifts up with his teeth a weight of two hundred pounds with a rope fastened to the jaw teeth, the muscles named the temporalis and the masseter, with which people chew, and which perform this work, exert a force of above 15,000 pounds. When a man, standing on his feet, leaps or springs to the height of two feet, if the weight of such a man be one hundred and fifty pounds, the muscles employed in that action will exert a force 2000 times greater, that is to say, a force of about 300,000 pounds." Thus it is, the more we inquire into the wonders and mysteries of our existence, the more perplexing and astonishing it seems to be. We meet with truths that more than puzzle our minds, and find ourselves in such a labyrinth of strange phenomena, as to excite doubts in our minds as to their veracity; "indeed," exclaims Doctor Dicks, "we can hardly believe our senses."

When these calculations are carried on for a lifetime of fifty or eighty years, they form results that are truly prodigious, and well calculated to excite sentiments of extreme amazement and wonder. A man's beard grows upwards of twenty-seven feet in a lifetime of fifty years, his finger and toe nails about seven feet in the same length of time, and it has been computed that a woman with a full and healthy head of hair has upwards of fifty-seven miles of the capillary substance vegetating upon her cranium. But we will not lengthen our article by continuing farther these strange estimates of the wonders and singularities of "the house we live in." We will write a book, some day, and enter the subject more fully, and content ourself at the present with adding one more (there is always room for one more), and close. Has anybody ever thought how much food a human being "makes way with" in one year, or how much it would amount to if estimated for a lifetime? If not, the following may prove interesting.

Let us allow two pounds and a half of food per day, which is quite a moderate estimate, for there are men who daily eat from four to five pounds, and multiply it by the number of days in one year. We have nine hundred and twelve pounds and a half, the amount eaten in this time. If now we multiply this by fifty, to make our estimates for a lifetime of fifty years, we have 45,025 pounds, or nearly twenty-three tons, of food that is eaten by a man of moderate appetite in this length of time.

What a delicate little morsel to set before a young man with the information that he is to eat and digest it before he dies. Undoubtedly, when we whisper in his ears that the glands in his mouth will secrete about two hundred and fifteen barrels of spittle to moisten and assist the swallowing of it, that his stomach will furnish two hundred and fifty barrels of gastric juice to digest it, and that about one hundred and fifty barrels of other digestive fluids and acids are necessary for the accomplishment of the process, and that enough heat is generated in the same process to raise to the boiling point one hundred and forty-six gallons, or nearly five barrels, of cold water, it will open his eyes and ears to the truth that "he is fearfully and wonderfully made." Indeed, with such abundant testimony before us, who could fail to think otherwise? Who can refrain from joining with the psalmist in his pious exclamation: "Adorable Creator! with what wonderful art hast thou formed us! Though the heavens did not exist to proclaim thy glory, though there were no created being on earth but myself, my own body might suffice to convince me that Thou art a God of unlimited power and infinite goodness."

VOL. LXXX.—7

Literary Notices.

From LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A WREATH OF RHYMES. By Millie Mayfield. A very rich and pleasing collection of graceful verses, showing a cultivated intellect, a musical ear, and a more than ordinary capacity for the free and easy management of rhyme and rhythm—the chief constituents of what may be termed poetry considered as an accomplishment.

From ALFRED MARTIEN, Philadelphia:—

GYPSY JEM; or, Willie's Revenge. By the author of "Mother's Warm Shawl." This little book is simply and naturally written, like the previous works of the author. It is just what children like to bring home from school; short, easily read, and easily remembered, with a useful lesson of kindness and love to the poor.

HANNAH'S TRIUMPHS. By Mary A. Denison. The author's purpose is a good one, but the characters and style of the book are extravagant and unnatural. No purpose of instruction can be served where the persons in a story are mere puppets. Miss Denison should draw her characters and dialogues from real life.

ANNE'S SATURDAY AFTERNOONS. By Mary A. Denison.

NELLIE WATERS. By Mary A. Denison.

SCRUB. By Mrs. C. S. Belfour.

These little books can, either of them, be read through in an hour, and will prove excellent for Sunday school libraries. Scrub is a story of a poor-house boy who made his way up by industry and integrity. The books are well bound and printed.

HARRY'S BATTLES. One of the best books of its class we have met. It is a simple story of the temptations and trials of a boy, which at first overcame him, but were afterwards conquered through the example of a schoolmate. We expect for it a large circulation. All Mr. Martien's books are attractive in their appearance.

From CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAPPELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

SLOAN'S ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW AND BUILDERS' JOURNAL. Vol. II., No. 5. A valuable number.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, and LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE POLAR WORLD: A Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," etc. Of late years much interest has been awakened concerning the polar regions of the earth, resulting, no doubt, from the various exploring expeditions which have set out for those latitudes both from this country and from England. The narratives of these expeditions have always been warmly received and eagerly read. But still our knowledge of these portions of the globe is most detached and fragmentary, and a need has been felt of something fuller and more comprehensive. This need is now supplied in the volume before us. Gathering information from all authorities, its author presents pictures of life in the polar sea, taking the entire circle, as far as discoverers have given us any information, around both the north and the south pole. Lapland, Iceland, Spitzbergen, Nova Zembla, Siberia, Kamtschatka, Alaska, Greenland, Labrador, Newfoundland, Patagonia, and Terra del

Fuego, are all in their turn described—the physical appearance of the country, its animal and vegetable life, and the inhabitants, with their manners and customs, religions and forms of government; while the vast number of illustrations which are introduced still further elucidate the text.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL. By George Eliot.

SCENES OF OLERIOAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER. By George Eliot.

ROMOLA. By George Eliot.

Harper & Brothers have published three more volumes of their cheap and elegant Library Edition of George Eliot's works, "Romola," the fifth volume of this series is, to our thinking, the best and most masterly of her productions. It is an historical novel, the scene laid in Florence late in the fifteenth century. George Eliot's writings have all the vigor and excellence of those of the very best of English authors, while they are entirely free from the blemishes of many.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE. By Mrs. Oliphant, author of "Agnes," etc. This is the nearest to a sensational novel which Mrs. Oliphant has ever produced. Her stories are always finely written and carefully elaborated—sometimes there is almost too much elaboration—but this, after the plot really begins to develop itself, becomes absorbing in its interest. Incidental to her story, she has illustrated the manifestations of a certain kind of religious fanaticism which is not peculiar to the locality which she describes, but which is manifested at times in all religions and in all countries.

PEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and other Stories. By Charles Reade. This is still another volume of Harper's cheap edition of Reade's works. With all the editions of various styles and prices, which are now being issued of this popular writer, every person should try to secure one, according to his means.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

HISTORY OF ENGLAND from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth. By James Anthony Froude, M. A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. In two volumes. Whatever opinion we may entertain as to the entire correctness of the historical views presented by Mr. Froude—so different in many of their prominent features from those that have heretofore been held by historians—we must award to him the merit of a captivating style, and of an almost unparalleled industry in the collection of those minute details which serve to give to past history the vividness and reality of present action. The thanks of the reading public are due to the American publishers for this cheap and popular edition of a work, not to be acquainted with which is evidence of an imperfect knowledge of English history.

ADVENTURES ON THE GREAT HUNTING GROUNDS OF THE WORLD. By Victor Menier. This volume of the Illustrated Library of wonders presents to the young reader a collection, from various sources—from ancient as well as from modern travellers—of well-authenticated facts, illustrative of the nature, habits, and various modes of some of the largest and fiercest animals. It is a book that boys will read with a relish. As in all the volumes of the series, the illustrations are capital.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

JOHN PLOUGHMAN'S TALK; or, Plain Advice for Plain People. By C. H. Spurgeon. Mr. Spurgeon says: "There is no particular virtue in being seriously unreadable." Therefore, in a quaint, semi-humorous vein, he has attempted to interest his readers, and at the same time to tell many homely truths, and impart lessons of industry, honesty, temperance, and the other virtues. There is no approach to a sermon in this book. A smile will be constantly on the reader's face, while he cannot but acknowledge and feel the force of the truths which the "talks" express.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

ARMS AND ARMOR IN ANTIQUITY AND THE MIDDLE AGES. Also a Descriptive Notice of Modern Weapons. Translated from the French by M. P. Lacombe, and with a Preface, Notes, and one additional Chapter on Arms and Armor in England. By Charles Boutell, M. A., author of "English Heraldry," etc.

METEORS, AEROLITES, STORMS, AND ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENA. From the French of Zürcher and Margollé. By William Lackland. Into the nature of the contents of these two books their titles, as we have given them, will afford sufficient insight. As with the other volumes of the most interesting series to which they belong—"The Illustrated Library of Wonders"—they aim to popularize, both by copies and finely-engraved illustrations, and by simplicity of style and expression, subjects which, divested of the technicalities of science, are of the greatest interest to the mass of readers, old as well as young.

APPLETON'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC for 1870. Edited by Miss Susan Fenimore Cooper. This is a beautiful annual, containing twelve full-page illustrations by Darley, besides numerous other handsome engravings. As a work of art it will not disgrace any parlor table.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part, No. 7. For furnishing a variety, amount, and excellence of reading, and for beauty of illustration, Appleton's Journal is not surpassed. It is issued weekly, and when bound in monthly parts, each part forms quite a volume by itself. This part contains a beautiful steel engraving of Lake George after a painting by J. W. Casilear.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE AMERICAN HOUSEWIFE AND KITCHEN DIRECTORY. Young housekeepers who wish to find a cook-book which shall aid them in obtaining a practical knowledge of cookery, will find this volume just what they require. Its receipts, in all branches of cooking, are full, plain, practical, and economical.

THE YOUNG DEBATER AND CHAIRMAN'S ASSISTANT. By an Ex-Member of the Philadelphia Bar. This book contains instructions how to form and conduct societies, clubs, and other organized associations. It also gives full rules of order for the government of their business and debates, together with much other important and interesting matter of a like character.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. S. CLAXTON, Philadelphia:—

THE METHOD OF THE DIVINE GOVERNMENT, Physical and Moral. By James McCosh, LL. D., President of the College of New Jersey. We believe that this work, published in Scotland in 1850, and now in its eighth edition, is the first of that series of dissertations upon natural theology which have distinguished the name of Dr. McCosh. He is one of the ablest defenders of orthodoxy which this generation has produced. In this book he examines the evidences which Nature and the constitution of man afford concerning the character of the Deity. His conclusion is that their united testimony sustains the account of Revelation. Dr. McCosh writes in a simple, easy style; and though he lacks the matchless lucidity and grace of a contemporary philosopher, his works will be found pleasant and instructive reading. He has within a year become an American. We congratulate the College of New Jersey on obtaining so illustrious a President.

TIBBY THE OHARWOMAN and her Friends. By P. E. S. A short story, apparently written for a religious newspaper, and incorporated with other articles in this little volume.

THE CROWN WITHOUT THE CONFLICT. By the Rev. R. H. Lunder.

LITTLE DROPS OF RAIN. By the author of "Nell's Mission." The story of a girl who, after a pleasant and conspicuous school life, came back to a household oppressed by poverty and without a head. How dissatisfied Elsie was at first, and how she learned to fill her mother's place, are well and simply told.

SHINING LIGHT. By the author of "Hedley Vicars."

From KIMMEL & FORSTER, New York:—
THE REALM OF THE QUEEN OF FLOWERS. THE AMERICAN BOY. DISSECTING PUZZLE OF ANIMALS.

From our Fashion publishers we have received three diversions for the holidays, that seem to us as beautiful and attractive as anything in the toy shops. The first is called "The Realm of the Queen of Flowers." The book contains four cartoons, representing vases, baskets, and wreaths, with a great variety of beautifully painted flowers. Silts are cut in the cartoons, and the flowers arranged in them at the taste of the owner, either in consonance with the season, or in contrast of colors and shapes. The sentiment conveyed by each flower is explained in a little pamphlet accompanying the cartoons. The "American Boy" is a pasteboard doll, with many changes of costume, handsome and brilliant dresses that delight children. The "Dissecting Puzzle" is amusing and curious. It consists of six wild animals, divided into numbered parts. The players draw these numbers from a bag, and the one who first makes a perfect animal wins the game. We recommend all our friends, who are doubting what Christmas presents to give their children, to look at these pretty amusements.

From the AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, New York, through the Pennsylvania Branch, 1407 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

LOTTIE LANE; or, "By their Fruits shall Ye Know them." By Mrs. M. E. Berry. We are told by a little girl, who seems to have been much interested in reading it, that this is "a very nice book." As it was written for the benefit of just such little critics as the one whose opinion of it we have asked, we deem ourselves justified, from her favorable judgment, to recommend it to the attention of parents generally.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through OLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAPPELFINGER, J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., and D. ASHMEAD, Philadelphia:—

HOW CHARLEY ROBERTS BECAME A MAN. By the author of "Forrest Mills."

HOW EVA ROBERTS GAINED HER EDUCATION. By the author of "Forrest Mills."

Two entertaining and instructive stories; one intended for boys, and the other for girls. They are the opening volumes of a series entitled "The Charley Roberts Series."

LIGHTNING EXPRESS; or, The Rival Academies. By Oliver Optic.

THROUGH BY DAYLIGHT; or, The Young Engineer of the Lake Shore Railroad. By Oliver Optic.

ON TIME; or, The Young Captain of the Ucayga Steamer. By Oliver Optic.

SWITCH OFF; or, The War of the Students. By Oliver Optic.

Among the many writers for children, there is no one who seems to understand what boy nature requires—what will benefit it and at the same time interest it—so well as Oliver Optic. His stories are not merely pleasant fictions; but are well written, with a well-defined purpose, which is admirably carried out. This set—"The Lake Shore Series"—is a beautiful one in appearance, and will make, either complete, or any one volume singly, an appropriate holiday gift.

DOTTY DIMPLE'S FLYAWAY. By Sophie MAY, author of "Little Prudy Stories." Illustrated. This little book completes the set of six volumes which compose the "Dotty Dimple Series." They are highly entertaining to the little folks, and will form a pretty and welcome Christmas gift.

THE BOY FARMERS OF ELM ISLAND. By Rev. Elijah Kellogg. The boy farmers of Elm Island did not have just the same experience that boy farmers have now-a-days. They went fishing and hunting, and had adventures of all sorts; not doing these things in sport, but seriously and earnestly to raise means, first, to pay for their island home, and then to render that home comfortable and attractive. The lessons of energy and perseverance the book teaches will not, we trust, be thrown away on its young readers.

THE YOUNG DETECTIVE; or, Which Won? By Rosa Abbott. The story of an active, energetic, wide-awake lad, who, by becoming an amateur detective, not only brings the career of two wicked men to a close, but at the same time saves the life of one person, and checks the downward course of another just as he is entering on a life of crime. This is the fifth and last but one of the "Rosa Abbott Series," a series which has been justly popular with the young folks thus far.

From ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

LITTLE WOMEN. Part Second. By Louisa M. Alcott. We noticed a year ago the first part of this charming book. Since that time the public has ratified the verdict of the critics. The story of Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy is in thousands of households, and the call for a sequel to their early life was very loud. Miss Alcott has gratified the universal desire, and the second part is worthy of the first. The children are girls and women here. Jo becomes an authoress, and marries a professor. Meg and Amy are matrons, too, when the book closes, and pure-hearted little Beth has gone from the family circle. No commendation of the story is needed. It will be a favorite with hundreds of children these holidays.

LETTERS OF MADAME DE SEVIGNE. Edited by Mrs. Hale. Revised edition.

LETTERS OF LADY MONTAGU. Edited by Mrs. Hale. Revised edition.

Messrs. Roberts have made almost a specialty of the writings of women. We notice no less than nine volumes by or about them now published by this enterprising firm. They have placed these books at the head of their list. It seems eminently fit that the writings of the two great literary women of their time—one of the seventeenth, one of the eighteenth century—should be studied by their successors in the nineteenth. Already these works have passed into a second edition. The handsome binding and clear print combine with the intrinsic excellence of the contents to render them a most valuable present for the holidays.

NIDWORTH AND HIS THREE MAGIC WANDS. By E. Prentiss, author of "Susy Borks," etc. A truly excellent little story, inculcating the moral that the love which springs from unselfishness is a possession to be prized far above riches and wisdom alone.

THE WRITINGS OF MADAME SWETCHINE. Edited by Count de Falloux of the French Academy. Translated by H. W. Preston. The success which attended the publication of Madame Swetchine's "Life and Letters" has led to the issuing of this compact, little volume, which contains some portions of her graver writings. Its contents embrace detached thoughts expressed with epigrammatic terseness on various subjects, and two noble, though fragmentary essays on "Old Age" and "Resignation."

GERMAN TALES. By Berthold Auerbach. With an Introduction by Charles C. Shackford. Another of the delightful "Handy Volume Series," so neat in typography, tasteful in binding, and convenient in size and form. In our judgment, the five tales it contains will obtain a wider popularity with American readers than any of Auerbach's productions we have as yet seen in an English dress.

From FIELDS, OSGOOD, & Co., Boston, through TURNER BROTHERS & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE ATLANTIC ALMANAC for 1870. The "Atlantic Almanac" contains much valuable, interesting, and amusing matter, and is illustrated by numerous pleasing wood-cuts. The colored plates, however—especially the frontispiece—are very inferior, and the actual value of the book would be increased if they had been omitted.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

JANUARY, 1870.

FORTIETH YEAR.

A HAPPY New Year to all! After forty years of pleasant service, we present our lady subscribers with the portrait of the old man as he looks now. It may seem like a piece of personal vanity, but we do not think so. We have been corresponding in a friendly way with some hundreds of thousands of the ladies of this blessed country, and we know from the frequent applications we have for photographs that they wish to know what we look like, and here we give them the counterfeit presentment in pretty good order after forty years' work on his and the ladies' own book. There is no other instance in this country of a magazine started and continued by the same person for forty years—every number superintended by himself, and at the present moment feeling strong enough to continue it for forty years more.

The LADY'S BOOK was organized for the express purpose of exercising a salutary influence over the moral, intellectual, and social characteristics of women; developing, refining, and elevating the sentiments and sympathies of her nature, and preparing her for the duties and offices which give pleasure to domestic life. To succeed in this object, we have called to our assistance the best and most efficient talent in the country. There is not a department in which the women of America of any class can possess interest, be it useful or ornamental, to which attention is not paid.

We have been cheered in our labors by the women of America. The thousands of letters we have on file from them are a treasure to us of their confidence in whatever they in their good, warm hearts consider as true to their advancement in life. We look with pride over the many years that we have sat in our Arm-Chair and attended to this correspondence—years that have been filled with many pleasant occurrences. It is with these feelings that we have yielded to many friendly requests for our picture, and have given them a steel plate correct in all its points.

In presenting the January number to our friends, we are confident that high praise will be bestowed upon it. We know that our illustrations are from the best artists; that our literary matter is from the best magazine writers; that our fashion department is edited by one every way competent to fulfil the expectations of those ladies who look for a guide in the art of dressing with taste; in fact, that nothing has been spared to make it a number that will challenge the criticism of the country.

It stands foremost among the fashion books of the day, and no lady should be without it.—Champion, Milton, Canada.

THE TITLE-PAGE FOR 1870.—This is certainly a handsome steel plate. It consists of five tableaux emblematic of winter. Our steel plate title-page is one of the best features of the book. Ilman Brothers are the artists.

No well-regulated house with young ladies should be without it, if they wish to keep posted.—Times, McLeansboro, Illinois.

This magazine is the standard fashion monthly of America, and is always on time.—Bulletin, Leavenworth, Kansas.

CLUBS.—We thank our friends for their prompt sending in of their clubs. It enables us to get our books in order for an early delivery.

It is surprising how well this old monthly sustains itself. An examination shows that with age it increases in vigor, taste, and importance. It is almost as essential to the household as a cooking stove, and we believe the expenditure for it should always precede the purchase of a cradle. It saves many times its cost every year in patterns and suggestions in regard to buying and manufacturing goods for the family.—Sentinel, Edina, Mo.

OUR subscribers will perceive that we continue to present them with a sheet of embroideries and other useful articles.

There is in it something entertaining and instructive for every one.—Tribune, Welland, Canada.

A PRESENT FOR A LADY.—Did it ever strike any of our young friends that they could not make a more agreeable Christmas or New Year's present to a young lady than a year's subscription to the LADY'S BOOK? Will it not monthly call the donor to their remembrance, and will they not be particularly gratified in receiving so useful a present?

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.—Apply to your postmaster for a postal money order. No more losses by mail.

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1, nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge shall be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

"THE CHILDREN'S HOUR" FOR JANUARY.—"We have seen this number of which the Sunday School Times calls the "best magazine for children in the world," and pronounce it the most beautiful and attractive number of a child's periodical we have ever seen. Among the illustrations are four exquisite pictures by Bensell, representing Longfellow and his children as imagined in that charming poem, commencing:—

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupation
That is known as the children's hour."

They have been engraved by Lauderbach in his admirable style. Then there are two full page pictures, "Going to School," and "Coming From School," that will win every mother's heart. Be sure to get this January number. It will be found at all news dealers, and costs 15 cents; or you can send to the publisher for it. It is worth twice that sum. "The Children's Hour" is published by T. S. Arthur & Son, Philadelphia, at $1 25 a year. We send this magazine and LADY'S BOOK for $3 50 a year. Any subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK who has not ordered it can do so through us at $1. If you have children, don't fail to add this pure and sweet magazine to their stock of reading.

I CAN inform any one interested of hundreds of WHEELER & WILSON Machines of twelve years wear, that to day are in better working condition than one entirely new. I have often driven one of them at a speed of eleven hundred stitches a minute. I have repaired fifteen different kinds of Sewing Machines, and I have found yours to wear better than any others. With ten years' experience in Sewing Machines of different kinds, yours has stood the most and severest test for durability and simplicity.

GEO. L. CLARK, Lyndenville, N. Y.

Godey more than maintains its prestige as the foremost ladies' periodical of America.—City and County, Nyaak, N. Y.

THE Gentleman's Slipper, printed in colors, is another useful attraction. Instructions as to colors will be found in the work-department.

A favorite in almost every household, South and North.—Herald, Mechanic's Falls, Maine.

CLUBS! CLUBS!—Begin now to form your clubs. The first to form a club is apt to succeed. Many ladies have written us that they find it easier to raise a club for the LADY'S BOOK, on account of its faithfulness in adhering to promises, than any other magazine. In remitting, send us a post-office order or a draft on Philadelphia or New York; or, if neither of these can be procured, greenbacks or National Bank notes will do. Give Town, County, and State in your letter. We will send to any post-office where the subscriber may reside. See Terms on second page of cover.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY.—1870 will be the great year of this favorite periodical. Nearly double the former quantity of music will be given in every number. Brilliant music for good performers, easy music for beginners, fantasies, transcriptions, polkas, waltzes, galops, songs, duets, quartets, etc., by all the famous composers of Europe and America. One brilliant Salon piece, worth 50 to 75 cents, in every number; one or two easy pieces for beginners, in every number; two vocal pieces, songs, duets, or quartets, in every number; one sacred song, harmonized for four voices, in every number. In short, we are determined to keep Holloway's Musical Monthly ahead of all competition.

Contents of January number.—The Fairy Sprite, brilliant and showy parlor piece by E. Mack. Tassels on the Boots, easy arrangement for beginners. Little Maggie May, beautiful song. Rejoicing Galop, duet for Piano and Flute, or Violin. Pulling Hard Against the Stream, splendid song and chorus, for four voices. Still Closer to Jesus, beautiful piece for Sunday schools or the social circle. This music in the stores would cost between $2 and $3. In the Monthly it costs less than 33 cents. Every number is printed on sheet music paper from engraved plates of the full sheet music size.

Terms and Premiums.—Single subscription $4 per annum. Single numbers 40 cents. As a premium we send to single subscribers one dollar's worth of new music free. For two subscribers five dollars' worth of new music from our catalogue free. Two subscribers, without the premium, $7. Five, without premium, $15, or only $3 each. Agents and canvassers wanted in every town and village. Send 40 cents for specimen, with prospectus and terms.

One entire year, free.—Any one ordering direct from us during the present month six dollars' worth of sheet music will receive as a premium the Monthly for 1870 free. A splendid holiday present. Address orders only to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

SIR JOHN HERSCHEL always maintained that the moon was a furnace—so hot a place that nothing could live under its torrid influence. Captain John Ericsson, whose ability no one disputes, declares that the moon's surface is one mass of solid ice. When such men disagree, who shall decide?

"ONCE A MONTH."—We call special attention to the Prospectus of "ONCE A MONTH" for 1870, to be found in the December number of the LADY'S BOOK. It is to be enlarged and liberally illustrated. For cheapness, typographical beauty, and rare excellence of reading matter, it is not surpassed by any magazine in the country. We will send this magazine and LADY'S BOOK one year for $4.

Godey is the brightest gem in the literary diadem of America, and such a gem as should find a setting in every well-regulated household in the land.—Freeman, Ebersburg, Pa.

Sparkling with its accustomed freight of choice literature.—Examiner, Frederick, Md.

FREIGHT ON LETTERS AND PREMIUM ON DRAFTS.—We wish our subscribers distinctly to understand, that when they send their letters by express company they must pay the freight, and those who send drafts must pay the premium. We advise subscribers to remit by mail a post-office order or a draft payable to the order of L. A. GODEY. Should either be lost, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

GODEY FOR 1870.—We call attention to our advertisement for 1870 on the second page of the cover.

THE MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN COMPANY.—In the course of less than twenty years this company have grown from a very small beginning to be the most celebrated and extensive makers of instruments of the organ and melodeon kinds in the world. They make first-class organs only, and of these produce and sell more than six thousand per annum. Yet, so well is the reputation of their work established, and so great the demand for it, that, notwithstanding this enormous production, they are constantly receiving orders, and it is often necessary to wait several weeks to obtain one of their instruments. Their organs rank highest, not only in this country, but in Europe, where the demand for them is rapidly increasing.

This remarkable success is undoubtedly owing greatly to their superior skill in this specialty, and to the very important improvements they have effected, but it is the result, almost in equal measure, perhaps, of adherence to, and an energetic pursuit of certain principles. Inflexible rules with them are (1) to do the very best work only, availing themselves of every improvement, and being careful to suffer no inferior instrument to leave their factory; and (2) to sell always at smallest remunerative profits, having fixed prices, which are alike to all.

Any one buying an organ made by this company has the satisfaction of knowing that he has one of the best instruments of the class which can be made, and this at the lowest price at which such work can be afforded.

MR. BRYANT recently thus advised a young newspaper contributor: "My young friend, I observe that you have used several French expressions in your article. I think if you will study the English language, that you will find it capable of expressing all the ideas you may have. I have always found it so, and in all that I have written, I do not recall an instance where I was tempted to use a foreign word, but that, on searching, I found a better one in my own language."

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVING.—We have received from Messrs. T. S. ARTHUR & SONS a copy of their premium engraving for 1870. It is called "BED-TIME," and will by many be regarded as more beautiful and artistic than "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," their picture for last year, which proved so great a favorite. "Bed-Time" represents a mother with her sleeping babe in her arms, carrying it lovingly to its nightly resting place; and the artist has given it a tender interest that wins the heart of every lover of children. It is large and richly engraved, and when framed will make an ornament fit to grace any parlor in the land. This picture is given as a premium to all who make up clubs for Arthur's Home Magazine (the best two dollar ladies' magazine in America) The Children's Hour, or Once a Month. Every subscriber to these magazines has the privilege of buying this elegant picture for $1—the regular selling price is $2 50.

"REALLY, my dear," said poor Mr. Jones to his better half, "you have sadly disappointed me. I once thought you a jewel of a woman; but you've turned out only a bit of matrimonial paste." "Then, my love," was the reply, "console yourself with the idea that paste is very adhesive, and will stick to you as long as you live."

A CHEERFUL RELIGION.—Let men be taught to know there is as much religion in the good, robust, rejoicing enthusiastic singing of God's praise, as in the sedate and doleful style that is usually styled the most devotional; let them know that the earnest prayer need not be a drawing jeremiad; let them feel that good Gospel preaching may be in as sprightly delivery of pleasant truths, more than in a whining recitation of inanities; let them believe that Christianity is a live thing, that it is in sympathy with the active, rejoicing spirit of our humanity, and it will be better commended to their acceptance. Seriousness ought always to characterize the Christian. But seriousness does not consist in sullenness, moroseness, or even in the sobriety that drives away smiles and the taste for rational pleasure. He is most serious who best brings an earnest, healthy, rejoicing nature to the performance of his duty. Men are most beautifully serious when truthful smiles are playing on their lips, and when their whole countenances are lighted up with a benignant joy. It ought, therefore, to be the effort of professing Christians to pass through the world so happily as to light it up and fill it with joy. They ought to sing in the midst of judgments, and to sing loudly and cheerily and constantly amid their marvellous benefits. We pass to a kingdom, out of sadness and sorrow, where there will be no sorrow nor sighing. Passing to that place, let us cultivate the spirit that is to distinguish us when we arrive there, and show that we do really begin our heaven on the earth.

THE MODEL FRENCH WOMAN.—We read a good deal of the other type of French woman—of the one here described, and certainly existing only too rarely. Her accomplishments repose on the solid basis of scientific methods, and are enhanced by native good taste. At her birth the muses, the graces, and Minerva were agreed to concentrate equally in furnishing her brain, and to take part in stimulating the different organs they are supposed to preside over, so that she attracts and charms all within her range who are not wrong-headed and wrong-beheaded. Her demeanor is simple and modest. The eye expresses sweetness and serenity. She is elegant without extravagance; quick-witted without cunning; amiable without girlishness; ready without pertness; fluent in conversation, listens attentively, answers correctly, suggests, inspires, and avoids with delight. Not touching upon any sore or disagreeable subject. This model French woman whose portrait I take from life, can also prattle pleasantly with her neighbors without ever betraying impertinent curiosity, or being led into backbiting an absent person. She has a quick sense of the ridiculous; but fearing that it might sometimes run counter to the laws of hospitality, has made a rule which is rigorously adhered to, never to laugh at the weaknesses of any acquaintance within twenty-four hours of the time he was her guest. The English woman, while she abdicates her place in society, is too often the tyrant of her daughters, and acquires the manners, appearance, and cross temper of an upper nurse. In the case of my model French woman it is quite different. She has not many children, but she adores the few that are around her, directs their education with masterly ability, administers a large establishment, checks the clerk's books in the office, and to reconcile French customs with what she feels to be the right thing, invites often to her table young men of promise, two of whom, in the natural course of things, will be the husbands, four or five years hence, of Louise and Amelia, her daughters. Madame Victor Hugo was a woman to whom this description might apply.

WASHINGTON IRVING related that he was once riding with Tom Moore in the streets of Paris, when the hackney coach went suddenly into a deep rut, out of which it came with such a jolt as to send their heads against the roof. "By Jove! I've got it," cried Moore, clapping his hands with great glee. "Got what?" said Irving. "Why," said the poet, "that word I've been hunting for for six weeks to complete my last song. That rascally driver has jolted it out of me."

NEW SWEET MUSIC.—New Songs, etc., published by Starr Holloway, Philadelphia. While Shepherds feed their Flocks by night, beautiful quartet, 10s and duet for soprano or tenor and contralto, 10s. W. H. W. Darley, 60 cents. Tis Sweet to be in Heaven, sacred song by Fiske, 30. The Triumph, sacred song, with beautiful picture of the Fire, Christmas song and Under the Mistletoe, by Glover, 20. Sing on the Pond, fine winter song, 30. Another song for the new year, 20. Now the Days are gone Over, song for the close of the year, 25. Christmas Bells, spirited duet and chorus, 30.

Easy pieces for beginners.—Robin Adair Rondo. Day Long, easy arrangement of Foster's favorite melody. Walking Up Chestnut Street Polka. Goes a Ringing for Sarah Waltz. Up in a Ballooning. Flying Trapeze Redowa. Each 20s, or the six for $1.

Pieces more advanced.—Kris Kringle March, with picture title of the merry old fellow, 50. Snow-White, by Brinley Richards, picture title, 50. (Holloway's is the only illustrated edition.) Cradle Song, by Spencer, illustrated, 50. Forget Me Not, picture, illustrated, 60. Merry Yule Mazourka, picture, 80. Blue Bells of Scotland, brilliant arrangement by Robinson, 75. Christmas Chimes, by Richards, 50. Holiday Hours, bagatelle in G major, Glover's melody of Under the Mistletoe, picture title, 40.

Each forms an elegant and appropriate Holiday gift, and the above list offers a choice variety. At $10 worth are ordered, whether from our list or we will bind the same in neat binding free of cost and forward free of postage. When $5 worth are ordered we will mail regularly during the campaign in addition a free copy of Holloway's Monthly for 1870. Catalogues free. Address orders to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

OLD LINEN.—The women of the old town of Linen are celebrated for their art in folding linen. It is an old one, but it has, nevertheless, a certain mean celebrity on the ladies of Angers. It is not so much now as it used, and is, therefore, nearly confined to the grand old housekeepers of the grand old chateaux of the place. The linen press is of a magnificent Gothic hospital still shows some chefs d'œuvre of the kind. The good sisters throw open the doors of their immense cupboards with a natural feeling of pride, and reveal to the astonishment and admiration of the visitors the wonders of their dexterity. In a vast sheet, folded into a rough, twenty-four sheep, formed of chemises, are hanging, guarded by a night-dress in the shape of a shepherd, and so on. Linen castles, windmills, towers and abbesses are frequent tours de force of these dexterous linen folders.

THE VEGETABLE AND FLOWER GARDEN.—We are reminded of the near approach of the season for planting operations by the appearance of Practical Gardener's Calendar for 1870. Those of our readers who are interested in such matters should secure a copy for a copy to make their selections. It contains descriptive lists of Vegetable and Flower seeds, with directions for their cultivation with illustrations. Also New Plants, Roses, Verbenas, Fuchsias, Dahlias, Gladiolus—in short everything connected with Horticulture. Mr. Pezer has been very successful in sending out seeds and plants to all parts of the United States, and during his recent visit to Europe has added many novelties to his already large and varied collection.

The Calendar will be mailed to applicants by enclosing a postage stamp to his address, HENRY A. DEXTER, Philadelphia.

THE PIANOFORTE.—In 1716, Marius, a French inventor, presented to the Academy of Sciences in Paris, a clavessin, whose strings were vibrated with hammers instead of plectrums; and two years later Christoforo, a Florentine musical-instrument maker, devised some further improvements on the instrument. This has generally been considered as the first piano. In 1760, a foreigner, named Zumpo, established in England a small manufactory of these instruments, but he met with little success. Its merits were, however, clearly perceived by Haydn, Gluck also adopted the new invention, and the piano on which he composed his "Armida," and other works, made for him by John Pohlman in 1772, still exists. It is stated to be only four and a half feet in length and two feet in width, with a small square sounding-board at the end, the wire of the strings being little more than threads, and the end of a horizontal jack working on a hinge.

"The instrument," says M. Thalberg, "compared with a fine piano of the present day, is utterly insignificant and useless; and it is difficult to conceive how it could have been used for the purposes it certainly served, till we reflect upon the importance to the composer of having at instant command any description of orchestral effect."

In France the first maker of a pianoforte was Sebastian Erard, who died in Paris in 1831. Erard was the orphan child of a cabinet-maker in Strasbourg. He came to Paris when only sixteen years of age, and apprenticed himself to a harpsichord-maker, in whose employment his ingenious mind soon found means to display itself. His apprenticeship being ended, the young Strasbourg workman obtained employment from various instrument-makers, which he executed at his own home.

One day a harpsichord-maker, struck by his talent, proposed to him to make an instrument of the harpsichord kind with such improvements as the workman could suggest. Pleased with his task, although it was agreed that the instrument was to bear the name of his master only, who proposed to take the credit of the work, Erard devoted himself assiduously to the production of the instrument.

When it was completed, the musician who had purchased it was so much struck with its powers that he returned to make inquiries from the harpsichord-maker on the subject of its construction. The man, taken by surprise, was unable to reply, and was at length compelled to admit that it was entirely the work of his young journeyman.

From that time Erard's reputation began to spread. The Duchess de Villeroi, who devoted much of her fortune to the encouragement of the arts, having heard of the young artist, sent for him, and proposed to him to attempt the construction of a piano similar to those recently introduced into Saxony by Silbermann; and it was in her house in Paris that the workman designed and completed his instrument—the first ever made in France, where, indeed, it was till then almost entirely unknown. Played at the concerts given by the duchess, the instrument quickly gained in favor.

Sebastian Erard, in conjunction with his brother, Jean Baptiste, set up a manufactory in Paris to meet the demand for the instrument; and here the ingenuity of the Strasbourg workman speedily introduced such improvements that his instruments became famous throughout Europe. To Erard is due the upward bearing of the strings.

The following choice lines are from the pen of Mrs. Landon:—

Children are what the mothers are.
No fondest father's fondest care
Can fashion so the infant heart
As those creative beams that dart,
With all their hopes and fears, upon
The cradle of a sleeping son.

His startled eyes with wonder see
A father near him on his knee,
Who wishes all the while to trace
The mother in the future face;
But 'tis to her alone uprise
His wakening arms—to her those eyes
Open with joy and not surprise.

CARRIAGE HOUSE AND STABLE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 436 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

THE above was designed for a carriage-house and stable for Mr. Robbins, of Merchantville, N. J., distant three miles from Camden.

Description of Diagram.—D, E, H, and K box-stalls, 11 feet by 14 feet 6 inches; F and G open stalls, 5 feet by 8 feet 6 inches; C harness-room; A covered shed; B open space.

This design—together with the one in the November number—will produce a beautiful combination. The plan, as will be seen by the diagram, is a first-class arrangement, the stalls being of that peculiar construction known to horsemen as “box-stalls;” they are four in number; there are also two open stalls; also ample room for carriages.

The architecture is of that light and pointed style—which ever stands submissive to massive architecture—in which the horizontal and vertical lines preponderate; this style produces a sort of playful effect, suiting admirably for carriage-houses and similar buildings. In residences quantitative effects and costly appearances are requisite. We do not wish to be understood that all pointed architecture is flimsy; many examples of English

Gothic residences fully—and the example disprove; but we will assert that they are as sepulchres for burying money without displaying any equivalent. There are many buildings in the country called Gothic, beautiful when cut in that entirely disgrace the community.

When Gothic designs are called for we give them in their native grandeur and magnificence.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editors of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq. No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The Publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE.

Fig. 1.—Carriage dress of silver gray Irish poplin, made with one skirt, trimmed with a deep plaiting of blue satin, with bands of the same above, trimmed with satin rucheas. Casaque of the same forming an upper skirt, with revers turned back, trimmed with satin. Open sleeves and waist, with white muslin sleeves and chemisette. Blue velvet bonnet, trimmed with black lace and blue flowers.

Fig. 2.—Evening dress of white tarlatan, with an underskirt of pink silk, trimmed with three narrow pointed ruffles. The overdress is trimmed with four ruffles, scalloped and bound with silk. Low square corsage, with lapels, which extend down on the skirt, trimmed with flowers; the shoulders are also ornamented with bouquets as well as the front of the skirt. Hair arranged in curls, with diadem of flowers.

Fig. 3.—Visiting dress of purple satin, made with one ruffle on the skirt. A trained casaque of black velvet, open at the sides, and looped in the back, trimmed with narrow lace insertion. Purple velvet hat, trimmed with flowers and small feathers.

Fig. 4.—Dinner dress of Pomona green silk, made with a court train, trimmed with narrow ruffles. The front breadth is trimmed with three narrow ruffles and point lace. Corsage cut low square, with underwaist of white muslin, and puffed sleeves of the same. Hair arranged in curls and plaits, with diadem of ivy leaves.

Fig. 5.—Walking costume of black velvet, trimmed with a ruffle around the edge of the skirt, headed with a band of fur. Mantelet cut short in the back; deep points at the sides, trimmed with fur. Muff to correspond. Bonnet of ruby-colored velvet, trimmed with white flowers.

Fig. 6.—Costume for little girl of ruby-colored silk, trimmed with a band of gray silk, edged with quilling of ruby silk. Overskirt and lapels of the same, scalloped at the edge, and bound with silk; sash ends of same. Gray felt hat, trimmed with flowers and velvet to correspond.

DESCRIPTION OF EXTENSION SHEET.

FIRST SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Morning-robe of white cashmere, trimmed with lace insertion, lined with cherry-colored silk. It is cut with a loose camisole puffed in the back. Coat sleeve, trimmed with a deep ruffle at elbow. Lace cap, trimmed with cherry-colored velvet.

Fig. 2.—Dress of black velvet, trimmed with one ruffle on the skirt. The overskirt and waist are in one, and are turned back and faced with lilac satin. Habit shirt and sleeve of fine muslin.

Fig. 3.—Suit composed of an underskirt of blue silk, trimmed with seven narrow ruffles scalloped. Overdress of black gros grain, trimmed with one ruffle, headed with a ruche, looped in the back, and a fancy sash. Hat of black velvet, trimmed with a feather.

Fig. 4.—Visiting dress of maroon-colored silk, made with two skirts. The lower one is trimmed with a ruffle and puff, and large bows made of the silk. Upper skirt trimmed to correspond with puff in back. Plain corsage, with mantelet of same. Maroon-colored velvet bonnet, trimmed with flowers.

Fig. 5.—House dress of elderberry-colored silk poplin, made with one skirt trimmed with three ruffles, put on in deep points at intervals, and finished with a bow. Plain corsage, trimmed to represent square neck, with a short basque in back.

Fig. 6.—Walking-dress of purple cashmere, made with two skirts. The lower one is trimmed with three narrow ruffles, trimmed with narrow velvet; the upper one is edged with one ruffle. Mantle of the same, trimmed with one ruffle, crossed in front and fastened with a belt. Purple velvet hat, trimmed with flowers.

Fig. 7.—Suit of blue cloth, made with one skirt, trimmed with three ruffles. Mantle looped in the back to imitate an overskirt, and trimmed with heavy fringe. Blue velvet bonnet, trimmed with flowers of the same shade.

Fig. 8.—Suit of green Winsey, with an underskirt of green and black striped satin. The overskirt is looped in back and front in Watteau style. Cape looped in back. Black felt hat, trimmed with green.

Figs. 9, 10, 11, and 12.—Gentlemen's collars and cuffs. These collars and cuffs are for morning wear, as there is color introduced. Any one of the patterns can be forwarded.

Figs. 13 and 16.—Fashionable shaped collars for gentlemen.

Fig. 14.—Linen cuff, suitable for morning wear, fastened with three buttons.

Fig. 15.—Double cuff. This cuff consists of two halves joined together by a cross strip of linen; so that either the straight or the round part of the cuff can be worn on the hand.

Fig. 17.—Sailor collar of white linen, with border of striped linen, the same trims the habit skirt.

Fig. 18.—Bracelet of fine gold, with cameo surrounded by pearls. The Greek pattern is in black enamel. The bands crossing the bracelet are of gold, inclosing a row of pearls.

Fig. 19.—Butterfly in gold, for ornamenting the hair.

SECOND SIDE.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Front and back view of a fashionable shaped water-proof cloak. The edge can be finished plain or by a ruffle, as seen in Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.—Hood of white cashmere. This hood is trimmed with flutings of the same material as the hood, cross strips and flutings of blue satin. A puff of white cashmere, ornamented with blue satin, is sewn on in front, as well as a bow of blue satin three-fourths of an inch wide. The cape crosses in front, as can be seen on illustration. The hood fastens with a hook and eye, the sewing on of which is covered under a blue satin bow. The cape is edged all round with pinked-out white cashmere flutings and cross strips of satin.

Fig. 4.—Jacket of scarlet cashmere, trimmed with black velvet and embroidery in gay colors. The centre of basque in the back is composed entirely of black velvet and embroidery, and finished by gay colored tassels.

Fig. 5.—Necklace, in the Watteau style, composed of light chains of gold, from which are suspended medallions of flowered enamel, with framework of leaves of gold. Gold butterflies, studded with emeralds and rubies, are suspended between the medallions.

Figs. 6 and 7.—Ear-ring and medallion of enamel, with border of pearls.

Figs. 8 and 9.—Elizabethan collar and sleeve. This collar is of quite a new shape. The front part, forming revers, is turned back, whilst the back part stands up. The collar is made of muslin, with a strip of insertion four-fifths of an inch wide, and lace three-fifths of an inch wide. Fasten a red satin bow in the middle of the back of the collar, and a similar one in front. Fig 9 shows the corresponding cuff.

Fig. 10.—Dressing jacket. This pattern can be made up either in flannel, figured cambric, brillante, or piqué. It consists of three pieces—front, back, and sleeve—representing one-half of the jacket. The jacket is trimmed all round, and in the front as a square bodice. The sleeves are also ornamented as gauntlet-shaped cuffs. The style of the trimming depends on the material used for the jacket. If for flannel, either a hemmed ruche or braided band of the same is effective; but if white cambric, or any other white material, is used, the best trimming is a row of embroidery lined with colored gingham or satin ribbon.

Fig. 11.—A costume composed of a jacket cut with basques, but with full knickerbockers that are fastened immediately below the knee.

Fig. 12.—This costume is in the Scotch style, and is intended for a boy between four and five years of age. The jacket is also cut with basques, which are ornamented with braid and buttons.

Figs. 13, 14, and 15.—A new arrangement for shortening a train skirt worn with a tunic. This new arrangement is both elegant and practical. The waistband of the underskirt is provided with straps of unequal length, each having a buttonhole at the lower end. To shorten the dress you fasten the buttons placed lower down upon the dress into the buttonholes; but if you wish the dress to main long, you leave the straps unbuttoned. Our model is made of striped pearl-gray and violet silk, with border of gray lining at the top gathered on the upper part, also of gray lining; the buttons are set on over the gathers at equal distances. The tunic is of gray silk, trimmed with a fluting and bows of violet silk. The toilet must be completed by a high bodice and sash of the material of the tunic skirt.

Figs. 16 and 17.—Stuart collar and sleeve. This collar is very becoming; it consists of a strip of muslin one yard long, two inches wide, slanted off on one side from the middle toward the ends, so as to be only two-fifths of an inch wide; it is hemmed on the straight edge, and ornamented with lace two-fifths of an inch wide. On the other edge, the strip of muslin is plaited in plaits one-tenth of an inch wide, turned in the same direction, so that the strip is only twenty inches long. A second strip of muslin, only one inch and three-fifths wide, and slanted off in the same manner, is likewise edged with lace, and is plaited in box-plaits, two-fifths of an inch wide, at a distance of four-fifths of an inch from each other; the middle six box-plaits must be double. Both strips are then sewn between a double cross-band, covered with a colored satin ribbon.

Fig. 18.—Overskirt of blue satin, trimmed with narrow lace, headed with a fancy gimp. Fancy gimp bows ornament the sides and back.

Fig. 19.—Flannel skirt for a baby just shortening its clothes. It is made with a waist and short sleeve.

Fig. 20.—Fashionable shaped corset, made of fine French clotilde, trimmed with embroidered edge.

Fig. 21.—This small chemise, suitable for a child from one to two years of age, is made of fine white muslin, and the top and sleeves are trimmed with Valenciennes edging and insertion.

Fig. 22.—Jacket of black velvet, trimmed with guipure lace.

Fig. 23.—Loose walking jacket for young girl of blue cloth, cut in scallops, bound with satin, and headed with three narrow satin folds. The back is ornamented with a hood trimmed to correspond.

Fig. 24.—Lady's night-dress of fine long cloth, made with plaited front, cut surplice, and trimmed with fine embroidery. Coat sleeve, trimmed to correspond.

Fig. 25.—Corset cover, cut square in the neck, a yoke being formed of small puffs. Puffed sleeve, edged with a narrow embroidered trimming.

Fig. 26.—Short basque, made of black velvet, trimmed with satin. This is fastened on a waist-band, and can be worn with any colored dress.

Fig. 27.—Waist of black silk, trimmed with blue velvet, embroidered in white. This can be worn with a black or blue skirt.

Fig. 28.—Chemise for a girl of five, made of long cloth, with embroidered band and sleeves.

Fig. 29.—Apron for a girl of seven, made of French muslin; the edge of the apron is trimmed with a ruffle formed of lace insertion and edging. The bretelles are formed of the same, with a piece put in front and back to have the appearance of a square neck. This apron is particularly pretty worn over a bright-colored silk dress.

CASQUE AND BASQUINE.

(See Engravings, Page 26.)

Figs. 1 and 3.—Casque for an elderly lady. This casque partially fits the figure, and has a Watteau basquine at the back. The material is black cloth, and the trimming consists of a four inch frill, headed with a plaiting of cloth. The bodice is encased with a plaiting, bordered at both sides with guipure. This describes a pointed cape on the front and back, and terminates with a butterfly bow at the waist.

Fig. 2.—Basquine of plaid cloth. The newest form of out-door covering in plaid costumes is given in Fig. 2. Our model is made of green and black plaid; in front it is cut in the form of a casaque, loose to the figure, but is tightened with the waist-band, which is black satin, corded with green. The back is ornamented with a wide Watteau plait, which is fastened at the top with a double loop of satin and a rich plaque of gimp, terminating with fringe. The trimming of this casaque consists of a wide band of black satin, edged with green satin.

CHIGNONS.

(See Engravings, Page 27.)

Figs. 1, 2, 3, and 4.—Four chignons. All these chignons are arranged upon a comb, so that they can be fastened on the head without the slightest difficulty. They can likewise be removed as easily. The Oreole chignon is made of crêpé hair, which is boiled when stiffly plaited, so that it long retains the wave. The curled chignon is treated in a similar manner. Both these are for young people. The remaining three are plaited, and can be worn by ladies of maturer years. False hair is still very extensively worn, and there appears no probability at present of its going out of fashion.

CHILDREN'S DRESSES.

Fig. 1.—Suit for a girl twelve years old. The dress is made of blue silk poplin; the edge of the skirt cut in scallops, and bound with satin, with a deep fluting of satin below. Cloak of green and blue plaid cloth, bound with blue satin, and satin bow and ends in the back. Bonnet of blue velvet, trimmed with fine flowers.

Fig. 2.—Suit for a girl of eight years, made of silver gray poplin, trimmed with velvet of a rich shade of crimson; the dress is made with fichu, trimmed to correspond. Hat of gray felt, trimmed with crimson velvet.

Fig. 3.—Dress for a girl of striped poplin. Waterproof cloak, made with a cape. Hat of black velvet, trimmed with scarlet.

Fig. 4.—Costume for a little boy of blue navy cloth, made with a blouse and Knickerbocker pants. Hat of blue cloth.

Fig. 5.—Suit of green and black plaid. Hat of green velvet, trimmed with black.

Fig. 6.—Suit for a girl of ten years of maroon-colored reps, made with one skirt, trimmed with a ruffle bound with velvet. Watteau palette, trimmed to correspond. Hat of maroon-colored felt, trimmed with velvet.

Fig. 7.—Dress for a girl of nine years of blue and black striped satin, with an overdress of black velvet. Hat of blue velvet, with feather of blue and white.

Fig. 8.—Boy's suit of black velvet, with an overdress of purple velvet cloth.

Fig. 9.—Dress for a girl of twelve of brown Irish poplin, with one ruffle on the edge of the skirt. Basque, trimmed with same, with brown velvet sash. Hat of brown felt, trimmed with velvet.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

DINNER and evening dresses are imported in a soft thick silk of rare lustre, called drap Imperial, and the corresponding shades are shown in satins of fine quality, designed for the toilettes of the present gay season. First is ciel blue, the palest sky tint with changeful silver shimmer. Artists in colors have experimented for years to obtain this pure shade without the leaden hue or the greenish tinge that gas-light develops in many evening blues. Foamy billows of lace and ornaments of pearl should accompany this admirable color. Next to this are darker blues—royal, Mexique, and ultramarine, the shades deepening in the order mentioned. Four coral shades are shown; the first is white-coral, warmed with the merest blush of pink, scarcely deeper than a flesh tint; pink coral like the pale Neapolitan ornaments; the darker rose-coral; and the deepest red shade, so becoming to brunettes. Beyond this is the new gas-light green, verd Nile, a favorite hue with blondes; Pomona and emerald green complete the list. We also see brocaded silks; these are the first fruits of the promise made by the Empress Eugénie, as she passed through Lyons, that these brocades should be restored to favor, if it lay in her power. Plain faillé and gros-grain silk have for some years been exclusively fashionable, much to the prejudice of the Lyons manufacturers, whose special glory lay in the fabrication of the handsome sores faconnés, for the patterns of which artists of really great talents were employed. It is incalculable what an influence such or such a fashion may exercise upon a whole city of employers and workmen.

At Lyons the greater part of the town is occupied by the workmen, called canuts, whose silk machines are heard from morning till night without pause or rest. Now all these work-people's gains are remarkably reduced, when, instead of figured, they have only plain or even shot silk to manufacture. The great difference between Lyons and the great manufacturing towns in England is, that instead of being all huddled together in large manufactories, the workmen all remain in their own houses, where each has his own loom and machine. But we cannot enter here into farther details of the manufacture of silk. We fancy our lady readers will prefer reading a description of some of the twelve beautiful dresses, presented by the wives of the principal manufacturers to the Empress on the occasion of her brief flying visit to Lyons, where she only remained one whole day and night. The most magnificent of these dresses, that destined to clothe the Empress in circumstances of great ceremony, is a poult de soie, with a white ground, brocaded with bouquets of varied flowers, in the Pompadour style. These bouquets are of an exquisite, aerial lightness, and seem to tremble in the air at every movement or rustle of the rich folds of the material. There are no less than sixty different shades in the bouquets; but so softly blended are these shades of color, that there is nothing gaudy or glaring in the tout ensemble. The second dress is a damasked satin, cerise-colored, with brocaded bouquets of white silk, shaded with cerise. Then comes a white gros-grain, with white brocaded pattern, extremely distingué. This excellent reception toilette dress seemed to please her Majesty particularly. But our limits will not permit us to describe the remaining dresses.

Silks of striped velvet and satin are very elegant; in some instances both kinds of stripes are of the same color; in others, the stripes are alternately black and colored. For underskirts the stripes are very wide, for dresses they are much narrower. Figured silks are very beautiful upon white or light grounds for the evening, upon black for walking or visiting dresses. The silk droguets have colored patterns which look exactly like designs in raised silk embroidery.

We will give a few hints in regard to making house dresses. The corsage with basque is greatly worn; a favorite is a short basque two fingers deep, cut into six or eight elongated squares. The sleeves are coat-shaped, with trimming at the elbow. If it is desirable to have a more dressy corsage, cut the neck with revers, and turn back the basque in front and at the side and back seams to form similar revers.

To add to the appearance of a basque to the round waists of last winter, modistes make a plaited belt or peplum of black velvet or silk, to be worn with any dress instead of a sash. This is made of a bias strip ten inches deep behind, sloping much narrower in front. It is edged all round with narrow fringe or lace, and box-plaited upon a belt ribbon, an inch of it extending above the belt as a frill. This is effectively worn with dresses trimmed with black velvet. Another dressy novelty to be worn over silks and poplins of a solid color, is a black velvet fichu, short on the shoulders, and pointed to the belt back and front, with a deep postillion basque behind. A fringe of pear-shaped drops edges the cape, which is buttoned from the throat to the belt. Worn over heart-shaped and Pompadour corsages, this stylish cape makes a high-necked costume, and gives a variety to a limited wardrobe. The bodices for dressy toilettes are generally made open in front, either in a square shape or à châte, with revers. The chemisettes worn with such bodices are cut of the same shape; they are trimmed with a wide strip of insertion edged round the bottom with a deep border of Valenciennes lace, and round the top with a very narrow border of the same. This arrangement leaving the throat partly bare, a necklace, or a large cross, or locket is worn round the neck. When the dress is required to answer a double purpose, a plastron of the same material is made to wear underneath, so as to fill up the empty space; the dress then becomes high for the daytime. This is especially useful for the bodices, cut out square in front, and which are generally too low to wear in the daytime, in winter especially. Those open à châte, with revers, can be worn in the day with a high chemisette.

The height of elegance in carriage costumes is a trained casaque of black velvet worn over a short skirt of gros grain. For visiting and at ceremonious receptions, the train, a yard and three-quarters long, falls its full length; but for walking, it may, by a simple process, be looped into graceful and voluminous drapery shorter than the skirt beneath. A very elegant model is of Lyons velvet, trimmed with ostrich feathers and lace. Bands of ostrich feathers and bands of cock's plumes are very fashionable for trimming on velvet, silk, and velvet beaver cloths. Swan's down, white marabout, grebe feathers, and peacock's tips trim evening dresses.

A new fancy for winter bonnets is to trim them with chenille fringe, grebe, and fur to match the dress trimmings. A collar of box-plaited velvet, edged with fringe, lace, or a band of feathers, accompanies such bonnets. These collars are deep in front, and tied behind with long looped ribbon, and are intended to protect the throat exposed by the low dresses now so fashionable.

For the daytime, thick plaits are tending to supersede every other style of coiffure, while curls are preferred for the evening. But, though the chignon is less preposterous than it was, we are afraid the use of false hair is far from being abandoned. Instead of a smooth chignon, a lady buys a very thick plait, that is all. It is in fact almost impossible for any lady to compose the fashionable plaited coiffure with her own hair. It consists, at the back, of at least three long drooping loops, each formed of a massive plait of equal thickness throughout, while the front hair is arranged in raised or waved bandeaux. When the hair of the head is sufficient for the side plait, the centre one at least is almost always false, and the ambition of all votaries of fashion is now to wear plaits as enormously thick as possible. But, even when the hair is not your own, the plaits have over the enormous thick chignon the great advantage of appearing at least much more natural than it ever did.

The newest headdresses for evening wear are short coronets for the front of the head, adding nothing to the breadth. Three large carnations, with white marabout drops, tipped with crystal dew, form a coiffure to be worn in front of the chate, laine coiffure. Another is drooping fuchsias and fern leaves.

A new jacket for in-door wear is called the Hungarian. It is made of gray velvet cloth. It is very short, is hollowed into the back, and bordered with feathers of the same color. The front is ornamented with gimp ornaments. The square pockets are surrounded with a feather bordering. The sleeves are of the graceful pagoda form.

For children we have seen a few pretty toilettes, which we will endeavor to describe. For little girls of eight or ten years, very pretty costumes are made, consisting of a first skirt of gray cashmere, trimmed with three flutings of blue ribbon; and a second skirt coming down to the heading of the upper fluting. This second skirt is of blue cashmere, looped up on either side with gray ribbon. The bodice is trimmed with ribbon of the same color; the sleeves are tight-fitting at the wrists, with a fluting of ribbon. The sash, which is of wide ribbon of the same color, has several ample lappets, but no loops. A pretty little toilette of pearl gray silk poplin has a skirt entirely covered with narrow ruffles up to the edge of the tunic skirt. This tunic is of crimson silk, is rounded off at the sides, but cut square at the back; it is edged with three rows of pretty silk braid. A large and ample bow of crimson silk is placed at the back of the waist. A dress for a party is of white leno, spotted with blue. It is trimmed round the bottom with a scalloped-out border of blue silk, edged with narrow white lace. A small apron of blue silk is continued at the back into wide lapels, forming a sash bow. The apron is gracefully looped up on either side with white lace insertion, two long lapels of which fall at the back. Bretelles of blue silk, edged with lace, form the trimming of the low bodice of white.

Little boy's costumes are less varied. The Scotch style of dress is very fashionable for them this year. The short plaited skirt is in some instances made of silk poplin striped black and brown. A jacket of brown gros grain silk, with small square cut basques, is trimmed with black silk braid and buttons. The tight sleeves are trimmed to correspond at the wrists. There is no waistcoat, but a full cambric shirt shows in front. A scarf of brown silk is tied over the left shoulder. Of course, the same costume is made in the various styles of plaids.

We must ere closing speak of the Parepa-Rosa hood, manufactured by Wm. Ascouff, Buffalo, New York. These hoods are composed of small soft fleecy balls, edged with crystal drops. They are what has long been needed, a becoming covering for the head. For evening, promenade, sleighing, or skating they are admirably adapted. They can be procured in all colors, and are of a shape becoming to both old and young. We cordially recommend these hoods to our readers, feeling assured they will meet a want they have long felt. They can be purchased at all first-class dealers throughout the United States.

THE VANES.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART I.

OUR mother was a Vane. There is no better family in Virginia than hers. It has come to be the fashion in these fast days to laugh at the pretensions of the old cavalier houses and their pride of ancestry. It does seem, at the first careless glance, a queer graft to set upon a Republican stock. But to my apprehension and taste it was, in its time, a worthier, more dignified emotion than the pride of money felt by those who have scraped it together and the respect paid to it by poorer people; less observed and pitiful than the worship of golden calves—sometimes donkeys—one sees going on about him now. I have never been called haughty. I am too painfully conscious of my drawbacks—mental and spiritual—to set myself up as a model for any one. But I am glad I had a grandfather and a great-grandfather; and—I may as well be frank now I am upon the subject—glad that we can trace our lineage back for ten generations and more, to a noble English house, the head of which displayed a coronet upon his panels. Other people who are far better in every way than I cannot do this, and would not care a fig for it if they could, so you may call it one of my weaknesses if you like.

My father was comparatively a new man, his father having removed from Pennsylvania to our State when a boy. But he was intelligent, energetic, and well-bred, and by the time his children grew up they were admitted to a place in the best society the country afforded. That is saying much, for the community in which we lived was made up of gentlemen planters and their families, and had a reputation for refinement and exclusiveness enjoyed by few other sections of the country. I have heard it whispered that a coterie of antiquated spinsters, who were walking genealogical tables, looked askance at Doctor Ernest Wilbur when he began to pay open court to the elder and fairer of the two Misses Vane of Brierly, and inquired, smelling-bottle at nose and red lavender within reach, if anybody could give them any reliable information concerning his pedigree. They were among the most complaisant of the wedding-guests, however, and loud in their praises of the handsome couple and prophecies of their happy future. My father was a handsome man, but those who knew him intimately rated his physical attractions as the least of his recommendations to their favor. My mother I remember as a slight, beautiful woman with a singularly sweet, yet pensive expression of countenance. There was something mournful even in her smile, and I do not remember that she was ever merry or active. She was dependent, when she took exercise in the open air, upon her carriage and horses, and generally walked from room to room with the aid of my father's arm. Her health was always delicate, and but for her husband's care and skill, she would probably have died before she was twenty-five years of age. As it was, she lived to be thirty, and left two children, my sister Adelaide and myself. Our two brothers had preceded their mother to the grave.

I was five, Addie two, when we were thus thrown entirely upon our father for protection and guidance. The change was not so great or trying as it would have been in many households. Our father's supervision of us had always been peculiarly close and tender. We understood, in early babyhood, that we were never in his way, no matter how busy or tired he might be. Our childish ailments, with all our joys and troubles, were attended to promptly and kindly, as if he felt his ministry to be a privilege no less than a duty. He was our playfellow and guardian—in all things, our strong, unfailing friend. When we lost our other parent, we were drawn nearer to his heart; his loving smile was none the less ready because it was compassionate. In all other respects he was the same that he had always been. He never married again. We had a governess when he adjudged us old enough to learn from books, but he visited the school-room several times each day, examined us himself every night, and assumed the direction of our English and Latin studies as we advanced in years and knowledge. French and music-lessons were given us, at a heavy expense, by professors from a "Young Ladies' Seminary," several miles distant. We never entered the institution as pupils. Our father did not approve of girls' boarding-schools. In the matter of physical education he was methodical to strictness. We were trained to walk for hours through the woods and over the hills, botanizing and collecting insects for microscopic examination, and rode on horseback ten or twelve miles a day whenever the weather permitted, in company with him, a faithful groom, or one of our cousins from Brierly. This was the next plantation to ours, and belonged to our mother's only brother, Richard Vane. He had married Sophie Wilbur, our father's eldest sister, and the dearly-beloved aunt of his motherless babes. It was she who looked after our clothing and other matters in which men are usually most helpless from their ignorance of feminine mysteries. She had but one daughter of her own, and three manly sons who adored her. Two were older than Addie and I, one younger; and, as was right and fit, they were our constant playfellows—"the next best thing to very own brothers," Addie used to say. "Double cousins, don't you see? and so convenient! We couldn't live without them."

They were more and more useful as we neared womanhood. The departure of Rick and Will, the elder sons, for college, was bewailed by us as a personal affliction, and vacation was one long, glorious holiday. It was, therefore, joyful news to us when Rick announced his intention of reading medicine for a year with his uncle. He was our favorite of all our boy relatives. In appearance, his resemblance to my father was remarkable. He was a genuine Wilbur, too, in temperament—sanguine and energetic, and with all his sweetness and geniality of disposition, very firm of purpose when he had once made up his mind to do, or to obtain.

"If my boys had lived, perhaps my partiality for him would not be so decided," said my father, with a half sigh, one morning, near the close of the twelvemonth of Richard's pupilage with him. "He ought to go to Philadelphia, or, better still, as I did, to Paris, next session, but I am foolish in my unwillingness to part with him. You will miss him, too, girls. Now that you have been accustomed to expect his escort everywhere, as a matter of course, do you think you can content yourselves with sober, diffident Will and little Ernie?"

"Nobody can take Rick's place," I began, when Addie astonished us by rising hastily from the table and flying out of the room.

"Eh! what ails the child?" said my father, alarmed. "Go after her, daughter, and see if she is sick."

Women's perceptions are keener in certain matters than are those of the wisest men. Up to this instant I had never suspected that Addie's love for Rick differed in kind from mine. They had a way of pairing off together in our walks, rides, and sports. They liked the same songs and the same books, and never quarrelled. If there were a battle to be fought in defence of what he conceived to be her right, he went into it with a will, as a simple duty he had neither the desire nor ability to evade. "Rick and Addie," was a received phrase in both families. The names went as naturally together as hand and glove. And why not? Were they not almost as near akin as children of the same mother? And what was there strange in her grief at the approaching separation? She was scarcely more than a child—just eighteen—and very much addicted to having her own way. A very pretty way it was, for her heart was in the right place, whatever freaks her judgment might play. She did not like the idea of Rick's going North—was totally averse to the Paris scheme. She thought his absence unnecessary; maintained stoutly that her father was competent to instruct him in all the branches of his profession, and she was not pleased that we did not sustain her opinion. This was what I said to myself as I went to look for the runaway, and was vexed at the unreasonable tremor that shook my limbs under me.

Addie was lying upon the bed, her face hidden by the pillows, crying. But when I spoke, she sprang up and put both arms about my neck.

"O Amy! I am so happy, and yet so miserable!" she said, kissing me while she laughed and cried alternately.

"You little goose!" answered I, trying to jest, my heart dropping down, down, like a stone, until it seemed as if I should never find it again. "What nonsense you are talking! What has got into you this morning? First, you rush off like a whirlwind from your untasted breakfast, and when I run after you, expecting to find you half dead, or fainting at the least, you cry to prove that you are happy, and laugh to assure me of your unspeakable misery. This is terrifying to a sedate elder sister."

And all the time I was dreading to hear the explanation I pretended to seek, and was a more contemptible craven than ever when she clasped my neck still tighter, and, whispering in my ear, "Can't you guess it? Rick loves me, dear!" laid her burning cheek to mine, her head upon my shoulder.

I only kissed her in reply. I had no words for her. I foresaw trouble for them, and she had never known a care or a grief that the next hour could not cure. My pretty, tender blossom! the pet and the pride of our home! Could I, could the father who idolized her, bear to see her droop, maybe fade? For the girl heart was warm and deep, and her loves were not summer fancies, but a part of her being.

"Won't you say you are glad, Amy, and ask Our Heavenly Father to bless us?" she queried, looking up, amazed and pained at my silence. "He made us for, and gave us to one another, you know."

"God bless you, my precious child!" uttered I, earnestly.

No need of effort to say that. It was a prayer too often upon heart and lip.

"And Rick?" she persisted, in gentle reproach. "Why, Amy, I thought—we believed you would be delighted to have him for your real brother."

"I do love him, dearly and truly. But this is all so sudden, pet, and so strange—unnatural, I was about to say—that I do not quite know how to take it. I have always looked upon Rick and Will as too near of kin to be regarded in the light of lovers, and I imagined!"

"That I did, too!" she laughed, mischievously. "Rick and I haven't called one another 'cousin' this great while, but we never said a word of the difference in our feelings until we were riding home last night from the picnic. He was talking about going away, and—and—never mind what else."

"Yes—never mind," I said, seriously. "But, Addie, sweet, you are cousins for all that. Have you thought what papa will think of this turn of affairs? He does not approve of such intermarriages, you know." There! it was said, and my heart began to beat again, when she smiled fearlessly. Perhaps I had been scared out of my wits by a bugbear of my own creation.

"I know he says so. The sagest and best of men have their favorite prejudices. But he cannot refuse me anything—certainly not that which will make me happy for life. Wait until Rick comes to-day. He can do anything with his uncle. You'll see!"

I had not to wait. Addie did not want any more breakfast. I was to excuse her to my father as best I could, but I must go back to the dining-room, and finish the meal with him. She had an imperious, but winning style of managing everybody in the establishment, and down I went with my story but half made up. I lost the thread altogether when I met my father's anxious eyes.

"I was about to come up to you," he said. "Is Addie sick?"

"No, papa, not at all. We got to talking and—I am sorry I stayed so long. Let me give you a cup of hot coffee; yours is cold."

"It will do very well. What is the matter? Has anything happened to trouble your sister?"

I could not help smiling, perturbed though I was, at the recollection of her "so happy and so miserable." "Not exactly, sir," for his eyes were reading me through and through. "She is grieved at the prospect of Rick's leaving us. You will know all about it by and by."

There was not a tinge of color in his cheeks. "You do not mean—it cannot be! Tell me, now, child. I cannot endure suspense."

"She and Rick are very fond of one another, papa," I could do nothing but get on with the story as fast as possible. "He told her last night of his wish to marry her."

"Heaven help me! Have I been a blind idiot not to foresee and prevent this?" He got up with a look of misery that bowed him into an old man, and walked unsteadily across the floor. "Heaven help me!" he repeated, "I would sooner bury her alive."

"Papa!" I ejaculated, shocked, "Rick is worthy of her, if any man can be. You said this morning you loved him as a son."

"But never as a son-in-law. You are old and sensible enough to understand this. You told her—did you not?—that I would never give my consent?"

"I said that I feared as much."

"Tell her, now, that you know it." With that he left me.

I described the scene and repeated the message faithfully; but Addie's love for her betrothed, her confidence in his powers of persuasion, and, should these fail, in her own, were proof against discouragement.

"Wait until Rick comes. All will be right, then," was her re-assurance, and she laughed in my woe-begone countenance. "We anticipated a bit of a skirmish, for papa's notions on this subject were known to us, but we shall come out victorious. Dear, blessed papa! Does he imagine for a second that he can withstand us both?"

"He is very resolute when principle is involved," I reminded her.

"Yes, dear, but this is a professional crotchet unworthy of him. It will go down before the united forces of love and reason."

Our sewing-room adjoined my father's office, and I was in my accustomed place at my work-table that forenoon, when my father came in equipped for his day's ride, and handed me his glove to mend. He was silent and so grave that I did not speak as I performed the little task, he standing behind my chair. As I was setting the last stitch, I saw through the window Richard Vane dismount at our gate. My father drew back—a wince of pain that showed he had observed him also. Rick came up the walk with his free, easy stride, swinging his riding-whip, and Addie met him upon the front steps, putting her hand in his as a sister might. Have I told you what a fine-looking man he had grown to be? He bared his head at his cousin's approach, and the fresh wind played with his chestnut hair, which had the very shade and curl of hers. His full hazel eyes, ever ready to dance into a smile; his pure Greek profile, and the mouth bent into firm, but never unkindly lines, had their softened reflection in her lineaments. He listened attentively to her few hurried sentences, said something in rejoinder that brought a more vivid blush to her face and deeper light to her eyes, glanced at my window with a smiling nod I mistook for a salutation to myself, and returned. My father moved away into his office as I bowed.

"He is coming to see you," I said, rising to withdraw.

"Stay where you are!" he ordered, peremptorily, but, as I remembered afterwards, in an absent-minded way.

I sat down again just as a knock upon the door of the outer room was answered by my father's "Come in."

There was neither bravado nor shyness in Rick's demeanor, and his smile was hardly less sunny than usual. "Good-morning, uncle!" he said, walking up to him with outstretched hand. "Are you very angry with me?"

My father stood in the middle of the floor and had not stirred to meet him. His gaze was stern, his brows knit. I feared he would refuse the proffered hand or break into angry denunciation. But, at the clear tones, the sight of the frank innocence in the boy's face and bearing, his features relaxed. "Not angry, Rick, but grieved—more distressed than you can conceive, or I describe. Sit down." He drew him to his side upon the lounge and put his arm affectionately over his shoulder. "This thing must not be, my boy. I blame myself for not foreseeing the possibility of such a calamity as your mutual attachment, and I do censure you—if you will let me say it—I do blame you for not bearing steadily in mind what would be the folly and the wrong of a marriage with either of your cousins."

A red tint crept up to Rick's temples; but he had marvellous self-control for one so youthful. Addie had prepared him to expect opposition and rebuke, and he had brought to the ordeal the determination not to damage his suit by an intemperate word or act. "My feelings must alter materially before I can regard my love for your daughter as foolish or wrong," he said, with gentle dignity. "If you imply that I am not worthy of her affection, I grant it."

"We will not fence at arm's length, Rick. My only objection—mark it, for this shows that I consider the object insuperable—my sole objection to your marriage with my child is the closeness of your blood-relationship. You are but one remove from brother and sister—nearer than first cousins, and, were you that, I should still have serious scruples to the expediency of your union. We have studied physiology and the laws governing the well-being of the human race together long enough to understand one another on this head."

"I was not wholly unprepared to hear this, sir, for, as you say, I was acquainted with your theory respecting intermarriage. But let me be plain, too. Does it seem just or rational to destroy the happiness of two whom you love, and who love each other, for a mere professional scruple, one which is not shared by the majority of the best medical men in the land? I have looked into this subject of consanguineous marriages within the past year. I am forced to the conclusion," smiling again, "that it is a hereditary habit. I find, upon inspection of the 'Family Record' in my father's possession, that the first Vanes who emigrated to America were two brothers, John and Richard, who built Brierly and Longridge. John's eldest son married Richard's second daughter. In the next generation there was a marriage of second cousins; in the third, still in the direct line of my ancestry, one between Richard's great-grandson and John's great-granddaughter; and in the fifth my father's parents were also first cousins. It is a family trait, you see, sir. I will not say a failing. And, having showed your appreciation of the excellence of the stock by espousing a daughter of our house, you will allow me to say that we have cause to be proud of our name and our forefathers. They were upright and thoroughbred gentlemen, honored in church and state, who kept their record clean, and transmitted to us as a priceless inheritance the memory of their virtues and worthy deeds. This is not gasconade, uncle, but simple truth, so well-known I am ashamed to repeat it. Where do you discern any proof in our family history of the deleterious effects of intermarriages, even when continued, as these have been, for a long succession of generations?"

"In the insane asylum." My father's voice was low and discordant. His arm had fallen from the young man's shoulder, his eyes were fastened upon the ground, his visage was gloomy. "You have looked into this matter during the past year, you say. It has been my study for twenty years. You have perused the bald statistics of such a 'Family Register' as men are willing their children and neighbors should read. I have a record of such facts as people—fathers, husbands, and sons—keep out of writing, out of sight—when they can—out of mind. Insane people are not remarkable for longevity. There are certain affections of the brain that terminate in death as surely as in mental decadence. Do you know how many of your kindred are at present in the State lunatic asylums?"

"I have heard of but three, and their lunacy was ascribed to accidental causes." Rick, startled for a moment by his uncle's abrupt enunciation, had regained his air of hopeful composure.

"Accidental causes which developed, not implanted germs of madness. Fifteen unhappy beings whose veins are full of the pure—Heaven save the mark!—Vane blood are enrolled among the patients under treatment for insanity in the two principal asylums of Virginia. Six I have accompanied to these retreats since my connection with the family. Shall I tell you what the physician-in-chief of the larger of the two said to me when I took your cousin, Thornton Vane, to him two years ago? 'From ——— County,' he remarked, reading the certificate of lunacy I presented. 'Humph! Give my respects to the citizens of that aristocratic section, and tell them, instead of crowding our institution with their crazy people, to build a wall around the county itself.' Coarse trifling, you may think, with a subject so sad and sacred, but the truth it enforces cannot be misinterpreted. 'Accidental circumstances' will hardly explain the declamation of a family by the various forms of lunacy. Nor is this the only baneful fruit of the system of intermarriage by which your noble house has kept up its dignity. There are upon my register the names of six half-witted children—three of them in one family; three deaf and dumb, and two who were utterly idiotic from their birth."

"Impossible!" burst forth Rick, impetuously. "You have been grossly imposed upon by your informants. I have never heard a breath of these horrible tales, yet they should have reached me as readily as you. Do not believe them, sir! Ask some intelligent, truthful person, whose opportunities of inquiry and knowledge have equalled yours. Ask my father if these are not gross slanders. Why, your record would make us to be a race of mental monstrosities."

"I have not said so. But it would be hard to find another person whose facilities for gaining information upon a theme so delicate surpass mine. I have been the confidential physician of the Vane connection for twenty-five years. The race is prolific. Large families of children have been born to the heads of the various branches. It is a numerous tribe now; but—and look at this, my boy! two-thirds of them have died in infancy and childhood! The mother of the three half-witted boys buried them all before they reached the age of fifteen, and two scrofulous daughters at eighteen. There were four other children who still live, and fill respectable positions in society. One of them is a member of Congress, another an eminent clergyman. All of them rank decidedly above the medium grade of intellectual ability. Death has been very merciful to the Vanes in covering up some of the traces of the violence they have ignorantly or presumptuously done to Nature. But there are enough left to sicken one's soul. A family trait! Call it unreasoning infatuation unworthy the age in which we live, or, indeed, of any civilized era! Yet the men who practise it are renowned for their blooded horses, their fine stock of cows and pigs. The least intelligent of them can discourse by the hour upon the manifest evils of 'breeding-in-and-in!' I shock you, I see, Richard, but this is not the hour for prudish reserve. It is time the spread of this plague was stopped. I, for one, will war against it while I can speak or write. This is my decision, and it is unalterable." He arose, and Rick with him.

How alike they were as they confounded one another, with the steady resolution that betokened the same spirit in both. The idea crossed my mind then and there, as a comforting gleam, that the Wilbur blood was rich in its freshness. Might it not be an element of strength in the effete Vane organism? Had my father thought of this? Would not the suggestion temper his opposition?

Richard took different ground. "I cannot accept it, uncle! I respect your sincerity and the learning that had combined with patient research to form your views. But I do not adopt them. On the contrary, I should be disposed, were you any other man, to regard the acceptance and defence of them as an idiosyncrasy, the hobby of one whose attention had been given too long and closely to one branch of his professional studies. You told me, only yesterday, that every third person in the community was a monomaniac. I do you the justice to believe that this decision has cost you real and great pain. It grieves me to reflect that our union may be a sorrow to you, instead of the abiding joy we would make it, if we could. But your disappointment will be as nothing compared with ours, should you adhere to your purpose of dividing our lives. There is more at stake on our part than the establishment of the truth or falsity of physiological theory. You know Addie—that she does not give her love lightly; that in disallowing it you may crush her heart, blight her existence with it. She has ever been a dutiful and fond child. Would she cross your wishes now save for a matter of vital interest to her and to him whom she has chosen as her life-long mate? As for me, I have loved her, her alone, and with a full heart, fervently, since I was a boy who could just lift her over the puddles and climb trees to throw down fruit and nuts into her apron. Loved her, Uncle Ernest!"—with a rapid change from the argument he tried to keep unimpassioned to pleading that brought the tears in thick, hot clouds to my eyes—"as you loved sweet Amy Vane when she was called 'the rose of the country-side.' She—my mother has told me with prideful affection—would not listen to the objections of her ultra-patrician relatives who demanded investigation of your claims to aristocracy, declaring that any woman would be ennobled by your preference, and that if she did not marry you she would go down to her grave unwed. Will you deny the child the happiness the mother knew as the wife of him her heart—not expediency—elected as her husband? Can you show her displeasure because she is likewise faithful in love—stanch in purpose?"

"Displeasure! My poor stricken girl! Richard, you do not understand what you are doing. Would I not cut off my right hand to insure her happiness? Could I refuse her what she asks were I not morally certain that consent would work her misery?"

"I question even the probability of that, sir! I have said that I respected your scruples, but I do not recognize their relevancy to our case. There is no suspicion of insanity in our immediate family connection. If there were!"

My father had turned away from him, but I had a glimpse of his features, convulsed and dark.

"If there were," resumed Rick, who had paused, in the belief that the other was about to speak, "there would be force in your objection. I should perhaps bow to your decree."

"You acknowledge this, do you?" The voice was constrained, and, with the singular attitude of the speaker, who stood still with his back to his nephew, his arms folded and head depressed, evidently affected Richard unpleasantly, if not excited his uneasiness. He hesitated before replying.

"I cannot deny it. However we may differ respecting the lawfulness and prudence of marriage between blood-relatives, there can be no doubt in the mind of the candid student of our profession that insanity in certain forms, and under certain conditions of mind and body, is hereditary. Like consumption and scrofula, it is a transmissible taint."

"Such as you would avert from your children by every possible precaution?" questioned my father, with a keen, sudden glance.

Rick colored high. "Precaution in such a case would be but common humanity," he confessed.

"You are right," the uncle went on, rapidly. "Common humanity, then—putting paternal regard out of the question—long ago led me to compute my grandchildren's chances of life and reason. To insure their well-being so far as mortal can, I made up my mind that my children's marriage with any one of their own blood would be an evil, if not a crime. Such it is my duty, according to your own showing, to hinder by every means in my power."

And here my argument came to Richard's lips.

"But I am not a full-blooded Vane. I do not recollect that I was ever glad of it before. I am young and strong, and never had a sick day in my life. So much for the deteriorating effects of repeated intermarriage upon my father's offspring. As to mental calibre"—laughingly—"since modesty will not allow me to speak, I must refer to my college reports and the more valuable testimony of my present preceptor. My spirits are uniformly good—match my digestion, in fact. Addie—I say it without flattery to either, is your counterpart—sound in mind and body. She has inherited the constitution of the Wilburs, and their energy." Then, archly—"Their will, also, it would seem."

I could just hear the response. "She is, nevertheless, her mother's child."

"You, of all men, would be the last to object to that, sir," retorted Rick, lightly, yet with the unvarying respect that had marked his manner throughout the trying interview.

"I, of all men living, know what it signifies."

With a mighty effort, my father mastered his voice and resumed something like his accustomed manner—only so solemn and mournful I trembled before he laid both hands upon his nephew's shoulders and looked him in the eyes.

"My boy, I will confide to you the one fearful sorrow of my life—a grief so terrible I have not been brave enough to name it to another mortal in sixteen years. Addie's mother never knew a really sane moment from the hour her youngest child was born. She had had a fright before the baby came. My horse broke his bridle, one night when I was visiting a patient three miles from home, and galloped to his stable riderless. She thought he had thrown me. The nervous disorder—that was what I, with everybody else, chose to call it—induced by her agitation did not wax to its height until her confinement. When her mind went utterly astray, we gave out—her sister and I—that she was suffering from a low fever, and so secluded her from observation. It was four months before she could receive her friends. She was apparently rational, but so wan and dejected as to excite universal pity. Nobody wondered when I left the six-month old infant with her Aunt Elsie and took my Amy abroad. She was a prey to a grave type of hysteria, said Rumor, and what so beneficial in that malady as foreign travel in cheerful company? I countenanced the report, for it diverted people's minds from the truth; explained her strict seclusion and my close attendance upon her. Elsie Vane, who lived with us after her parents' death and our removal to Longridge was my only confidante, and she alone ever relieved my watch. For watch Amy we did, continually, when the paroxysms were upon her. I had been visited for five years by occasional presentiments of the coming horror—fits of nightmare that were more frequent and prolonged as I gained in knowledge of the symptoms and causes of mania. I had practiced enough of this kind among my wife's kindred. When my boys—true Vanes, both of them—died, I thanked God. Day by day—after awhile hour by hour, I could see that the shadow was creeping on apace. The accident I have alluded to accelerated its progress, but it must have overtaken her all the same. It was but a question of time."

He traversed the room several times, poured out a glass of water, and drank it before he resumed the story. "You have said truly that I loved her, and referred to her attachment for me. There was never a moment after our marriage when I would not have opened my veins, and let out every drop of my blood, if, by so doing, I could have averted sorrow and calamity from her. Man never had a truer and more devoted wife than she was to me in her lucid moments. Yet the time came when, as I dropped the opiate which was to purchase sleep for the wasted frame and temporary stupor for the tortured brain, I had to fight with the temptation to make the draught so powerful that she would never awake again in this world. Two years! two centuries of untold agony to her and to us were passed in this way. I said that I took her abroad, but it was to a noted foreign lunatic asylum, where I might have advice and assistance in my work from those who would not gossip about her 'misfortune' in the neighborhood over which she had reigned it as belle and beauty. I screened her from prying eyes and tattling tongues to the last. She was dying of consumption when I brought her back, and her mind was calmer, although at its best feeble almost to imbecility. Your parents could not but notice this, still we hid the worst from them. Her mother's last days had been marked by similar symptoms. They were not uncommon, said her relatives, frankly, without guessing the significance of the admission. 'Softening of the brain,' they denominated the state into which she at length sank. Elsie Vane sickened and died suddenly a month before her sister's decease. But the latter had grown so weak I could manage her alone. The devil, that at certain periods had possession of the beautiful body, could no longer nerve her arm to attempt my life. You know all, now!"

He sank again upon the lounge, and hid his face in his hands. In the midst of my amazement and anguish, I did not lose sight of Rick's deathly face—felt, in some imperfect sort, that he needed pity even from me, to whom the story I had heard revealed and portended so much. Was I not the maniac's daughter, the bearer of her name, and, as I had often been told—but, as I now recollected, never by my father—the child who most resembled her in person? Addie was her father's image. If this tale meant danger to her, it was something frightfully akin to doom for me. The time for the full comprehension of my share in the heritage of woe came to me afterward. I do not trust myself to write or think of that hour of sacrifice. I have never regretted my action. I have often returned thanks to Him from whom I received the strength to stand fast in my determination not to ruin another's life. But this has nothing to do with my story.

How still the office was. I could hear the ticking of the clock and the lazy hum of a great bee singing in the heart of an October rose outside the window. After a minute—it seemed much longer—there was a heavy breath drawn fitfully, as if broken by stabs of pain, and Rick moved a step nearer the bowed form that had not sighed nor stirred. "Uncle, what you did for the mother, I am ready to do for the daughter should need arise, which God forbid. But I cannot give her up."

"I will not take your answer now. I did not hope to convince you at once. Think of what I have said until to-morrow. It may be that, for her sake, your resolution will change. Do not see her again to-day. She must never hear what I have told you. It would drive her mad."

My father said this wearily, and Rick obeyed his look toward the door as a signal of dismissal. But upon the threshold he halted, glanced wistfully back, and returned. "Believe that my warmest sympathy is yours, uncle. Forgive me for having caused you this unhappiness, and let me serve you in some way. Ask anything of me short of resigning Addie, and I will do it. For Addie herself can hardly love you better than I do, doubt it as you may."

"I do not doubt it, my son. And it is I who have been most in fault. In all my dealings with her and with you—poor children! I shall never forget this." He wrung the youth's hand, and they parted without more words.

Left to himself, my father leaned back in his seat with a groan of wretchedness that brought me to his side. "Amy, Amy, forgive me!"

But when, believing his appeal was to me, I hastened to him, clung weepingly to his knees, and besought him to be comforted, he recoiled with horror in his face and tone. Then I saw that he had designed to keep back the truth from me too, that he had forgotten until I spoke that I was within hearing.

THE pith of conversation does not consist in exhibiting your own superior knowledge on matters of small importance, but in enlarging, improving, and correcting the information you possess by the authority of others.—Sir Walter Scott.

THERE is something in the pleasures of the country that reaches much beyond the gratification of the eye—a something that invigorates the mind, that erects its hopes, that allays its perturbations, that mellows its affections; and it will generally be found that our happiest schemes and wisest resolutions are formed under the mild influence of a country scene and the soft obscurities of rural retirement.—Roberts.

MY NEPHEW JOHN.

BY ANNIE L. M'GREGOR.

YOUNG folks is not as they used to be in my time, when a shillin' print was considered good enough for anybody. I have a black silk I bought years ago; and though it has been turned three times, it is just as good as when it was cut from the piece. I was a-goin' up from our place near Portland, all the way to Boston, with my nephew John. (That is me and my sister Melia.) Melia is not given to assertin' herself, and then I, bein' the owner of the place in which we live, through the will of my late husband, Timothy Starr, naturally, as head of the family, am more called upon.

John, my nephew, is in business in Boston, a very likely young man. But every spring, and sometimes in the fall, too, he comes to make me a visit. I intend to make John my heir when I die; and John is cute enough to know that, and behaves well accordingly. "John," says I to him that very mornin', "you'll keep all proper when I'm gone, and tend to sister Melia; and show her all the love and duty as lies in your power." For you see Melia was younger nor me, and I always like to remind young folks of the vanity of earthly things, it makes them thoughtful. "Yes," says he to me, "aunt, rely on me for a carryin' out all of your wishes." This was but dutiful and respectful, and as John should have said it. It showed a proper spirit, and John is all right in the main; though I can't approve of his wearin' them kid gloves of his not only on the Sabbath, but on week days as well. If his late departed father, my own Timothy's brother Joel, could be content with less, and his dear departed mother, my own Cousin Mary Ann, why couldn't he be?

I've seen my brother-in-law, Joel Starr, always on week days without any gloves at all. And very glad Sabbaths if he had a pair of woollen or thread. And here's John spurnin' woollen or anything sensible, and wearin' them kids of his at all times. It stands to reason such goings on can't last, and it is a caution the things we do see; but maybe it is because I am growin' old, and the world is passin' away from me; for John is a good boy in the main, as I have said before.

Melia wore her old brown merino she'd had five years, and I wore a green one I'd had over seven, for we'd no idea of wastin' our best clothes on the dirty cars. We'd both bought good black dresses, and, with the black silk I'd spoken of before, I expected to be very respectable.

"Aunt," says John, to me, "they won't check them boxes of yours, they'll have to go in the baggage-car and run their chance." Now, John and I had had a contest about those trunks before. John wanted me to buy new ones, but says I to him, "good enough for my father, and grandfather before him, is good enough for me. And I reckon the old trunks will serve sister Melia and me, or else we'll stay at home. For I won't pay thirty or even twenty dollars for them new-fangled things with queer locks. If you don't like our trunks, we'll stay just where we are, as it is rather late in life for us to fall in with your views."

John tried to look pleasant, though I could see he didn't like it, as he had been put out about Melia's bag before; and if I had not spoken so decided, I might have changed my mind, as I knew Melia had no notion of changin' hers, and I do like to humor the boy occasionally. He is all we've got, and he is my own husband's brother's son. Now, these trunks of my grandfather, which had been left one to me and one to sister Melia, were tolerably worn. The hide—for they were hair trunks—had been scratched off and showed the wood underneath in a great many places; and then the hinges were not as good as they make them now, so I had to have them well corded up with strong rope, which I know John did not like neither. I never had seen him so put out; and we had had some words; so, naturally, when he spoke of the trunks again I was vexed.

"John," says I to him, "I don't know what you mean by checkin'; but they're quite strong as it is, and I won't have nothin' more done. If you've no respect for your grandfather, and do not appreciate his kindness in leavin' sister Melia and me the trunks, when he had so many more grandchildren who might have been benefited by them—all I can say is I am sorry for you, and hope you may never want;" and so John didn't say anything more about them.

Now, every one who lives in New England knows the comfort of a soapstone, or if they don't, I pity them if they are at all troubled with cold feet as I am. Sister Melia and I always had strong green baize bags to carry our soapstones in. But the Christmas before this last, my niece, Patience Hardy, sent us each beautiful bags made of her own worsted work. Sister Melia had a rose worked on hers, and I had the same. For Patience Hardy is a thoughtful girl, and did not wish to make contention, and sister Melia has at times her contrary fits like other folks, though no one would believe it to look at her. We determined, sister and I, to start with our new bags, so as to let the folks in Portland see them. And then we thought we would use the green ones when we were in the cars, so as to keep them fresh for Boston.

"John," says I to him, "you put them soapstones on the stove, for they are stone cold;" and I was a-wrapping up the new bags, for we were in the cars, and they were just on the eve of startin', and Melia and I was busy makin' ourselves comfortable. I'd put the umbrellas, and shawls, and bags on the seat in front, where John was to set, and I was real glad to find it vacant to have him near us.

"Aunt," says he to me, "I can't set there. These places are reserved for the ladies and children, as bein' near the fire." It was very considerate, and I was just admirin' the thoughtfulness of the company, when a gentleman sat down right in front of us. "Sir," says I to him, "are you one of the company?" "No, ma'am. Why so?" he says. "You're sittin' in the reserved seats," says I. "They are reserved for the women and children, my nephew John told me," and I pointed to the end of the car, as John chanced to look up from his paper at that minute. "Is that so?" he says, and laughed in a way I didn't like. But seein' the soapstones were warmin', he helped me to put them in the bags, so I thought better of him, though I had many uncomfortable thoughts of John. Could it be that he did not want to set near us, and did not think us grand enough? But he was my own husband's brother's son, so I tried to check such thoughts, as I motioned him to me, and gave him a parcel of gingernuts sister Melia had put in my bag.

Though Melia is very aggravating at times, and tries my temper more nor I can well bear, John needn't have bin so set against her havin' her bag, and maybe she wouldn't have wanted it. As I have always found opposin' Melia was sure to make her more set on havin' her own way; and John should have been more considerate, particularly when it was me and not him that suffered by her perverseness. It was a very heavy bag, as it was full of bottles; but still John needn't a-minded as it was Melia, and she did it in the goodness of her heart, not knowin' what mightn't happen.

But to go on. I had beckoned John to me, and Melia was deep in her bag a-huntin' a ginger horse for a little girl opposite. For Melia is always thoughtful and fond of children, and then she was set against their cryin'. Well, she had her specs on, and was a-lookin', and huntin' (as Melia's sight is not as good as mine, though I am the elder). She was a-lookin' and huntin', when the car gave a jolt, and off went her specs, which, in tryin' to pick up, she a-most lost her seat; and then not havin' a good holt of her bag, over it went on top of me, and what didn't go over me went mostly on the floor; as the bag was chuck full, and couldn't have held any more, no how. There was a large bottle of hartshorne, which ran down the front of my dress, takin' the color clean out. It was so powerful strong, that most of the people was sneezin' like mad. I know I was wet to the skin with that and her peppermint drops, and haven't got the smell out of my gown yet, not to mention the stained breadth which I had to have turned back. You would have been surprised if you had seen all she managed to put in that bag, let alone the bottles, and there was a dozen, I'm sure. She had a pair of easy shoes, in case her feet troubled her; and she had actually brought some stockings to mend, which I was real glad she forgot, on John's account, as Melia is very set in her way when she takes a thing in her head, and young people are so proud nowadays. She had ginger horses and dogs, such as children loves, with cloves for their eyes. And, though it weren't Easter, she had colored as many as a dozen eggs. There certainly was a pound of 'lection cake, and I couldn't pretend to count the apples; they spun in all directions, and every child in the cars had some, as she found the bag was burst so bad she had to take all of them out and put them in mine.

Two of the bottles was broken, and I had all the hartshorne and peppermint drops on my dress, so there was not that to take heed of, though there was a deal more than I cared to have in my bag, as it made it a-most as full as hers had bin. John wanted to put the bag and bottles out of the window, but Melia would not agree to any such waste, and I quite sided with her. The bag was done for, anyway; though Melia was quite set on mendin' it in spite of all John could say to the contrary. He was set on gettin' rid of it, as I could see, and Melia was as firmly set the other way; so between them they had quite a time. I was real glad when they ended their contentions, and Melia kept the bag, as I had most a mind to take a ticket and go right back, I was that put out with their wrangling. After Melia was settled, and grew more reasonable, we were quite interested, and enjoyed the ride to Boston amazingly.

It was a long day's ride, and we didn't have John with us, as he was too much taken up with his papers at the other end of the car. Sister Melia is not much company at any time, but this day she talked in a way to astonish me, as she is a poor body at the best of times, and full of her notions. But she is that good in her heart, I never saw any one like her, and then she is my own mother's child, and was left to my special care by her.

"Sarah," says she to me, when she was on her dying bed, "Sarah, always be a true sister to Melia, and do your duty well by her, and God will reward you." So I always shall. I forgot to say my nephew John lived with his father's half-sister, a Mrs. Smith. She was a widow lady, having no child of her own, so she set great store by the boy, and could see no wrong in him. It was there we were going to make our visit.

We arrived all safe; and Mrs. Smith and I soon took to each other, and I soon learned to call her Jane, which was her name. City ways is so different from our ways, as I soon found out. I knew nothing at all of what was fittin' in a business man, if my nephew John was a sample. He laid in bed every morning till ten o'clock, and was out at all hours of the night, doin' I can't say what, for it certainly couldn't a-bin business. Sister Jane said it was the way with all city young men, and John was more steady than the general run. Sister Jane must know better nor me, as she was bred and brought up in the city, though I couldn't help thinkin' Jane favored him too much.

John, however, was very kind and attentive to me, helpin' me no end with my bundles, and always findin' little boys delighted to carry them home. It was wonderful how accommodatin' those little boys was, and it was wonderful too what great bargains one can make in some of those back streets in the city. I bought a whole dozen of flatirons for—well, I can't remember, but it was just a mere song. And then a whole piece of tickin' for next to nothin'. John says to me, "Aunt, where's the use of all them irons, and how 'll you get them home?" "John," says I to him, "I always takes a bargain when I see it. Young people never takes heed of anything sensible, and as to gettin' them home, leave that to me." Then I looked sort of cute at him, and says I: "John, don't you never intend to set up for yourself?" So John didn't say anythin' more.

It was one evenin' about a week before we purposed goin' home, we was settin' round the tea-table, and John, meannin' to be agreeable, was tryin' to get Melia and me to consent to going to see a French baly troop, as he called it. Findin' we were set agin encouragin' foreigners, he owned they were Americans, but gave themselves French names to please the people. City folks are that foolish; they can't stand a plain Elizabeth or Jane, but must have somethin' finer, and have even to call Maria Marry, and dear knows what else. Well, I saw sister Jane a frownin' at John, and I think Melia saw too, for she had been considerin', and at once said she would go, as Melia seldom knows her own mind unless she is opposed. I had no purpose of goin', as I am principaled against goin' out of nights, and then I didn't like the way John had asked us; it sounded more as if it were done out of wishin' to please us, than out of any wish to have us with him. I could see Melia was set on goin', so I didn't say nothin', for fear of makin' her more set still, and I was sorry to see sister Jane so flurried.

Well, Melia and John had gone; and sister Jane and I had fixed ourselves comfortable for the evenin', as we intended to wait up for them, and we knew it would be late. We had just fixed ourselves comfortable, and it was not near nine o'clock, when we heard the front door open, and Melia and John came in. I knew in a moment by Melia's voice in the entry that all was not as it should be, and then I knew that it was too early to look for them, so I was quite prepared for what followed. Melia was abusin' John in a way that I wondered he stood so well, and she talked that fast I really couldn't make out where the trouble lay. All I knew was she had seen somethin' dreadful, and was that mad—well, I never have seen anythin' madder than sister Melia is when she gets at her maddest—John didn't stay with us very long, you may be sure, and after he left Melia rather quieted down, and could give some account of herself.

She said John and she had gone to the place, and she was right pleased at seein' so many nice people, and was sorry I had not gone too. She said she noticed the people were readin' little papers, but, not havin' her specs on, she never thought of askin' John for one, as she knew she couldn't have read it even if she had of had it. It appeared an old gentleman in front of her happened to leave his seat; she just picked up the one he had been readin', wishin' to be informed on what they were all so interested in. She didn't have no specs, but the letters was so large on the top of the page, she could read the word theatre quite plain, though she almost doubted her eyes. She said she got up off of her seat a-wishin' to go home, when John appeared distressed, and made it quite plain to her that they had nothin' to do with the house, and had got in by mistake. So she was quite easy, though she said she told John that she never would have forgiven herself if by any chance she had gottin' in to such a den of iniquity.

Well, the music commenced playin', and she was feelin' more comfortable, when the painted picture she had bin lookin' at rolled up in a way that was really surprisin'. After that Melia was that excited I couldn't make out anythin' more. It appeared a lot of women came out with next to nothin' on, and jumped around. Well, Melia said she never saw anything like it. First she said she covered up her head, she was that ashamed, and then, findin' that did no good, she begged John to take her home. She was a-gettin' up out of her seat, and chanced to look towards the place where the picture had been, when she saw a woman nakeder than the first holdin' herself up in the midst of a heap of others just as bad. She just gave one screech, and it was all she could do to keep from faintin', but luckily had her hartshorne. They managed to get home somehow, Melia didn't really know how, but no doubt John had a deal of trouble with her. All sister Jane and I could say, Melia was set on leavin' for home next day. Though after awhile she quieted down, and seein' sister Jane so troubled grew more reasonable, though she hasn't got over the theatre yet, and one need only mention dancing to set her goin'. If it had have been any one but Melia, I would have been more angry with John. No doubt John was served right in takin' her, so I didn't say nothin' to him, as I knew he had had a time. And no one knows better nor me how tryin' Melia is at the best of times.

It was two evenings after this, just before ten o'clock, sister Melia and I purposed to go home the next day—I was just finishin' the roundin' of the heel of my stockin', and had put in the needles firm (sister Melia was puttin' away the work too), when we heard some one stumblin' along the hall, and my nephew John opened the door. He never came home so early, and he was flushed and heated, and I saw in a moment somethin' was wrong, as he stood staring stoopidly at us. "Aunt," says he to me, and he blurted out the words, "does you know your"—and he mentioned some heathenish woman's name, and smiled foolish like. "John! John! My husband's brother's son!" And I was so overcome I sobbed right out. "Aunt," says he to me, "do you know your"—and he mentioned the same horrid name again. At last I could stand no more, and fairly burst out cryin'.

Sister Melia and I left Boston next day as we had purposed. Somehow I can't think the same of my nephew John, though sister Jane did all she could to ease my mind. If them is city ways, the less we have to do with them the better for us. I am not sorry I went to Boston, as I learnt for myself, though I don't doubt but what John is sorry for it. All sister Jane said can't make me think John is a true son of my dear departed brother-in-law, Joel Starr.

Anyway, I have altered my purposes. Sister Melia shall have all tied up tight, till it pleases the good Lord to call her home. And she shall have the option of doin' about John as she chooses, for young folks are not as they were in my day. One thing, John shan't have that tickin', for I never saw any like it at the price. Patience Hardy, my niece, is a steady girl, and it's but right she should have the tickin'. I am sorry for John, as he is my own husband's brother's son. But I am not sorry I went to Boston, though it made me alter my mind.

EURYDICE.

BY CHARLOTTE ELEANOR NELSON.

I saw her lift it from the sward, poor little withered flower!
It had been sadly trampled on, in an untimely hour;
Gently she kissed its faded leaves, its broken petals pressed,
And with a yearning tender touch, its withered form caressed.

Sweet was the fragrance that it shed, 'though it would bloom no more,
And sweet, methinks, the memories it brought from out their store;
Or was it only pity that had such a wondrous power
To make the tears unbidden fall upon the little flower!

Perchance she knew the fable told in olden times gone by,
That still there dwelt within the flowers the spirits of the sky;
Perchance she wept for pity with the weeping spirit race,
Because some hapless lonely one had lost its dwelling place.

Alas! it might be sympathy that linked unto her fate
The little flower that told her it was cherished but too late;
Or haply some bright memory was hidden in her heart,
Deep hidden till the little flower had made the tear-drops start.

Was hers a heart whose memories lie buried till they rise
Unto the sound of music or the sight of summer skies?
And did the perfume of the flower an old, old story tell,
Just as the sea is echoed in the murmur of its shell?
Perhaps she felt the yearning that broke Orpheus' heart of love,
When crying out "Eurydice," through Rhodope's dark grove:
I wonder did the longed-for one a whispering answer send,
Or did she cry "Eurydice?" unanswered to the end?

LINES.

(On hearing a lady say she was married at Lee Church, where my mother is buried.)

A WORD may waken bitter thought,
The past comes o'er me as a spell;
That ivied church to memory brought Brings visions loved too well.

How could a marriage bell be pealed!
No, not in that sepulchral gloom,
Where earthly joy and hope are scaled
And all is death-like as the tomb!

Still like a dirge those tones must sound,
E'en echo could not waft the swell;
Those darkling yews, those shades around
Would change the triumph to a knell.

My mother, was thy grave then trod
By thoughtless foot profane?
Would that my tears could green the sod,
Alas, the wish! how vain!

And does the wild Atlantic part
That hallowed turf from me?
Yet shrined and garnered in my heart,
Remembrance dwells on thee.

On earth our ashes may not meet,
Yet when this mortal coil is o'er,
Then may our freed spirits greet
And meet to part no more.

Spotless as thou, may I be found,
Blest mother, when that hour is given!
In God my trust, in peace around,
Joining thee, beloved, in Heaven.

VÆ VICTIS.

BY SIDNEY HYDE.

WERE you ever at St. Bart's, St. Bart's on the Bay, as it is known in the provinces? It was christened St. Bartholomew, but the name being long for daily use degenerated to the more familiar appellation, and there being another town of the title in the dominion, the sobriquet became a necessity, and there is not a fisherman on the coast that would know what you meant unless you asked for "St. Bart's o' the Bay."

The town lies out on the point of a peninsula, with the bay making up on both sides, so that it is a fine show from the water with its towers and roofs, and gives the people who go by in the steamboat the idea that it is a flourishing city, whereas, when you wander up its broad streets, you find them solitary and grass-grown; while sleepy shopkeepers sit behind, or on their counters, and stare at you lazily as you pass; and the very dogs have a solemn and preoccupied air, emulated by the loafers who lounge about on the wharves, with their feet hanging over the water, idly watching the boats that come and go, and volunteering useless information to their pilots. In fact, St. Bart's is what the people of the States know of only by hearsay—a finished town.

If you had ever been under the necessity of waiting there three hours, which is not an uncommon occurrence on days when the boat has quantities of freight to discharge, you will have wondered, as you strolled through the painfully quiet highways, how human beings can ever content themselves with vegetating in such dull monotony of existence, and you will have found yourself indulging in profound speculation upon the peculiar characteristics of the provincial mind which render such towns as St. Bart's a not uncommon possibility of the United Dominion. Thence you have wandered to political economy, and have propounded to yourself problems of solemn moment upon the effects of annexation upon the Blue Nose, and his probable development from the oyster stage of his mental and national growth into the active intelligence of the native-born Yankee; and it has proved an interesting and prolific study, which you have been able to pursue upon the most philosophical hypothesis, since there are no facts nor precedents to hamper the free gauge of investigation.

But the workings of the enlightened American mind are no indication of the state into which Mrs. Rothsay was thrown when she found that the captain, her mild and inefficient husband, was ordered from his agreeable station at Plymouth, England, to lend his formidable aid to the protection of Her Majesty's dominions in the distant and almost unheard-of Province of New Brunswick.

"I have searched in vain for St.

Bartholomew," said Mrs. Rothsay to her friend, the major's wife; "but, if you will believe me, it is impossible to find it, and I very much doubt it is only a block-house in the woods, and that Laura and I shall be a prey to the panthers and bears, which roam at large over the whole of North America. But, then, it is in New Brunswick somewhere, and that must be near Boston, because it is adjacent to New England, and that is the capital, you know. I once knew an excellent woman from Boston—really very well received, my dear; the best received American I ever knew, except a gentleman who was thought a great lion for having broken the head of a gentlemanly politician, or else the politician had broken his; I don't very well remember the exact circumstances, but I know he was very well received. I met him myself at the French minister's."

It will be perceived that Mrs. Rothsay's ideas of the geography and history of the American domains of Her Majesty, not to mention the adjoining republic, were in that pleasingly misty state that is the peculiarity of the well-bred Englishwoman, to an even greater extent than of her lord and master, and Mrs. Rothsay was a lady born.

Her father was a baron, of recent creation, to be sure, but then he had been elevated to the peerage long enough for his daughter to have appeared in society as the Honorable Miss Ponsonby, and to have made what she considered an eligible match with the youngest son of a Scotch earl with ten older children. The Hon. Miss Ponsonby had been a fine looking girl, and Mrs. Rothsay was still a remarkably handsome woman, who had seen much of the world, and loved it devotedly; and had brought up her daughter Laura in the nurture and admonition of the goddess Fashion and of the deity Wealth.

She would willingly have left Laura behind her when she set forth upon her Western trip; but, unfortunately, the Ponsonbys in London were not particularly pressing in their invitations, and Laura had no special wish to spend her days in the Highlands of Scotland, where her father's relations dwelt. So it was found that a sea-voyage was of great importance for Miss Rothsay's health, and at the appointed time the captain and family set sail for Halifax in one of the Cunard steamships.

On her way "over the bay," as the New Brunswickers call the journey from St. Johns to Halifax, Mrs. Rothsay found a map upon which St. Bart's was set down, and she was rather favorably impressed with the sight which met her eye as the little steamer rounded the sandy island, which hid the town from view, and its spires and towers broke upon her astonished vision. Her illusions were speedily dispelled on landing, when the towers proved to be only the square cupolas of the court-house and market; and, in view of the commonplace and sleepy borough, she almost regretted the excitements of panthers and Indians, of which she had had time to disabuse her mind.

"I think it will be awfully dull, mamma," said Miss Rothsay, whose ideas of life were limited to ball-room experiences, and whose resources were not numerous.

"My poor girl," said her mother, sympathetically, "it is sad to think that you should have to waste your youth in such a place as this. But we can tell better what we have to endure when we are fairly established."

After some weeks of discomfort at the small tavern, as far removed as possible from the comforts of an English village inn, the captain succeeded in renting a respectable house, in which he installed his family. Mrs. Rothsay then took observations. Her situation was commonplace, but not uncomfortable. They had been able to furnish their new home quite luxuriously, and had given it an air of elegance, which Mrs. Rothsay possessed the art of shedding around her wherever she might be placed. The next thing was to find who could constitute anything worthy to be called society.

St. Bart's had been a gay town in its day, when it had been the emporium of the quarter, and the centre of trade and fashion. It was still the county-seat, and old barristers would relate tales of the grand manners of the Heronshaws, of the stately dinners of the Blatherswaites; and mention with a sigh the names of Wynclyff's beautiful daughters, who had all married with the best people in the provinces, and had gone—one to Toronto, another to Montreal, a third to Quebec, while one, the youngest and loveliest, had wedded an English peer. But the grand dinners were over, and the Heronshaws had died out, and the Wynclyff descendants were scattered, and only here and there an ancient spinster represented the dignity of a once mighty family. There was the rector. He, of course, was a gentleman, and had been educated at Oxford; but he was prosy and old, and had a stout wife and two awkward daughters. There was a meek little curate, and a sprinkling of lawyers when the court was in session, and there was the doctor, whom people called very clever, but who cared very little for company, and devoted himself to his profession. Besides all these there were a few young officers belonging to the garrison, all very undesirable "parties" for Laura, and a few gentlemen "in trade," whom Mrs. Rothsay scorned in her inmost heart, and felt called upon to treat with distant politeness, being determined they should never darken her doors.

The rector's wife gave stupid little parties, where the older people yawned, and the young officers danced with the badly-dressed girls, and turned their innocent heads with hackneyed compliments. The first time that Miss Rothsay appeared at one of these entertainments, she made a great sensation. The six young officers fell madly in love with her at once, and she became a belle.

Laura was not averse to the position. She had never been noticed much in London, and had thought herself very fortunate if she could get three or four partners an evening at the routs and balls at which she had been conscientiously exhibited by her mamma. So that she was not at all indifferent to the honor of being thought the most stylish girl in St. Bart's; and she wore coquettish little costumes, and donned the latest London fashions, of which they had not even heard in the provinces, till the dawdies copied her, and the young men smirked and ogled when she passed. All this was well enough. Mrs. Rothsay smiled a superior smile; but she felt, and Laura felt, that this did not mean business, and business both in the mother's and daughter's eyes meant to achieve an establishment.

Miss Rothsay went to daily service at the Established Church, and was an excellent churchwoman in her own eyes. They had a pretty little chapel at St. Bart's built of native woods, oiled and varnished, which made a very charming effect, though the materials were only simple pine, and cherry, and walnut. But the graceful arches of golden brown, the dark fretted roof inlaid with designs in a more delicate-colored wood, the softly-shaded walls, and the bright-tinted windows made of this village temple a lovely place of worship.

So thought Laura Rothsay as she rose from her knees one Sunday morning, and saw the sun streaming in at the open door. Her next thought was of a less exalted cast, and referred to her bonnet ribbons, which she arranged complacently with a coquettish toss for the benefit of a strange gentleman who was leaning against one of the pillars near the door, and looking at her.

That is, she thought he was looking at her, and so did he too, but his eyes were really resting on the face of a tall, grave, dark-eyed girl in the pew behind Mrs. Rothsay's. The gentleman was a new-comer in St. Bart's; but, having heard beforehand of the belle of the town, was making up his own mind as to which was Miss Rothsay, but had lighted upon Miss Peters, the music teacher, by mistake.

He had been weaving quite a little romance about the deep, sad eyes of the supposed heroine, and was considerably taken aback when his friend, the doctor, presented him at the church door to a round-faced young lady, very much dressed, with commonplace features, and a self-possessed air, whom he addressed by the name which the stranger's fancy had already fastened upon the other.

"Miss Rothsay, may I have the honor of introducing Mr. Leamington, from Boston?"

The belle smiled blandly, and presented the gentleman to her mother, who approached at the moment, and welcomed him with gracious cordiality.

"So that is Miss Rothsay?" said the American, as he walked away. "Who, then, is the other?"

"What other?" asked the doctor.

"The handsome girl with black hair and eyes. See, there she goes! How wonderfully she carries her height."

"Incessu patuit dea," said the doctor, with a malicious twinkle in his eye. "She is only a music teacher, a countrywoman of yours. Her name is Elizabeth Peters. Not one of the quality here, but one of their paid subordinates."

"Oh!" remarked Mr. Leamington, with disappointment. But he turned and looked after the stately figure that was sweeping up the sidewalk with a wave of garments and fall of drapery that only very tall and very graceful people can achieve, before he followed Miss Rothsay's course.

That young lady was standing on the doorstep chatting gayly with the officer who had escorted her home from church, when the two gentlemen passed. She gave them a self-conscious little bow.

"Who is Mr. Leamington?" she asked of her attendant.

"Oh! he is a nob from the States, awfully jolly, and tremendously rich," answered the young man, with that pleasing forcibility of expression which the young Englishman considered a mark of a "swell."

"But what is he doing down here?" pursued the fair inquirer. "What is there to bring all America to St. Bart's?"

"He comes to paint," replied the gentleman; "he is an amateur artist, and a clever one to boot; and he thought the views up and down the bay worth coming for; so he brought his mother last year for the salt air, and here he is again! and I suppose he likes it."

"Fancy!" said the English girl, with amazement.

"He will have a better reason for staying this year," said the youth, with an engaging smile, meant to convey a world of admiration to Miss Rothsay's comprehension; but the belle was impenetrable.

"You mean the fine sunsets, of course; everybody tells me they were never so beautiful. You will not come in to lunch, lieutenant? Mamma will be sorry. Tell Captain Dyke, for me, not to be so stern in his regulations on Sundays. Good-morning! No, I am not going to the afternoon service."

Miss Rothsay communicated the information she had just received to her mother, who at once laid her plans accordingly.

"I shall call on Mrs. Leamington this week," announced that priestess of society. "She must be lonely enough in this quiet place; and, Laura, love, I think you might have those few friends to tea on Thursday, of whom you were speaking yesterday. Perhaps we could persuade Mr. and Mrs. Leamington to join them." To this the dutiful daughter calmly assented.

Mrs. Rothsay called on the stranger punctually.

Mrs. Leamington proved a very lady-like person, and even numbered among her acquaintances that well-received American of whom Mrs. Rothsay knew in England.

To be sure, the acquaintance of the Boston lady with the senator amounted to nothing more than having shaken hands with him at a public reception, but it was sufficient to establish her claims to good society in the eyes of Mrs. Rothsay; so that the intimacy progressed rapidly.

Mrs. Leamington was a gentle, yielding little woman, who adored her son, and thought him the personification of all that was noble and grand in manhood.

The fact is, that George Leamington was a commonplace young fellow enough, tall and good-looking, with excellent impulses, and a frank, warm heart; but with a strong vein of romance in him, and an eminently unpractical mind. He took people at their own valuation, and was consequently frequently imposed upon, particularly by women; for men were apt to regard his want of the sterner qualities of character with a compassionate eye, while women got the better of his soft-heartedness, and ruled over him mercilessly. Mrs. Leamington did not tyrannize; but then, dear soul, she never ruled any one, and fell naturally under the dominion of any mind which came in contact with her, and had will or force enough to assert itself; and George fancied himself very strong-minded and resolute, because he always prevailed with his mother.

The Leamingtons attended the small party at the Rothsays, and Laura was very polite to George, and they had a little dancing after tea, and she waltzed with the young American; and heard people whisper audibly, "What a handsome couple!" for the people at St. Bart's thought Laura a beauty, though she was rather too rounded in her proportions—not to say stout, for American ideas. She had pretty brown hair, and blue eyes, round and inexpressive, with features which were unnoticeable for any peculiarity; but her cheeks were red, and her teeth were white; and she smiled a great deal; and, as she passed for a model of loveliness, it answered just as well as if she had been cast in the pure classic mould.

Mr. Leamington thought her very pleasant, and he talked and flirted with her, and asked her to give him "just one more round," in the most approved fashion. He was not responsible if his artist eye would sometimes wander to the figure so patiently playing quadrilles at the piano; and rest with a stolen satisfaction on the graceful head and lovely turn of the neck, of the unconscious Miss Peters, who, being asked to help entertain the company, played on conscientiously, and scarcely lifted her long lashes from her great dark, dreamy eyes. In the very midst of a most charming deux-temps, Mr. Leamington found himself wondering what that look in them meant, and what signification there was in their mysterious depths.

He approached the piano when the waltz was over, and made some simple remark about her being tired, but Mrs. Rothsay swept between them, with her gracious sweetness, and, somehow, poor George did not even get a chance to look again at Miss Peters, who was talked to by a good many people, not patronizingly, for those grave, self-possessed manners repelled patronage, but still in a very different manner from that in which Miss Rothsay was addressed; for the genus snob is still extant in the remote provincial districts, though we all know that it is extinct in the metropolis of the British Empire.

The next day Mr. Leamington went sketching, and drew little heads on the corners of his studies, with low brows and sweeping lashes; but in the evening he took a walk with Miss Rothsay, and the next day a horseback ride, and finally, it seemed to be quite an understood thing that Mr. Leamington was to be Laura's escort on any little excursion that was planned by the indefatigable Mrs. Rothsay for the entertainment of the good people of St. Bart's.

In the mean time his sketching progressed, for the young artist really had a good deal of cleverness, and the bay was full of superb opportunities.

George was making a really faithful study of Ravenshead, a noble bluff, wooded with pines and beeches to its granite top; and, in spite of Miss Rothsay's attractions, managed to spend a part of every fine day at his business.

One day he was rowing home in the cool afternoon, from the point whither he went daily to study the various phases of the rugged peak; and pulling hard down stream against a strong tide, exercising his powerful muscles in the very centre of the current, for the mere sport of the thing; when he caught a glimpse of a figure in a cove along the shore waving a white handkerchief, apparently in some agitation.

Ascertaining that the signal must be for him, since there was no other boat in sight, George pulled leisurely towards the point where the flutter of garments indicated the presence of an unfortunate lady perched on a red granite cliff, which was isolated from the shore by the rapidly rising tide. A few strokes of the oar brought Mr. Leamington near enough to discover that the distressed damsel was Miss Peters.

The young man was charmed with the prospect of such a romantic adventure. He fancied himself a second Perseus, and approached his Andromeda with no small satisfaction, and some self-congratulation, which probably showed itself in his manners, for Miss Peters, after a very civil greeting, hastened to assure him that she had mistaken him for some one else. "It was very stupid in me, Mr. Leamington," she said, as he helped her down the jagged sides of the rock into the boat. "But I was so much absorbed that I forgot the tide completely, or rather lost my reckoning, until I found myself cut off from the main land by the breakers. There is no danger, of course, but then I had no particular fancy for perching here three hours longer, until the ebb would allow me to go home, so I determined to signal the first boat I saw, and expected to find a rescuer in one of the fishermen that are always busy whereabouts."

"I think I have reason to sympathize with you in your absorption," said the young artist, with a pleasant little recognition of the sketch-book which Miss Peters had endeavored ineffectually to conceal under her shawl, but whose corners would obtrude themselves most provokingly. "I have often been caught myself in the same way; one loses all account of time when drawing. Would it be too great a liberty to ask permission to see your sketches?"

The young girl colored with the natural modesty of a tyro in the presence of a draughtsman. "They are not worth your while," she answered; "I never had any instruction in drawing from nature, and my studies are at best but scrawls. But I love these rugged hills, and am always tempted to try my hand at their bold outlines."

Mr. Leamington, like all true artists, was an enthusiast, and his frank delight in the scenery, and his unaffected desire to be of use to her, persuaded Miss Peters to trust her precious little book in his hands. They sat down on a thwart together, while the boat swung idly on the waves, and looked over its pages; George, with pencil in hand, explaining, correcting, telling how to produce effects which had puzzled the inexperienced girl, praising here, blaming there, not too complimentary; but showing the rarest merit in a critic, the quality of discrimination. A half hour hour passed most agreeably.

"I wish you would let me give you a few lessons, Miss Peters," said the young man, eagerly; "you have a quick eye and an excellent touch; some of these outlines are wonderfully graphic, and you have the spirit of composition. But there are some mechanical defects, and I could give you a few hints that might be of use to you."

"I am really grateful to you," said the young lady, frankly; "I should be very thankful for anything you would tell me. I feel that I know so little."

"It is up-hill work," said George, as he took up his oars, and impelled the boat once more into the current, "but it repays for all the time and attention that one may give it. It is a continual delight." And here the young fellow warmed with his subject, and became eloquent, and Miss Peters listened with interest, and her eyes lighted up, and ceased to be sorrowful; and George thought he had never seen any glance at once so trusting and so self-contained.

Yes, they were inscrutable, those eyes; he was no nearer reading their mystery when he reached the landing at St. Bart's than he was before, and he was determined to find another opportunity for trying again very shortly.

Miss Peters' occupation kept her busy, and it was some days before Mr. Leamington had a chance of performing his promise. After that, occasions did not seem to present themselves with the readiness which he had fondly hoped to find. The young lady was very inaccessible, and then Miss Rothsay was rather exacting, and her good mother was certainly very attentive. Poor George began to be a little bored. Miss Peters was very cordial and pleasant when he met her, but three weeks later found him as far from the secret of her eyes as ever.

"I think I shall run up to the lakes, mother," said George, one evening. "Would you mind being left here for a few weeks, while I go?"

"Not in the least, my dear," said his obliging parent. "The Rothsays will take very good care of me. Dear Laura is such a sweet girl. Do you not think so, George?" she pursued, as her son left her last remark without an answer.

"Oh, she's well enough," said the young man, wearily. "Mother, do you know whether Miss Peters is related to the Malden family of that name?" he added, rather irrelevantly.

"I think, my dear, your mind runs a good deal in that direction," said his mother, anxiously. "She is a nice girl, I know, but you shouldn't be quite so attentive to her, it may raise expectations in her mind which—"

"My dear mother," broke in the young man, impetuously, "you do not know in the least what you are talking about. I beg your pardon," he said, kissing her wondering face raised to his; "but I must go and look after my traps. Take good care of yourself while I am gone."

Mrs. Leamington mused a while after her son had retired, and wiped a tear from the corner of her eye. If the truth must be told, Mrs. Rothsay was rather hard upon the poor little woman. She had discussed with her pretty freely the state of "dear Laura's mind," and had showed her confidence in Mr. Leamington's intentions with an openness that had appalled poor Mrs. Leamington, unused to the frank scheming of the British matron.

To the direct queries that she had been plied with by the "sweet girl's" mother, she had fortunately been able to give no very positive answer. George was not prone to discuss his love affairs with his mother, and it was more by her penetration than his confessions that she had discovered the not unfrequent penchants of his former life. But flirtations on the American side of the line are mild symptoms of the disorder. Love, which judicious treatment is frequently able to keep from running into the serious fever of matrimony; and young people, when left to themselves, are apt to pass the crisis in safety; so that Mrs. Leamington had not begun to dread the evil day which should metamorphose her into a mother-in-law, until she found that Mrs. Rothsay had magnified poor George's "airy nothings" into a local habitation, and a name for the sweet creature whom she was so anxious to settle in life.

Mr. Leamington's mother found that Miss Rothsay's mamma meant business, and her timid little heart misgave her; so that she was not sorry that George should take his lake trip at this time, fondly hoping that the crisis might be averted by the arrival of some new and more eligible aspirant to the young lady's favor.

The poor lady would have been still more uneasy had she known that George had been taking a walk with Laura that very evening by moonlight, where the romance of the situation, combined with his natural soft-heartedness had led the unfortunate young man into certain unguarded remarks of a sentimental character, which he had been horrified to find accepted by that adroit young woman in a literal sense.

The shock of the discovery had brought him to his senses, and shortened the walk; and had also assisted his determination to get away as soon as possible; hoping, like his mother, that it might all blow over.

But Mr. Leamington's experience of the British matron had been small; and he, in the innocent security of his American habits, was ignorant of the wiles of the sagacious eluder of that redoubtable enemy to a young man's peace. He had only said things to Miss Rothsay that he would have said to any pretty girl under the same circumstances. He had uttered the same commonplaces forty times before, and no one had thought they meant anything; but then an American maiden, and Miss Rothsay, backed by her subtle and accomplished mother, were different matters entirely. The affair was assuming frightful proportions, as poor Mrs. Leamington discovered in about a week.

Mrs. Rothsay began with mysterious allusions to "strange conduct." These were followed up by melancholy tales of dear Laura's depression of spirits and want of appetite, her tender heart, etc. etc., until Mrs. Leamington determined to write to George not to come back at all; but to join her in Boston.

Unfortunately, in her weakness and fear, she let fall a hint to Mrs. Rothsay, which was enough for that prompt Machiavelli.

She at once attacked the poor little woman, and, having discovered that Mr. Leamington would probably not return to St. Bart's, she assumed an air of profoundly outraged feeling, and said with a pathos which quite overcame her adversary :—

"This is all very well; but what am I to do with Laura?"

Here was a question for an American mother! Sure enough, what should Mrs. Rothsay do with that pining angel? Mrs. Leamington stammered hopelessly; and then followed so pathetic a picture of the young thing's woes, that she was completely conquered, and promised to write for George that very day.

Mr. Leamington uttered a very emphatic ejaculation over his mother's letter, and made a dozen different resolves in the next half-hour, all of them terminating in the stern resolution never to be trapped into marrying Miss Rothsay. He would confront Mrs. Rothsay, and tell her he never meant anything—no, that would not do; he could never bear that look of elegant disdain. He would talk to Laura herself, but there were drawbacks to the smoothness of that interview. Suppose she should faint. He hated scenes. He would explain to the captain; but men and fathers see things so differently. Captain Rothsay was a Briton and an officer, and, though mild enough in ordinary relations, might prove the very devil when roused. Duelling was against Mr. Leamington's principles; the outraged father might call him out.

None of the measures which his active mind suggested seemed satisfactory; so that, at length, he determined that discretion was the better part of valor, and that he would return to St. Bart's for his mother, and leave town without seeing the Rothsays at all. Mr. Leamington was a man of impulse. He accordingly packed an impulsive carpet bag, left his easel and canvases to be forwarded by express, and posted back to St. Bart's, strong in his resolution to avoid the Scylla and Charybdis which threatened to wreck and swallow up his frail bark.

His mother embraced him almost with tears, and George felt very strong and encouraging as he told her his plan. Mrs. Leamington, more timid, shook her head doubtfully.

"My dear boy, there is a note for you on your writing-table; I think it is from Mrs. Rothsay," she said, softly.

George's heart sank within him, though why that dainty little missive on scented paper with a crest should so affect him, he could not have said. He broke the seal, having first carefully examined the armorial bearings of the Rothsays with great deliberation. "Vinco—I conquer," was the ominous motto.

"Not if I can help it," was George's inward response, as he opened the envelope, and found a simple invitation to dinner for Thursday, dated some days back.

"It is to-day," said Mrs. Leamington, in alarm.

"I shall not go," said George, positively, and then he hesitated. After all it was only a dinner. It might be a dinner party, and no refusal had been sent. He knew how Mrs. Rothsay hated to have her table disarranged by having a guest disappoint her. Perhaps it would be better to go and say good-by.

"You look tired, dear," said Mrs. Leamington, with anxious, motherly care. "Do take a glass of sherry."

Baleful suggestion! fatal to mother and son! George drank. His drooping courage rose; warmed by the generous wine, he felt that he could face anybody. "I have concluded to go to the dinner-party," he said, when he set down the glass, after slowly sipping its contents.

"O George!" said his mother, in dismay.

"I think it will be the wisest course," pursued the young man, with calm superiority. "You need not fear on my account," and Mrs. Leamington submitted.

A brief note of acceptance was dispatched by a messenger to Mrs. Rothsay. It was three o'clock, and the dinner was to be at seven. George lounged about for an hour, during which he began to repent having sent the note; then he went out to soothe his excited mind by a brisk walk along the shore.

The tide was down, and he paced along with rapid steps in and out of the rocky coves that edged the bay for a long distance. As he rounded a sharp promontory, he came out underneath a sheet of rock high above his head, the very one whence he had rescued Miss Peters. Something fluttered in the breeze. It was a brown shawl that he knew well. In a moment he had scaled the rock, and found the young lady herself making a sketch of Ravenshead.

She saluted him good-naturedly, without surprise. She had seen him coming along the shore, she said.

Mr. Leamington threw himself down beside her with delight. He mended her pencils, and corrected a false line or two in her drawing, and then began talking. He forgot about the dinner; he forgot the Rothsays, mother and daughter; he only knew that he was looking again into those eyes he longed to fathom. So near, and yet so far off. What made her so unapproachable?

Miss Peters was quite at her ease. She questioned Mr. Leamington about his expedition, expressed surprise and regret that he intended leaving St. Bart's so soon, but no profound emotion clouded her glance, or brought the color to her cheek.

George talked at intervals, and then stretched his lazy length on the rock, and watched the white fingers busy with the pencils. What a steady, firm touch she had. The round, massive top of Ravenshead loomed purple against the hazy afternoon sky ; a faint ripple only disturbed the placid surface of the bay ; a fishing boat was anchored at some distance from the shore, and the men were reeling in their lines. It was so still that they could hear the splashing of the water and the rubbing of the cords against the boat's side. The pine tree above their heads gave out a faint, aromatic perfume in the warm summer air ; a crow was cawing noisily in the upper branches. Now and then a sand-peep looked at them with its bright black eyes, as it twinkled along the shore on its little slender legs, and away off in the distance a loon was uttering its melancholy note.

"What a plaintive sound," said Miss Peters.

"It is like the wail of a suffering soul," said Mr. Leamington, pathetically. "But you don't know much about such things," he added.

The girl flashed a look at him. "Not much, I confess," she replied.

"Yet your face is not a happy one ; when it is in repose, your expression is sorrowful."

"Possibly you mistake gravity for sadness," said the girl, seriously. "I have much to make life seem earnest to me, but I am very happy, nevertheless." The eyelashes drooped again over the sketch-book, but there was a faint little flush on her cheek, and a shadow of a smile playing round the steady mouth.

"And I am miserable," said the artist, dejectedly.

"What is the matter?" asked Miss Peters, with ready sympathy.

"The grief of the child who cries for the moon."

"The moon would not make the child any happier," said Miss Peters. "He cries for it because he has no real sorrow."

"Do you think it is not real sorrow to long for the unattainable, when one knows all its worth and beauty?"

"Mr. Leamington," said Miss Peters, rising and closing her book, "I think it is time for us to go home. The other side of that point will be the unattainable for us, if we wait much longer."

"You mock me," said Mr. Leamington, with some bitterness. "But I am in earnest, and you ought to understand me."

"I do not think you know your own mind very well," said Miss Peters, gently. "I suppose you have something that troubles you. Is it about Miss Rothsay?"

"Hang Miss Rothsay!" burst forth the impetuous young man. "It is you I want."

Miss Peters dropped her sketch-book in sheer amazement. "Me? I am to be married in December. Everybody here knows that I am engaged to the doctor ; I thought you knew it, of course."

"I am a confounded ass!" ejaculated Mr. Leamington. "One comfort is that I leave St. Bart's to-morrow for ever. Miss Peters, I will bid you adieu to-morrow afternoon." He strode rapidly away. There was just time to dress for dinner.

He arrived in full dress punctually at seven. Mrs. Rothsay received him with open arms.

"My dear George," she cried, "Laura will be delighted." There was nobody in the parlor.

"I fear I am early, since no one has come," said the victim.

"My dear boy," said the charming hostess, "it is not a dinner-party. Do you think I could receive you any way but en famille after this absence? But I shall let Laura scold you. There, go to her in the library ; she is waiting for you."

Poor George! He went in a free man ; he came out a bondman. Mrs. Rothsay's wiles, Miss Laura's blushes and smiles did the business. He married her and was miserable.

THE CHIMES.

BY NINA MEREDITH.

Now the matin bell is calling
All our souls from sin's enthralling—
"Save him, Lord, this day from falling!"
And I pray this, o'er and o'er ;
Church, and tower, and street are glowing
In the morning's rosy flowing ;
But no joy on me bestowing—
For my darling comes no more!

Now the vesper chimes are ringing,
And the homeward birds are singing:
Fragrant honeysuckle swinging
Golden censers, brimming o'er ;
Over gray St. Peter's spire,
Sunset glances flash like fire ;
In my heart the old desire—
But, alas! he comes no more!

Now the midnight bell is tolling,
Waves of tear-fraught music rolling ;
Sad these tones, once my consoling—
All that happiness is o'er.
In the air the moon-rays shimmer,
And the "three stars" faintly glimmer—
Like my life, my star grows dimmer,
For my love will come no more!

WILL I EVER FORGET THEE?

(Inscribed to MISS CALLIE, of Walnut Hill.)

BY N. B.

WILL I ever forget thee? Can I ever forget
That dark flashing eye, with its lashes of jet!
Or the bright raven tresses, that gracefully flow Down thy gleaming white neck, over shoulders of snow.

That heart-winning smile; that mien of rare grace,
Or the varying charms of that bright angel face!
No! though seas roll between us—years intervene, yet
Thy magical beauty I ne'er can forget.

Can I ever forget, to the day that I die,
The soul-thrilling power of that tender black eye!
Which, deeper than fate, and darker than night,
Is bright as the stars in its own liquid light!
Ah! never, I'm certain, did eye of gazelle
In softness or sweetness that bright orb excel:
Though all else be forgotten, I'll never forget
That soul-speaking eye, with its lashes of jet.

CONFIDERS AND CONFIDENCES.

THERE are some people to whom there would be little pleasure in life if it had no secrets. Of course we do not refer to those great mysteries into which philosophic persons and theologians are constantly endeavoring to look, but to those smaller matters of concealment and confidence which happen in the everyday existence of most people.

The saying about the skeleton in the cupboard of every man and woman has fulfilments in many lives more painful and terrible than the majority of the outer world can guess at. Sometimes the skeleton is a very little one, and keeps its place alone; but now and then it happens that a whole collection, distinctly labelled, would be found did we know where lies the key of the room in which they keep their grim watch. Such secrets as are connected with the closet skeletons are not, however, those in which our friends the confiders delight; these secrets have too much real importance, and the confidence which imparts them—if ever they are imparted—is so weighty as to act like a seal on the lips of all who have heard them. Not that there is often much chance of the great skeletons of a man's life getting exposed to public view. Times may occur now and then, when, at dead of night, he shuts himself in with them, and one by one takes them down, removes the dust from them, and restores them, indestructible, to their places; but spectators of such a process are neither desired nor desirable.

Confiders are the people to whom the little necessary secrets of life are a joy—so great a joy, indeed, that the good folk have a tendency to make secrets where none exist, and so, as happens now and then, greatly to irritate that section of society which has no undue proclivities towards concealment. We have found confiders of this class of both sexes; indeed, the most perverse specimen we ever encountered was a man. He would tell you that his little boy was making wonderful progress at school, as if he were confiding a state secret; or he would ask you how you enjoyed the last Monday Popular Concert, as if the prosperity of the whole undertaking depended on your hearing the question and conveying your answer with a mysterious air appropriate to the occasion. He had a way, too, of lowering his voice in saying the most trivial things, which obliged his listeners to give their utmost attention to catch his words; so that to observers the pair seemed to be talking of affairs which needed the greatest secrecy, when, probably, the subject of conversation was nothing more important than the value of co-operative stores to persons with large families and small incomes.

Closely allied to the persons to whom a mysterious tone is essential in conversation, are the people who recount to you the events that have happened to them since you met them last, and then beg you not to repeat what they have said to anybody. In such cases as these the unfortunate object of the confidence is put in great perplexity. It is difficult to see why you are not to say that So-and-so went from ——— to ———, or that he or she went or did not go to ———. But you are entreated to say nothing about it, and you keep the confidence, at the risk of feeling excessively foolish when you discover (as you most likely do, from the next mutual friend you meet with) that there was not the faintest reason for secrecy, and, in fact, that everybody concerned knew all about it.

Then there are the people who give you half-confidences, and render your life a burden by asking your advice as to what they are to do under circumstances which are not entirely known to you. Angelina does not know how she is to treat Edwin the next time she meets him, because she thinks he was last night too attentive to Miss Smith. You advise Angelina to let Edwin go his own way if you think she does not care much about him, or to call him to account in some fashion if you think she does. But here you reckon without your host, or rather your confider; for Angelina at once proceeds to show cause why she should not do as you have advised, and you begin to perceive that you have been made a victim of half-confidences. These semi-confiders are very annoying to straightforward people, who not unfrequently in the end rebel, and refuse to receive from such half-trusting folk any confidences at all.

Then there are the confiders who tell you more than you want to know, and, indeed, more than you ought to know; so that suddenly one day you find yourself in possession of some family secret, the knowledge of which renders you very uncomfortable and impedes your free action. But these people trench on the class of those whose family skeletons are too much for them, and who let in sun and wind into houses of the dead. Let us leave them.

It would, however, be somewhat of a hard and unlovely world were there no confiders and confidences, notwithstanding the drawbacks that there are, and in spite of the eccentricities of some confiders. It would be a sad alternative either to bear all one's little joys and sorrows alone, or to make all the world sharers of them. Many good schemes would come to nothing were they blazoned abroad too soon, just as they would wither away if no sunshine of sympathy were accorded to them. So long as the world lasts, there will always, we take it, be confiders and confidences. There are few people who are able constantly to stand alone, and those few are not the most agreeable of their species. All that we ask of the confiders is, that they do not make mysteries out of nothing, and that they be frank and full in their confidences when they make them.

MORGAN'S VALENTINE.

BY S. ANNIE PROST.

"It is a perfect nuisance!"

Miss Arabella Lecompton uttered this sentence with all the emphasis which could be put into the words.

"As if two daughters were not as much as any mother cares to take into society at one time!" said Miss Clara Lecompton, her face reflecting the disgust depicted upon that of her sister.

"Well, my dears," said Mrs. Lecompton, "as far as I am concerned, I am sure three girls won't be any more trouble than two. Besides, I think you will like Minnie. We found her a very pleasant little girl, when your father and I visited her at school."

"But, mother, that is a very different affair!" said Arabella. "It is all very well to visit a pretty little school-girl, and take her a few presents, but to take a young lady without a penny in the world right into the family is perfectly preposterous! Why don't father send her out as a governess, or let her learn a trade?"

"Why, my dear, he promised her father to care for her as if she was his own child. He would have had her here long ago, but her father wished her to remain at the school where she was when he died, until she was eighteen."

"Eighteen! Bread and butter misses are my aversion."

"Why, Clara, you are only twenty yourself, and I but twenty-two."

"We are not just emancipated from a boarding-school, however," said Clara. "When does our new sister, as father said we were to consider her, arrive?"

"This afternoon at five. Your father is going to the dépôt to meet her. And, indeed, my dears, he will be very much displeased if you are rude. He was very much attached to poor Minnie's father."

"Rude, mamma! I am sure I have no intention of hurting the girl's feelings, but I really do think it is too bad!"

"I suppose you will introduce her on Thursday evening, at my party," said Clara. "We must make the best of it! There is a carriage at the door now. It surely is not five o'clock!"

But it proved to be nearly six, and the trio of ladies looked towards the door, expecting the new arrival, Miss Minnie Irving. Three handsome, well-dressed ladies they were; the mother still youthful looking, and the daughters very much like her, and like each other. All were blondes, and all attractive, the girls extremely pretty, the mother fair and well preserved. All drew up their figures a little, and unconsciously, perhaps, settled their features to an expression of polite welcome, so that they were quite prepared for smiles when the door opened, and a portly old gentleman, the personification of benevolence and good temper, entered. Upon his arm leaned a young girl, whose appearance quite reconciled Arabella and Clara to her arrival. There was no danger of rivalry there. Minnie Irving was not even pretty. Her features were commonplace, her hair an everyday sort of brown; her eyes, gray and expressive, were certainly a redeeming feature; but her complexion was pale, and not to be compared to the creamy beauty of that possessed by the sisters. She was tall and slender, but moved with a lithe, graceful action, and seemed perfectly at ease, in her embarrassing situation.

Mrs. Lecompton welcomed her first, and did it cordially, then the girls spoke a sentence or two expressive of pleasure at her arrival.

She spoke only a few words, but her eyes shone with a grateful emotion. She had drawn over her heart a mantle of pride to meet rudeness or contempt, but this welcome tore away all reserve, and she frankly showed her appreciation of its kindness.

Clara offered to accompany Minnie to her room, and, before the travelling dress was exchanged for one more suited to the house, Clara's dislike to a new sister had all melted away. She was by no means a bad-hearted girl, and Minnie's lonely position, orphaned and poor, appealed to the best part of her nature. Perhaps, had the stranger been very beautiful, or seemed in any way likely to throw her own charms into the shade, she would not have been so ready to be won to like her, but, as it was, she was her hearty friend in fifteen minutes.

Arabella was rather more distant, but by no means cold or in any way demonstrating any dislike to the young girl. Mr. and Mrs. Lecompton were unaffectedly cordial and kind.

The days wore away pleasantly until Thursday, much time being passed in preparations for a large party which was to celebrate Clara Lecompton's twentieth birthday. The sisters had ascertained that Minnie had a dress, which, although extremely simple, was perfectly appropriate for the occasion—a dotted muslin, which the young guest observed "would do to wear in the summer."

It was known in the family circle that Minnie had absolutely refused to accept the same allowance as Mr. Lecompton gave his own daughters, taking only what with strict economy would clothe her so that she would not shame them by shabbiness, and insisting upon undertaking a large share of the family sewing in return.

"Please let me," she said, when Mrs. Lecompton would have deprived her of an enormous pile of needlework she found in her room; "I cannot bear the thought of accepting so much and giving nothing. I like to sew, indeed I do, and I hope after a time you will trust me with the dressmaking. I make all my own clothes."

So in their own minds the three ladies concluded that Minnie's sole ambition was to be a domestic drudge, and would prove a useful if not ornamental addition to the family.

Thursday evening came. Mrs. Lecompton and her daughters, dressed with exquisite taste and richness, were assembled in the drawing-room when Minnie came in.

"She looks very nice."

That was the mental verdict of all three. The white muslin, with its tiny blue dots, was prettily made, and ruffles of the same formed an appropriate trimming for such inexpensive material. The soft brown hair was dressed with a few blue flowers, and the gloves, handkerchief, fan, slippers, and laces were all in good order.

Three hours later Arabella and Clara found themselves wondering "what ailed everybody."

The plain, simply-dressed school-girl was making a sensation. There was no doubt about it. Some magnetic power must lurk in the soft eyes, or in the musical voice. Three powers she wielded upon which they had not counted, rare conversational gifts, graceful dancing, and music. She had not sung before, but was persuaded to do so now, once. Her selection was a weird German legend set to music as wild as the story it told. The voice fairly leaped over the notes, now high, now low, wailing here, jubilant there; whispering tones one instant, ringing triumphant notes the next. The most wonderful compass and flexibility were requisite to sing the strange composition with any effect, and Minnie gave it all the expression it could require. There had been the usual amount of ballad singing, varied by selections from favorite operas, but after this German song, no one asked for more music for a long time.

Her dancing was as peculiar as her music. Every movement of the lithe, willowy form was full of the harmony of motion, modest as a nun, but as graceful as an houri. And when the admirers of music and dancing drew back, there were some master minds among the guests who looked with amazement upon this plain young girl, whose grasp of intellect could cope with such high subjects, who knew when to listen and when to speak, could be grave, pungent, witty, sarcastic, and pathetic, giving to the most commonplace subjects a turn of original thought, and frankly asking for information when the discussion rose above her knowledge.

Minnie's own utter unconsciousness of the sensation she was making, added greatly to its effect. She had humbly compared her own personal charms with those of Arabella and Clara, and placed them even lower in the scale than they merited. Further than that she did not go, and would have been unaffectedly amazed if she had known the admiration she was exciting. There was not art in any word or movement, and it would have grieved her to the heart could she have known that even kind Mrs. Lecompton agreed in the girls' verdict that the young orphan was "artful."

She enjoyed her first evening in society intensely, for hers was a nature that entered keenly into every sensation, feeling joy, grief, pain, to their full capacity, and, of course, suffering much and enjoying much. There were many of the guests who would become her friends, she hoped, in the future, and some with whom hours would have flown like minutes. So, the next day, when the party was discussed in the sitting-room, where the four ladies of the family piled busy needles, Minnie was frank in her expression of opinion of the many guests.

"Who, of all you met, did you like the best?" questioned Clara.

"Mr. Ilsley," Minnie replied, promptly.

"Why?"

"Oh, I cannot tell you that. Likes and dislikes cannot be defined so closely. I should think he was a gentleman in the full acceptance of the word."

Arabella's face darkened, and she turned it from the speaker's, and stared gloomily from the window, listening intently, however, to every word.

"What do you mean by a gentleman?"

"One whose birth and education fit him for the highest positions in this republican country."

Clara laughed heartily. "Mr. Ilsley is a parvenue, Minnie. He is wealthy now by inheritance from an old gentleman whose life he saved, and who adopted him fifteen years ago, taking him, a lad, from the forge of a blacksmith shop, where he was apprenticed to learn to make horseshoes."

"Then he is one of Nature's noblemen."

"Do you think him handsome?"

"Not at all. His face is made up of irregularities; but his mind is shown on the broad white forehead, and his soul looks out of the great dark eyes. His smile is rare, but it is like music."

"You are enthusiastic. Guard your heart."

"You are unfair. You ask for an opinion, and then laugh at me for giving one."

"Did you admire Miss Henderson? She is one of our belles this winter!" and the conversation, critical and admiring, flowed on, Arabella still gazing moodily from the window, her dainty piece of needlework lying untouched upon her lap. Something in this wise her thoughts ran:—

"How dare she talk so of Morgan Ilsley? He is mine! All winter he has been attentive to me more than to any other, and shall I let this homely little chit fascinate him, as she seemed last night to fascinate all others? Never! There are others to admire her, others for her to select from, but he, the prince, the king among men, he is mine!"

tion and reflection sat in his private room at the Hotel, thinking—ah! well-a-day, will the story ever be finished?—how miserable was the life of a bachelor, were he ever so rich or popular. "Thirty-two in a few weeks!" he said to himself, watching the smoke rise from a fragrant cigar, "and for what am I living? I try to do some little good as I travel on this life's highways, but it is in an irregular, eccentric fashion. My business affairs are not so engrossing that I can find time for nothing else, as many complain. Now, if I had a home and a wife. I think I should not care to marry a great beauty, she would want too much admiration abroad. No, I should not marry for beauty, and certainly not for money. What is the word to describe my wife? I have it! The good old Scotch word bonnie! And what a bonnie lass Miss Irving is, so unaffected and simple, and yet so refined and intelligent. Will she ever guess her own powers? It is clear she does not appreciate them now. What a voice she has! I must hear her sing again."

And so on for about an hour, puffing away, consuming cigar after cigar, seeing through the smoke the soft eyes and sweet smile that were Minnie's only beauties of face. Yet this was no idle dreamer, no man to sit weaving romances or building air castles, but an energetic, active worker, a close student, a Christian gentleman. It was true, as Clara had stated, that he was country born, the child of poverty, orphaned when a mere boy, and at seventeen working at a blacksmith's forge, and looking for nothing higher. One act of bravery, that was a nine days' wonder, turned Fortune's wheel in his favor. He saved the life of a man who was old, childless, and wealthy, and who took him at once from the forge to make him his body-servant. Little guessed either of the undeveloped intellect and strength of mind in the brain of the blacksmith's apprentice, who could read and write, and knew the first four rules of arithmetic.

It was not long before Israel Carton, the boy's new master, discovered that he possessed a diamond crusted over with the shell of ignorance, and proceeded to open the shell and pour in the light of education upon the gem. Forth flashed the fire where the rays fell. Time, patience, and soon an absorbing love of knowledge for its own sake, polished the stone, and it was set in the fine gold of a gentlemanly deportment and that true courtesy that springs from a pure, kind heart. Fifteen years of intercourse with his benefactor placed the young blacksmith upon the highest pedestal of refinement and intellectual development. Together they travelled, together studied, together visited as a son and most loving father, and, when death came to separate them, Morgan Ilsley felt that the control of his friend's ample fortune was but poor compensation for the loss of his society and his warmest desires to see his young protegee married, but, as yet, the heart lay dormant, the mind reaching ever to new efforts, and the busy brain seeking for stronger food.

Arabella Lecompton fancied Morgan Ilsley had fallen a victim to her charms. He had been introduced to her by a mutual friend, and carelessly spoke some words of admiration for her really beautiful face and pleasing manners. These words were repeated, losing nothing of their emphasis in the repetition. Many such phrases had Arabella heard before, but none that sounded so sweet to her. There was a charm about this rather grave man that she had failed to find in any of the gay butterflies of society, a fascination in his smile, and a music in the tones of his deep, rich voice that were irresistible to her. She wooed him as woman can woo, all unsuspected, because half-unconsciously, and when he was won often to her side, and accepted gracefully her unsuspected advances, she flattered herself he sought her of his own free will, and was her suitor by choice. Self-deception never springs to such monstrous errors as when Cupid touches the wires, and Arabella dreamed her dream, while Morgan saw nothing beyond the courtesies of society in their friendship.

Minnie Irving was the first woman who had ever touched his heart. He was not in love with her at first sight, for it was not his disposition to be impulsive or hasty about anything, but each time that he saw her he found some new development of sweet womanly character, some opening bud of intellect, or some graceful accomplishment that drew forth all the deeper interests of his nature.

They met very often, for wherever the Lecomptons were invited, Minnie was included in the invitation, and Mr. Ilsley, to use the conventional phrase, "moved in the same circle of society." Now at a soirée, now at a sociable, in a concert room one evening, at a ball another, often in the home circle, Morgan found himself beside the young girl, who was so surely and unconsciously winning his whole heart, loving her with that force and devotion that come when the heart remains untouched until the spring of youth is over.

Clara had called her father's protegee a "bread and butter" miss before she had seen her, but mentally she soon revoked the unjust sentence. Minnie was not a monster, a paragon, possessing all the "savoir faire" of society by instinct, but she was as far removed from awkward bashfulness as Clara herself. She possessed that grace, ease, and self-possession that spring from utter unselfishness. She never thought of the impression she was making, never studied upon the effect her words would produce, never sought to win admiration, and so attained the sweetest of all manners by a perfectly natural, unaffected simplicity of address and movement.

The sensation Minnie created was not a transient one. She became popular in society, and the ladies wondered where her charm was, without beauty or the aid of an expensive style of dress, and yet admitted that there was a charm even for her own sex. Wherever she was invited, she was soon the object of polite attentions from the gentlemen present, yet from the first she learned to look for one face and listen for one voice above all others. Was Morgan Ilsley near her, no other had power to win her whole attention, even if he were not actually conversing with her. She had never questioned her own heart, yielding itself to the charm of this wooer, and so she did not imagine she was rivalling another, who loved already where she was learning to love. Could she have seen the tigerish jealousy growing daily in Arabella's heart, her surprise would have been sincere and great. Little heeded she that she was living beside a volcano, whose fires smouldered with hot, fierce heat, wanting but opportunity to spring forth and wither her.

The winter had been a gay one, and there was popular a certain weekly meeting, called sociable, where a small pleasant circle of intimate friends congregated together to spend evenings in conversation, music, dancing, or whatever amusement seemed at the time most congenial to all assembled. It was at one of these meetings that the subject of Valentines came under discussion, the saint's day being very near. Morgan Ilsley gave it as his opinion that :—

"While St. Valentine's Day was kept really sacred to true love and the exchange of pleasant words and tokens, it was a beautiful custom; but that, since it had been made the occasion for insult and low jokes, he thought it had better be passed by unnoticed, save by the vulgar minds who had thus degraded it. Even a pretty Valentine now-a-days is almost an insult to a refined mind," he said, in conclusion. "True love can find other avenues for expression." Did he glance at Minnie with a half smile as he uttered the last phrase, or was it only Arabella's fancy?

Certain it is, however, that something that evening told him how very dear Minnie had become to him, and made him resolve to risk his fortune at once. Win or lose, he must try his fate. It was Tuesday evening, and Thursday was St. Valentine's. Perhaps, if he was very happy on that day, he might revoke his harsh sentence, and by flowers, or some such sweet token, express his joy, for, without recalling one word or look of Minnie's that could be called unmaidenly, he was very hopeful. She was so frank, so guileless, and true-hearted, that he could not associate the idea of coquetry with her, and he truly believed the heart he coveted he had gradually won for his own. The next day he sent a missive upon which his fate hung. It was a cordial, frank letter, respectful but not cringing, loving and winsome in tone, but far removed from sickening flatteries. Morgan Ilsley was not the man to crawl at a woman's feet and whine for her favor, but, erect and manly, he extended his hand to her, promising, if she would share his fortunes, to protect and cherish her as far as in his power lay from every ill. He concluded by requesting her, if she regarded his suit favorably, to grant him an early interview. Then he waited as patiently as he could for an answer.

It was the morning of St. Valentine's Day, and he was in his own room, when the waiter handed him a delicate white envelope directed by Minnie Irving's hand. He knew the handwriting well. Two or three dainty little notes, acknowledging some trifling courtesy, the loan of a book, a gift of music, or other matters of gentlemanly attention, were in his possession, and he recognized the clear, delicate letters at once. For a moment he held the missive unopened; the happiness of his life his heart told him hung upon that little note. But his was not the nature to hesitate long, and he soon opened his note. The coarse grain of the paper inclosed struck him at once, but no words can describe his feeling of pain and disgust when he unfolded the sheet. Upon it was a coarsely-printed, wretchedly-colored caricature of a blacksmith at his forge; the head exaggerated, and the arms several sizes too large for the shrunken body. Some miserable doggerel verses, bidding him return to his forge, and not dare court a lady, were printed under this choice artistic production.

In an instant the conversation of Tuesday evening came to his memory. So she loved him not, and drove him away by direct insult. All her sweet manner was but the feigned simplicity of a finished coquette. He had believed her so refined, so sensitive, and here was the proof of an under-bred, innate vulgarity that would have disgraced a huckster.

The revulsion of feeling was tremendous. Many men would have gone abroad to cover their disappointment; others would have written, driving the insult home again; some would have doubted and asked an explanation; Morgan Ilsley took the picture and the envelope, placed both carefully in an open drawer, closed and locked it, and then opened the morning paper and sat down to peruse it. Indifferent? No, suffering like a woman. Wounded desperately, but fighting back the agony, and forcing the bleeding heart to bear the blow quietly. An iron will lay over all like a hand of steel, and only the white set lips showed the inward struggle. One hour later he met Minnie Irving in the street. A bow, chilling as the courtesy of a gentleman permitted, and he passed her, not seeing that she turned white as death, and reeled as if she would have fallen.

She never knew how she reached home. Once there she shut herself in her own room, and tried to think. Was it indeed Morgan Ilsley who had just passed her on the street with that cold, distant bow, that seemed to build a wall of ice between them? She opened her desk and took out his letter, the letter that had flooded her whole life with exquisite happiness only the day before. Then she tried to recall her answer. No difficult task, for it was only a few lines appointing the evening of that very day for the desired interview, but surely that was all he asked. He had not desired a written consent to his suit, but the interview was asked only if that suit was favorably received. And yet how cold and stern his face was as he passed her with the chilling, formal bow. But for that inclination of the head, she would have tried to think he did not see or recognize her, but there was no mistaking the meaning of that. Would he come at the hour she had appointed and explain his strange conduct? Scarcely hoping, yet clinging desperately to this one chance, Minnie changed her dress towards evening for one Morgan had often admired, an inexpensive woollen of dark wine color that was made pretty by its exquisite fit and finish in making. Even the rich, warm color, however, failed to throw any reflection of its crimson tint upon the young girl's white cheeks. Meeting her on the stairs, as the teabell summoned them, Arabella fairly started at the ghastly face.

"Is your headache so bad?" she said, for this had been Minnie's excuse for non appearance at dinner.

"Very bad," she said now, trying to smile, and failing deplorably.

All the evening, white and patient, Minnie hoped against hope for the well-known ring and step, but they did not sound for her. Wearily she went to her own room, to kneel and pray for strength to bear her affliction. Not once did the idea of confiding her grief to another, or seeking an explanation, present itself. With all her gentle sweetness, she was proud to her heart's core. If her lover had repented of his haste in seeking her for his wife, she would not lift a finger to woo him back again; no, not if her heart broke in her silent sorrow.

I am fully aware the proper thing for my heroine to do was to have an instant attack of brain fever, or rush frantically from the kind guardianship of her father's old friend, and become "independent" by way of soothing her poor sore heart, which would not break, only lie heavy and cold, often aching sorely. But Minnie was not calculated to indulge in heroics of any sort. She thought there must be some terrible misunderstanding at the root of her apparent slight, and patiently hoped time would clear it away. Those around her, had they observed closely, might have noticed that the piano was seldom touched by the delicate fingers that were wont to press its keys so lovingly—that the full, glorious voice of the young songstress rose no more to fill the house with melody, and that the cheerful smile and bright eyes were replaced by pale cheeks and a sad, wistful expression. But as there was no moan made over the suffering, it passed all unheeded, only Mrs. Lecompton thought:—

"Minnie had spent too gay a winter for a débutante, and must gather roses for her cheeks when they went into the country for the summer."

But the tangled skein which held these two tender loving hearts in its web was destined to be unwound, and by rude hands, and an uncultivated mind passed shrewd by affection.

Rose O'Neil was Mrs. Lecompton's parlor maid, and a part of her daily duty was to wait upon the young ladies in any service they required. She was young, pretty, and in love, and she worshipped Minnie. She had one little sister about six years old, and Minnie had entirely won her warm Irish heart by making this child a suit of pretty, comfortable clothing out of a half-worn dress and skirt, adding thereto a little hat of black velvet with a few flowers, which gave the child hours of perfect delight. It cost Minnie a day or two of steady sewing to fit the child out thus with the Sunday school suit her sister coveted for her, and Rose set no bounds to her gratitude.

With the quick eye of affection, she soon noted the change in Minnie, missed the bird-like voice, watched the paling cheek and listless step, and, above all, at once noticed Morgan Ilsley's discontinued visits. Her quick Irish wit was at work at once, and she possessed a key to the riddle that none suspected.

A month had passed away before she ventured to speak, and then she was quickened to action by hearing sobs in Minnie's room after bed-time, when she was passing the door on her way to her own room.

"Grieving the heart out of her," she said, "and I am sure it's for Mr. Ilsley. I'll just speer round a bit and see if I can't make two hearts, that's breaking for love of one another, aisy."

The next day she spoke.

"Miss Minnie, don't you be angry wid me, now, if I ax you a question?"

Minnie winced a little. Who could tell what wound the question might press upon?

"You mind the little note you put on the table in the hall St. Valentine's Eve, that Miss Clara took up and said was a Valentine?"

Minnie nodded.

"Now, Miss Minnie, don't you be angered at me, but wasn't that note for Mr. Ilsley?"

"Rose!"

"Now you are angry! Please, now, Miss Minnie, don't think I'm a meddling in the business of my betters. If you will only tell me."

The girl's earnestness was irresistible, and Minnie, wondering, answered:—

"Yes, Rose, it was for Mr. Isley; why do you ask?"

"I'll tell you to-morrow," and without waiting for further questioning, Rose discovered that she was being called, and whipped out of the room like a flash.

"I'll do it if I lose my place for it," she said, as she went down stairs. "Now to get permission to get out this afternoon."

This was easily obtained, and Morgan Isley was astonished by a visit from Mrs. Lecompton's parlor maid. Without wasting time on ceremony, Rose proceeded to inform him that she had a secret to tell him, that would cost her her place if he betrayed her, but which she was certain nearly affected his happiness and that of Miss Irving. At that name his face grew stern and rigid as iron, yet he told her to tell her errand, and be sure he would not betray her visit.

"I must go back, sir, to the day before St. Valentine's Day. Miss Minnie, bless her heart, had been like a bird all day, singing little snatches of song, and her face like a summer day with the brightness of it. It was in the afternoon that she came down stairs with a little note that she put on the hall table for John to take to the post-office. The little note, sir, was for you. We were going to have visitors for tea, and I was in the China closet cleaning the silver, when Miss Arabella came, with Miss Minnie's note in her hand, into the dining-room. She looked round, but the closet door was just ajar, and she did not see me. I saw her though. She opened the little note, sir, and took out the paper that was in it and read it. Her face was as black as a thunder cloud when she saw that same. Well, sir, she put that note in the fire, and in its place she put in a painted picture.

"What?"

"Yes, sir, she did. Are you that blind you don't know she's in love with you?"

"Hush, hush! Let me think."

"Do that same, sir, but first let me tell you that the next day Miss Minnie came in from walking as white as a sheet, and white she's been ever since, a-pining away, sir, and jest fretting the heart out of her. So, sir, I made bold to come tell you if there was anything in the letter that angered you, it was none of Miss Minnie's doings."

"Does she know you have come?"

"Niver a bit, sir."

There was a moment of silence.

"Have I made it all right, sir, or only worse?" asked Rose.

"I cannot tell, my girl. I must see Miss Irving. But she may refuse to see me," he said, half to himself.

"You come, sir, this evening, and I'll not tell her who wants her before she goes to the parlor. The others will all be at a concert, but she is not going; she's got the headache the day, and do have it all the time, now, more by token it's the heartache, I'm thinking."

"I will come then. You have done me a service I will never forget, Rose." He took her hand a moment, and closed it fast over a folded note, and put her gently from the room.

"It's a made woman I am," said Rose to herself, as she sped along homeward. "A twenty dollar note, and they're sure to take me to live along of them when the wedding is over."

It was hard for Minnie to believe the tale Morgan told that evening, but easy to open her heart again to the love craving admittance. Rose was never betrayed; but Arabella knew her plot to separate the loving hearts was by some means frustrated. She accepted an invitation to join some friends in a European trip, and when she returned Minnie's wedding was an event of the past, and her own hand, if not her heart, was in the possession of a fellow-traveller, who was enthusiastic on the subject of blonde tresses.

Minnie had been a wife a year, when, one morning, she took up a small portmanteau that had lain amongst other bachelor possessions undisturbed since the owner became a Benedict.

"Nothing but papers, pet," her husband said, as she applied to him for the key. "But we will overhaul them, and burn up what are not worth keeping. There!" and he shook out the contents on a table. "There are all my secrets."

"O Morgan! was this!"—and her lip curled.

He looked up as she opened a paper with a rudely-painted picture upon it. "Yes, my love," he said, answering the unfinished question, "that artistic work of art was Morgan's Valentine."

DON'T FRET.

BY REV. F. S. CASSADY.

DON'T FRET! All nature is opposed to fretting. The stars are bright above us, and the flowers beautiful beneath us to gladden us with their brightness and beauty. With all the varied appointments of the natural world, and they are manifold, to minister to our joy and comfort, what else than an ingrate to heaven is the person who corrodes his or her life with fretful cares and consuming anxieties? Every flower that blooms, every stream that ripples, every bird that sings enters its protest, and pronounces against the monstrous ingratitude of such a character. And yet thousands, with God's bright, smiling heavens over their heads, pass their days in fretting over the little troubles and annoyances of life. With so many things in the world to yield them enjoyment, and with so little to take away from their happiness, they are nevertheless wretched and miserable from the mere habit of fretting.

Life has its trials and disappointments, it is true; but what are these compared to its man-fold blessings? And even these are a positive good to those who have the philosophy to conquer or endure them as the case may be. All true happiness is conditioned on goodness and virtue, and these imply the conquest of the difficulties in the way of our happiness. But the greatest proportion by far of the unhappiness of the race results from imaginary, unreal evils—evils that exist only in the brain and nowhere else. Literally true of thousands are the words of Burns :—

"When na real ills perplex them
They make enou' themselves to vex them."

DON'T FRET! All reason, all philosophy is against it. If adversities and disappointments come, they come in the order of a beneficent Providence, and we should bear them. They spring not from the ground, but have a kindly, heaven-sent mission to us. And if we may not conquer them—and what may not be conquered by a brave spirit and noble action?—we can, at least, endure them. Like the oak of the forest or the flower of the field, we can bend before the storm, and be all the stronger and nobler for it. Storms are not the general order of the natural world; they come only ever and anon. So with the real trials of life; they come only now and then, and, when they do come, we should meet them with patience and philosophy. To sit down and fret in the hour of darkness and trial is to reveal a weak and cowardly spirit; to do so is an absolute reproach to any head or heart. Then is the time for action and heroism; then

"It is Godlike to unloose
The spirit, and forget ourselves in thought;
Bending a pinion for a deeper sky,
And, in the very fetters of our flesh,
Mating with the pure essences of heaven."

DON'T FRET! Nothing is more unprofitable than fretting. All regrets over what cannot be remedied are as unavailing as they are foolish. Who ever removed one difficulty out of the path of life by fretting? Who ever lessened trouble by pining over and hugging it to the bosom? And yet, from the number of fretters in this world, did we not know to the contrary, we might infer there was some remuneration or comfort in it. In action and endurance lies the secret of the true man's or woman's power over all the ills and troubles of life. The very afflictions and sorrows of life are transmuted by a true philosophy into blessings and sources of joy.

There can be no cheer, no sunshine, where there are unreasonable anxiety and care. The light, joyous heart never frets. For it there is too much to enjoy and be thankful for in God's beautiful universe to allow of this. Who, reader, of your friends are the contented and happy? Are they not those who are wont to look on the cheerful side of things, and who make the most of life? Anxious care is the enemy of all enjoyment. When the Book of books says, "Be careful for nothing," it says the equivalent of the two words, "Don't fret!" There is no real good in life but that fretting mars and destroys. The fretter's lot, however favorable in respect of external possessions, is a sad and unenviable one. In our heart we pity him. Bright, cheerful spirits, with the little of this world's treasures, are infinitely preferred to any supposable condition in life with a fretful, murmuring disposition.

Then, reader, DON'T FRET! When things go wrong, as they sometimes will, work and wait in cheerful patience till they go better. Happiness is your life's chief design; resolve, therefore, that nothing shall thwart that design. Study and practise the philosophy which converts trials into blessings, adversities into joys. Whatever turns up in your individual history in the outside world, recollect that you have no right to be unhappy, and determine, with the blessing of Providence, you will not be.

LINES.

SWEET sister, must thou be
A lost delight forevermore,
Like spicy wafts at sea
That never reach the shore;
Or drowned pearl and ivory
That fated vessels bore!
Thy little life had perfect rest
At its faint dying close—
Not softer from her nest
The early robin goes,
Or fades the daylight in the west,
Or folds the evening rose.

A breath—a memory—
Brief love and long regret!
Thy dying look I seem to see
As earth and heaven met;
And thy dear face is still with me
With summer roses set.

WAITING.

BY ANNIE CHAMBERS KETCHUM.

WAITING for health and strength;
Counting each flickering pulse, each passing hour,
And sighing when my weary frame at length
Sinks like a drooping flower.

Waiting for rest and peace;
Rest from unravelling life's perplexing woof;
Peace from the doubts that crouch like hidden foes,
And glare at me aloof.

Waiting for absent eyes;
Bright as the sunrise to the lonesome sea,
Lovely as life to youth's expectant gaze,
And dear next Heaven to me.

Thou, who didst watch and pray,
Quickened the pulse, bid doubt and weeping flee;
Or, if these must abide, still let me cry
Bring back the loved to me!

MARRIAGE is the best state for man in general, and every man is a worse man in proportion as he is unfit for the married state.—Dr. Johnson.

HESTER.

BY MAGGIE H. HAMMOND.

HETTY HOYT tied on her little nun bonnet, one November afternoon, and hastened down to her favorite nook beside the river, her aching head and tired frame demanding a few moments' hush and solitude. She went quite to the brink of the water and sat down upon a log, overgrown with lichens and fungi, which jutted out over the still depths. Far down below the bend of the river the town drowns in the autumn sunshine; the cliffs behind it, sharply defined in the clear atmosphere, and she could see the smoke of the distant engine, as it coursed along with mad speed, but so far removed that only the faintest rumble reached her ear, and its white trail rose in pendulous wreaths like the snowy banners of some invisible host. The trees surrounding her were nearly stripped of their leaves, which had fluttered down in all the gorgeousness of their flaming beauty, save a few that still clung to the naked boughs, as if loth to tremble down to the earth from which they had drawn their sustenance during their brief life. And, indeed, the air was so balmy, the winds so lulled, the sky so blue, that they must have felt it was all a mistake; and the cruel frost and chilling winds had come upon them too early, and summer, rising from her torpor, had wrested the sceptre from autumn.

But Hetty, being in somewhat of a desponding mood, was fain to drop her eyes upon the panorama before them, and as they fell, her restless fingers plucked nervously at the rough bark of the old log. She was in the mood for complaint rather than admiration.

"I wonder if it would have made any particular difference if I'd never lived?" she said, watching a dead leaf that rustled down and was caught in the eddying current. "There'd be no one to help with the work and tend to the children; but more than that it wouldn't matter much. Father wouldn't miss me long, and mother, after the first fret, would forget me; that is, if I were to die now! And there's Geordie! He might feel shocked at first, and then it would be over. I would be put away from them all, and the world would go on just the same. No one would need me!" She gasped weakly at the thought. It was so hard to think she might pass away, leaving but the faintest ripple where her life-bark went down; her memory treasured in no souls.

"Het! Hetty!" The call floated out clear and shrill, rasping her ear. She started up slowly. She could never be left long to the solitude she coveted. She was at the mercy of other's wills. The monotonous treadmill of life would suffer no tangent from its beaten track.

Not far back from the river stood the house, a square wood-colored building, boasting not the slightest pretensions to beauty. The fence before it was battered and broken, and in the yard a bevy of children, shock-headed, freckle-faced, were noisily playing. Some of them ran after her, catching hold of her dress as she went up the steps before the door. In the narrow hall a little toddler of a baby was lustily crying, and, as Hetty came in, a tall, wiry woman looked crossly up.

"Well may you be a smart one, Het! Washy crying; supper to be got ready, and you trailing off, goodness knows where!"

"But, mother, you don't know how my head hurts, and I thought maybe I could take a half hour. Washy, do be still!" and she lifted the stout little body from the floor. "Jennie, do not hang on my dress so! Help mother set the table, that's a good girl! See here, Washy, 'creep, creep, creep!'" Whereupon Washy's squeals changed without any preliminary modulations into convulsions of laughter.

"Why, mother, you've got on the best dishes!" said Hetty, surprisedly, as she entered the kitchen a while later.

Mrs. Hoyt was standing by the table turning down her sleeves and fastening them at the wrists, a warning that tea was just ready.

"Well, what if I have?" she answered, sharply. "'Tain't every day that Geordie Asher happens in; and I don't know that it need surprise you so to see a decent-looking table once!"

"O mother, is Geordie here?" and Washy's dumpling of a body fairly rolled off Hetty's lap. "You might have told me. Oh, won't somebody take the baby and let me go smooth my hair? and this dress, too!" with a shamed look at the faded calico she wore.

"Mercy on us, child, what ails you? I s'posed you knew it. He just brung Kate Marvin home, and stopped in a while. For goodness sake, hush Washy's yells! Folks'll think he's bein' murdered!"

But the aggrieved infant was not to be speedily appeased; evidently the little rascal enjoyed the commotion. And just then, as Hetty was meditating summary escape, the men came in to their supper.

Geordie smiled pleasantly, never seeming to notice the rumpled hair, the faded dress. Only the pleasant face, with its swift blushes and drooping eyes, claimed his glance.

"Little Hetty, your services are invaluable here," he said, cordially shaking her hand. "Washy, you are a cheat," tweaking his red ear. "Can't we possibly take tea together, Hetty?"

"Impossible," she answered. "Washy is a little on the dog-in-the-manger plan. He don't want to eat, and isn't willing I should. So good-by!" and she hastened out, carrying the little nuisance, who was only too happy to be lugged about, and would have fastened himself like a leech to the back of some pedestrian, could he possibly have done so.

Out in the open field, where the ploughs and farming utensils were scattered in thriftless disorder, and the patient oxen, still yoked together, were chewing their cud, Hetty strayed, and Washy, enthroned on a stump, kicked his fat feet and indulged in gurgling ebullitions of pleasure, pouncing up and down, and assailing the meek-eyed oxen with unintelligible roars. By and by Hetty saw the men coming out of doors, heard Geordie's resonant call, "Hetty! Hetty!" Then his quick eye spied them out, and he came towards them in his easy, careless way, little Tab following closely at his heels.

"Here, Hetty," he said, "here's Tab come to take that little torment to his supper, and I want you to wait out here a few moments and talk to me," seating himself on Washy's deserted throne as he spoke. "I'm going up river next week, Hetty!"

"Yes?" and Hetty looked steadily at him, as if the news were nothing to her.

A shade of impatience quivered in his tone. "You take it mighty cool, Hetty!" flippingly a wisp of hay as he spoke.

What malicious sprite stirred up the girl's heart to make the reply her lips formed. "Why should I take it hardly? what possible difference can your absence make to me?"

Geordie's face whitened, his black brows met in an angry frown, his eyes gleamed darkly. "You are a heartless flirt, Hetty Hoyt!"

The cruel fling turned her to adamant. If she died she would make no sign how deeply she was wounded. She drew herself up with a womanly dignity, that became her well. "You know in your heart that saying is false."

Stubbornness would allow Geordie no relenting. The greatest fault of his nature was impetuosity. Therefore he rose quickly. "No mask can blind me, Hetty. No wonder my absence will make no difference to you. Dick Hall's presence will compensate for mine. Only don't counterfeit to him as you have to me. Good-night, and good-by, Miss Hoyt!"

Hetty's lips parted in no farewell, she only looked after him in a bewildered way; then sat motionless as if transfixed by some cruel arrow. Geordie's life had so grown to be one with hers, that to feel it was stricken quite out of her future was terrible to bear. They had been playmates in childhood, school companions, and their youthful alliance had suffered no rupture with added years. They were wholly dissimilar in many things. He, dashing, brilliant, impetuous; she, maintaining a steady equipose; but both gravitating towards each other as if the one nature were a complement of the other. When Geordie betook himself to his farm, a good two days' drive from there, Hetty felt lost indeed, and it seemed as if all the brightness of her life gathered and concentrated itself into the periods of his flying visits to his old friends.

He had described his home to her, until she felt as familiar with its every detail as himself. The yard bounded by no barriers, but mingling with the sweep of prairie; the building itself, built according to no settled plan, but a room thrown out here and there as the lawless fancy of the owner had directed; the sunny sitting-room, with its bay-window looking out upon the terrace, and the flower-beds, which it had been Geordie's pleasure to cultivate; and Hetty shyly listening to his sparkling descriptions, unwittingly fostered sweet fancies of a removal from her father's turbulent, crowded house, and her step-mother's shiftless rule to such a home, where duty would be ennobled and the most trifling offices gilded by love. But lately she awoke from such dreams, conscious of an unuttered sorrow. It was no longer friendship she cherished for Geordie, but love. Her soul had gone out to him beyond recall; held in solution by his stronger nature. Inasmuch as her nature was deep and true, her affections were the same. Hers was no weak soul to love weakly. And then all the pride of her womanhood asserted itself. It should not be said she wore her "heart on her sleeve for daws to peck at." To give her love unsought was abjectly humiliating. How did she know that to Geordie she was more than a dear friend, with whom he was pleased to hold converse? to whom it was the law of his nature to be tender and loving?

Rumor had been busy, lately, linking his name with Kate Marvin's, a light-haired, pink and white beauty, who counted her lovers by the score. She had been over to the Glen—Geordie's home—on a fortnight's visit to his mother, and it was only to-day he had brought her back. Their parents were old friends; but what of that? Surely Kate scented some quarry worth the powder, else she had not been content to immure herself that long.

By and by the sun, sinking behind gorgeous masses of cloud, sent a quiver of flame full upon Hetty's motionless figure, and then the rich glow faded, and slowly, imperceptibly, the gray mists of twilight clasped the earth in their shadowy embrace. A chill wind rose from the west, struck her with a sense of relief, lifted the hair from her temples, cooled the fever of her blood. She started up and went slowly to the house. The children had retreated within doors. The supper had been cleared away, and her mother was rocking the cradle in which Washy slept peacefully.

"O Het, you are so thoughtless!" said her quavering voice; "you ought to have been here to put the tea things away. Where's Geordie?"

"Gone!"

"Gone, eh? What an idee of his to tramp up river with the loggers. But then Geordie is Geordie, and there's an end on't."

"And so he is really going to the pineries, mother?"

"Of course; didn't I just say so? He says he guesses he ken swing an axe with the rest on 'em, and then he wants to snuff the odor of the pines."

"But, mam," broke in Sammy, a sturdy youth of ten, "do you mind as how Lois Hutchin's husband was killed in a jam on the drive down the river? How the logs squeezed every bone in his body to a jelly; and there was Elbs. They found him under a pine trunk stiff. Wish I was Geordie, though! Must be fun alive to jump on them pesky logs as they come bobbin' down stream. When I'm a man grown I'll be a logger."

"Bein' as how you ain't a boy grown yet, you'll go 'mediately to bed," said his mother, abruptly. "Hetty, see to them."

So the girl took the troop of little ones up stairs, helped them undress, heard their prayers, kissed each sleepy face, and then stole softly down, going past the room where her father sat smoking, and her mother was idly gossiping with a neighbor.

"Nobody'll miss me," she whispered, going slowly out into the silent night, and following her accustomed trail to the river. The lateness and loneliness gave her no fears. All she wanted was to go away by herself and look the future boldly in the face, and feel and know how bare and blank her life would be with Geordie put out of it forever. Stretching on so featureless—holiest aims stricken from it—a love deep and unselfish turned back to feed upon itself. Her heart sickened at the monotonous path before her. Making the children's clothes, tending to their wants. Her ear ever open to her mother's querulous complaints; trying in her silent way to smooth the daily vexations from her father's path. This would henceforth be her simple life. Her heart meanwhile eating itself in torture.

I am aware this is all wrong. That she should have quenched her love with fiery disdain, until it ran naturally in another channel, and Geordie, awakening too late to a knowledge of the true affection he had angrily cast from him, should sadly find the fine gold dimmed, and only a shadowy friendship left from the devoted attachment that had been given him in the past. But Hetty was only a warm-hearted, loving girl, whose life had been none of the pleasantest, whose outreach had been cramped by poverty, whose aims and aspirations had been oftentimes ruthlessly thwarted, and whose love had been a powerful current, bearing her out of self, overmastering her. And now to feel this love was wasted, and her heart widowed indeed, was bitter, bitter.

The moon hung her silver horn low in the west; the stars shone dimly, and the wind sighed mournfully as if a storm were brooding. The unquiet waves washed against the jutting logs, and a night bird, slow rising from the marshes, sent forth a melancholy plaint. Far off a wreath of flame marked the thundering onward of the night express, until by and by it faded into the blackness, and Hester peered clearly in the gloom, her hands pressed tightly to her throbbing head. It was all so amiss. Life was such a complex riddle; her heart was so mad with its sorrow and pain. How slowly the hours dragged along:—

"The slow, sweet hours, which bring us all things good;

The slow, sad hours, which bring us all things ill,
And all good things from evil."

She rose at last. "I must go home," she said, slowly. She wondered if they had missed her. They would think her safe in some neighbor's, probably.

Her mother was fastening the doors as she came up. "Goodness, child! I thought you were in bed," said she, sententiously. "It don't look well to be gaddin' about so late. Hurry in. Mercy on us, girl!" as the light from her candle streamed full on the white face, "what ails ye?"

"I do not feel very well," with a half sob. "O mother!"

"Well, put on a mustard plaster, soak your feet. I believe there's water bilin' yet on the stove."

"O mother!"

The not to be repressed, appealing cry caused the woman to stare at her in blank dismay. "Hester Hoyt, what on earth ails ye?"

The look and words brought the girl to her senses. She smiled in a ghastly way. "I believe I do act queerly, mother, but my head hurts so. I don't want the mustard and water, I only want rest. Good-night!"

"I believe our Het is goin' to have a fever," said Mrs. Hoyt to her husband, as he turned sleepily on his pillow as she entered the room.

"A fever?" he answered, vaguely. "Mebbe the child is overworked. Oh, dear! if I were rich," and then his vacant eyes closed, his wishes merging unconsciously into dreams.

"The loggers have gone up river," said little Tab, rushing in breathless one day. "I saw 'em start, and there was Geordie—you can't think how nice he looked! and don't you believe Kate Marvin was down there to see 'em off? And she was talking and laughing with Geordie awful. I was standin' by and heard him say: 'Be sure and cheer mother up a little, Kate, and don't let her get too lonely,' and then I run to him, never mindin' Kate's hateful looks, and caught hold of him. 'Hulloa, little Tab,' said he, squeezing my hand hard, and then, never minding my dirty face, he kissed me. Why, Hetty, how queer you look, just as if I were a soap bubble, and you lookin' right through me, never seein' me at all!"

Hetty started, gave a queer little laugh, then went on industriously mending Tab's dress.

But it was not the first time her eyes had such a troubled glance, as if her spirit was conscious of no out look, but was turned wistfully within.

"Het had changed so, latterly," her mother said. "She was so quiet and old womanish; steady about her work as could be, and never caring to go out with the young folks—settled down sober like, you might say."

As for Geordie, he had not yet outgrown the fascination of novelty and adventure. The solitude and grandeur of the wilderness, the quaint picturesqueness of this new life, suited his fancy. A slight taint of lawlessness in his blood had full scope, and he roamed through the wilds every inch a king. He was a decided favorite in the logger's camp, and his aptitude for accomplishing many things was made visibly manifest. No one could trill a rollicking stave like Geordie; no one could draw from the old fiddle such lively, heel-inspiring strains, or else such sad melodies that the listeners' hearts thrilled with nameless, undefinable pain; no one could tell such sparkling stories—half real, half romance—as were spoken by his lips. Beyond caviar he was the favorite of the camp.

"He hain't enemies enough to take the curse off him," said Bob Ellis, one day.

"Sure and I don't understand sich sayin's," said Pat Ricks. "Here, Mike, let alone lean-in' onto the shoulder of me."

"I don't wonder you don't understand, Pat," replied Bob, "for you can't read. But I've read it, and it says: 'Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you.'"

"Thin, sure, I'm all right," said Pat, turning away, "and, sure, I've a dale of enemies."

And so the quiet days slipped along. Days of grace to Geordie, for up there in the solitude his heart went back to old friends and companions, and dwelt most of all with a remorseful tenderness on Hetty.

It was curious, but he could only see her as he had left her that November evening. Her eyes wide and startled, her face white and worked, her hands tightly clasped. He had been so unkind to her then. His quick nature had flashed, and it was all over. He could not recall it if he would. His Hetty, surely, he claimed her. What soft flushes of color used to come and go upon her cheek. How her eyes used to fall beneath his flashing look. How proud she was of his honor; how she sought to do him little services in the quietest, shyest way. What a stanch, true soul she had. How truly pure and womanly she was. And he had cast aside and forfeited her love, wounded her heart, like the veriest fool and madman. He lifted his axe fiercely; true to the stalwart arm, which wielded it unerringly, its bright blade clove the air and was buried in the quivering, groaning trunk before him. He looked at the swaying pine as if fascinated, then sprang for safety—too late! In his ear came a rushing as of thunder. There was a sudden horror and a chill, a bubbling cry, and, then, darkness and silence.

"My God, men!" cried a startled voice, "look here."

The men thus summoned gather around in stupefied astonishment. A fallen tree, a human form crushed beneath it, a pool of fresh blood; these tell the story plainer than words. Exclamations are hushed; each bearded face grows white.

"Lem'me see, here 's Bill, and Bob, and Zed, and Jack. Boys, it 's Geordie!"

The men say nothing; they are hard at work. They lift, and push, and haul at the sturdy tree until at last they succeed in getting from under it the motionless mass of flesh. Then slowly and carefully they bear it through the dark, dense forest, where the air is burdened with the resinous odor of the pines, and scarcely a ray of sunlight flickers down through the greenness above.

No one pauses to look at the bruised figure, with its head hanging helplessly to one side, the brown hair streaming low over the ghastly face, until the weary path is traversed, and they have borne their burden into the camp and laid it gently down. Bob Ellis, who has dabbled in surgery a little, and is the Esculapius of the settlement, makes an examination of the case, the men standing anxiously by. A shiver passes over them as they see the mutilated form and discolored body. One leg is twisted on itself, the bones protruding.

Bob started back; his face colorless, his lips white under his moustache. "There 's life in him, boys, but it 's a tough fight he 'll have to keep it. Now, men, remember we 're up here in the wilderness with a dyin' man on our hands. And, knowin' this, just say in your hearts: 'If my care ken be the means of saving him, he shall be saved.' Now, boys, help me here, two of you; bear a hand gently."

Pat Ricks started back, exclaiming: "He 's dying! he 's dying! Heaven save his soul!"

Bob looked excitedly up. "Boys, if there 's a Christian man among you, let him go down on his knees and pray to the Almighty to hev mercy on this poor creetur. We loved Geordie, boys, but you know, and I know, he ain't fit to die."

There was a sudden stir, a quiver of excitement—Geordie's eyes are slowly opening. Poor, vacant eyes; no recognition, no brightness in them, only a strange, dull stare.

"Geordie, my boy," cries Bob, but the words might as well be breathed to the rude bench upon which he lies.

"I've seen them as was dyin'," says Pat, chokingly, "and they niver looked worse nor he."

"For God's sake! stand back," cries another voice. "Let him die quietly."

They shuddered back, those strong-framed, athletic men, some of them weeping like children, and Bob, falling on his knees, melts all hearts with his touching prayer for the salvation of this soul, so soon he feared to drift beyond their ken into the awfulness of eternity, away from the light of the world into the rigid fixity of death.

They can scarcely believe their senses as the moments pass on and still Geordie breathes and lives. It seems to their wrought natures a miracle. The wonder is, not that he should die, but that he should live. The dread angel hovered over him so closely that the sweep of his sable plumes darkened the air, chilled every heart. But back from the jaws of the grave he came. Back from the outposts of eternity, into which his soul had drifted; back to the faint consciousness of warm, breathing, precious life, and rough, kindly faces, from whose eyes looked pity, from whose lips issued love.

As Bob predicted, he had a tough fight for his life; but he slowly weathered the sea, lying through long weeks helpless and suffering. It was wonderful to see how much innate kindness was developed in those rough men, to many of whom oaths were more familiar than prayers, and who had never taken thought for life, death, or the judgment after death. Harsh voices were subdued to low whispers, brawny hands smoothed the clustering hair from Geordie's brow with a touch gentle as a mother's, cheery words disclaimed the thought of his being a tax upon any one's time and patience.

A great change had passed over Geordie, so the men said, earnestly. He was as pleasant, as cheerful as ever, bore his sufferings meekly, but all the old "devil-may-care" of his manner was gone, and a sweet seriousness underlay all his words and actions. He had talked plainly with them all. "I've been brought back from the grave, boys," he said. "I've had my poor body maimed, but God has saved my soul, and my life is his henceforth and forever." They received his words in all sincerity.

"Geordie don't play the saint," said Jemmy Doyle. "He's one of us, human nature like us, only, boys, he's got something to lean on that we hain't, something higher than we know for. And, boys, 'twould be a good thing if we trusted in Christ, too."

By and by there came a day when Bob Ellis took a horse and went through the wilderness across the wild, wind-swept prairie to the nearest town, from whence he returned with the easiest-going rig he could obtain. In consequence thereof, one morning Geordie was fairly lifted into it and nearly smothered with buffalo robes, the men crowding around to give him the last cordial hand shake and "God bless you," for Geordie was going home.

Mrs. Asher, bustling about her work one Saturday, quavering in her low, sweet voice an old forgotten tune, was suddenly startled by the appearance of a tall, bronzed man, whilst leaning on his arm was some one, emaciated, crippled. One swift glance, and, with a hysterical sob, she has clasped him in her arms. "O Geordie! my poor boy."

He kissed her fondly, smiling out of pure joy at being home again. "I ain't quite the same Geordie who left you, mother," pointing to the twisted limb, "but, thank God! I'm home. And this is Bob Ellis, mother. You couldn't have taken better care of me than Bob has; he and I are sworn friends for time and eternity."

Mrs. Asher, in her joy, and pity, and strange mixture of feelings, wrung Bob's hands fervently, until, what with her cries, thanks, and kisses of Geordie meanwhile, she became fairly unintelligible. The news of Geordie's return noised abroad, and one day Kate Marvin ran over to the Hoyts with the information. Hetty, who was mixing cake at the kitchen table, looked up as Kate fluttered in, her scarlet cloak gathered coquettishly around her.

"Hard at work, Het?" was her salutation. "Well, you do beat all girls I know to be so constantly busy. By the way, do you know that he is home?"

Hetty visibly started, crushing a brittle shell in her palm: "Geordie back?"

"I believe I didn't mention names," said Kate, maliciously. "However, you've guessed rightly. And so terribly crippled as he is—he was most killed by an accident. Dick Hall told me all about him; he's been over to see him. Ain't it awful? I never could abide deformity of any kind. I'd rather have died, if I was Geordie; so proud as he used to be, too. Good-morning!" and the selfish, shallow little beauty unceremoniously departed.

Hetty sat down and cried softly. "Poor Geordie!" she whispered. It was useless to try to quench the old love. It would not lie quietly down and suffer the suds to be heaped upon it. If Hetty had thought the ghost laid, she found to her sorrow it had never been a ghost at all. If it had for awhile suffered her to imagine it growing more shadowy, it claimed its revenge for so doing. No one had ever imagined her conflict, the battles she had waged with self. If her wearied father and the turbulent children had marked lately how tender was her voice, how gentle her smile, how unwearying her patience, they little recked that through sorrow had her character been thus beautified. That from the bitter she had plucked sweetness, and passing through the valley was able to ascend the mountain top. Deep hidden was her noiseless grief, and no one comprehended that the quiet girl, shrinking from no duty, ever tenderly mindful of the happiness of those about her, had battled with an anguish which crushed her soul in its grasp, until she looked beyond self to the One who pitied us, even as a father pitieth his children.

Spring came, balmy, bright. The cruel winds abated their rigor, the snow melted from field and hill-top, the winsome violets nestled in shady nooks, the dandelions blossomed golden—hardy, generous little adventurers, scattering the brightness of their presence lavishly—and everywhere earth teemed with renewed life and beauty. One bright afternoon in May there was quite a commotion in the Hoyt homestead, for Mrs. Asher and Geordie had made their appearance there.

"'Twas Geordie's doings," said Mrs. Asher, smilingly. "Nothing would suit him but to come over and see how his old friends looked."

Of course, Geordie was the hero of the day, and all were eager for his comfort. Hetty was kind, but very quiet. Geordie sighed for a return of the old familiar friendship; he would never claim more than that now. And yet, beneath all her composure, he wondered if the old, stanch, enthusiastic heart was beating.

Few words passed between them during the day, for household cares claimed the girl's attention; but in the evening, when the children had listened to reason and sleepily went to bed, and the old folks were leisurely chatting, Geordie asked Hetty to help him out on the stoop, where they had sat together many a time when children. It was a still, clear night. The moon cast a mellow radiance over the old earth, enhancing her beauties, veiling her defects. And over all rested a spell, dream like and passion soothing.

The day was done, and peace came with the starry night. The sight of nature's hush and solitude brought calmness to fevered souls. In the holy quiet Geordie told Hetty of his new faith, his undying hopes. Then silence had fallen upon them. But after a while he broke it, saying: "I was hasty and unkind when we parted last, and, Hetty, if you would only overlook it and forgive me, and be my good, true friend again."

Her voice failed her when she would have spoken, and he went on: "I came to you that night meaning to ask you a question that had long been on my lips to ask, meaning to tell you how dearly I loved you. But you know how differently it all happened," with a sad sigh. "I owe it to you to tell you the truth, but I forfeited your esteem, I killed you—Never mind, Hetty, crippled as I am now, you need never fear that I shall ask a sweeter gift than your forgiveness and friendship."

Hetty quivered with undefinable mental pain. She gave Geordie only friendship, when her soul had gone out to him with a force beyond her control, and she longed to be his helpmeet, his friend, his earthly all.

Geordie started as he caught the expression of her face. "It cannot be," he said, eagerly, "that—that you can love me still, and take me, maimed as I am, Hetty?"

She looked in his eyes honestly. "I do love you, Geordie."

His face was illumined; he drew her unresistingly to him. "Mine in life and death," he whispered.

Years have passed since then. During which Hester has walked nobly as a wife, and in the secret chambers of his soul Geordie reverences and loves the pure, true woman with whom his destiny is linked. Together they tread life bravely, making of it a diadem upon their brows, and their desire is that, when the final summons comes to them, together they may go through the open doors into the presence of that Heavenly love in which their earthly affections are baptized.

THE SIEVES OF SOCIETY.

YOU would not pour precious wine into a sieve; yet that were as wise as to make a confidant of one of those "leaky vessels" of society, that, like water-carts, seem to have been made for the express purpose of letting out what they take in. There is this difference, however, between the perforated puncheon and the leaky brain—the former lays the dust, and the latter is pretty sure to raise one. Beware of oozy-headed people, between whose ears and mouth there is no partition. Before you make a bosom friend of any man, be sure that he is secret-tight. The mischief that the non-retentives do is infinite. In war they often mar the best-laid schemes, and render futile the most profound strategy. In social life they sometimes set whole communities by the ears, frequently break up families, and are the cause of innumerable misfortunes, miseries, and crimes. In business they spoil many a speculation, and involve hundreds in bankruptcy and ruin. Therefore be very careful to whom you intrust information of vital importance to your own interests, or to the interests of those you hold dear. Every man has a natural inclination to communicate what he knows, and if he does not do so it is because his reason and judgment are strong enough to control this inherent propensity. When you find a friend who can exercise absolute power over the communicative instinct—if we may so term it—wear him in your heart, "yea, in your heart of hearts." If you have no such friend, keep your own counsel.

HANNAH FAUTHORNE'S FIRST LOVE.

BY A. T.

FIFTY years ago, and I've but to shut my eyes and there comes Willie over the hill, as I used to see him coming, when I sat waiting for him at the farm-house window. Sometimes on horseback, but mostly on foot, for the Hall was not far away. Nowadays you see the boys and men all alike in black, or with a little bit of gray or brown. It wasn't so then. Will wore a blue coat with gilt buttons, and knee buckles, and silk stockings, and buckles in his shoes, and a buff vest; and, on gala days, claret color and white silk. Handsome in any one's eyes, and wonderfully so in mine; for I was half Quakeress, half Methodist, and never had worn anything gay myself.

Tall? Surely he was tall. Never a Haslet under six feet, and broader in the shoulders than any of his age. Straight-featured and rosy, and just twenty-five.

Will's father was rich Squire Haslet, and they lived at the Hall—a grand house we thought it, for we were plain people. Father a Quaker, mother a Methodist, and he kept to the plain dress and language all his life. In those days there never was a Methodist who wore gay colors, or new fashions, and mother took to the poke bonnets and grave dresses naturally.

So we were quiet enough, not a picture nor an ornament in the house. Not a fiddle, though brother Barzillai begged to have one. And at dusk Saturday night, work put away, and the house clean, and not so much as a mouthful cooked the Sabbath through. Everything cold; and mother put the key in her pocket, and took us girls one way to Methodist meeting, and father took the boys to Quaker meeting, for that was the compact, and they never let religion come between them.

It was all so different at the squire's. The curtains and carpets and Mrs. Haslet's caps all aglew with color. And Sunday a feast day, with more work for the servants than any other; and guests down from the city, and the piano—such a wonder to all—and the harp a playing. They went to church if they chose, and sat in the squire's high-backed pew with curtains.

Mother used to say—she was a bit prejudiced—that what with the organ and altar cloths, and fonts and carvings, and painted windows, and gay bonnets, the Episcopal church was all the world like a play-house. Sister Ellis used to say to me, "For all that, I'd like a pink bonnet myself, and to go where there was music in the church." Ellis hadn't a Quaker bone in her body, nor a drop of Methodist blood in her veins. I always wondered Will didn't come a wooing her instead of me.

I was a little bit of a thing with blue eyes, and skin like wax, without a bit of color in it; and didn't there come an artist, who painted miniatures, to our place, one summer, and tell me my face was "classical," nearer "antique" than anything he ever saw. I was pleased with the first, but the last worried me, for, do what I would, though it sounded like a compliment, I could make no meaning of "antique" but old, so I asked Willie, and said he:—

"Come to my house and I'll show you." So mother let me, and I went. There in the drawing-room was a stand, and on it a woman in marble—that is the face and neck of a woman, and down to the waist. A "bust" he called it. Says Willie, "That's antique. It is Psyche, and more like you than any picture could be."

"Never like me," said I; and then I blushed and turned away, for not a tucker nor a scarf had she, and I felt ashamed.

It was a splendid house—too grand it seemed to me to live in; and he took me all over it, even to the hot-house, where summer flowers grew in the winter time, and put some in my hair. "White," said he, "you look best in white."

One night I heard father and mother talking by the kitchen fire. Says mother, "It's wrong to stand in the girl's way, though he's Episcopal. And think of her being mistress of the Hall, and riding in her own coach!"

"Thee thinks too much of the world, Eunice," says father.

"But remember, Elias," says mother, "it's a chance that comes to few. And she'd be good to Ellis if we died, and the fear would be off our minds for the children. It's hard to be poor, to pinch and save, and to know a bad year for crops or a spell of sickness would swallow all. He loves her, and he'll be good to her; and she can go to our meeting, and he to his."

"Thee'll have thy way at last," says father. "But I'd rather see her marry some young friend, with but one cow and two or three acres. I misdoubt the way of world's folk."

But his voice was mild, and I knew he had yielded. As for the squire himself—a handsome, burly, red-faced gentleman with a loud voice—he rode over one morning to see father. Mother went into the sitting-room, and I was to stay in the dairy; but how could I, when I knew my fate was in the balance? I crept into the entry and listened. I heard the squire first.

"My boy has set his heart on your girl," he said; "he might find a richer mate, but he could not find a prettier or a better. If you'll say yes, neighbor Fauthorne, I will, and his mother. Sabrina's to be married soon, and we shall want a daughter at the Hall."

Father said not a word for a while. He folded his hands, and sat looking at the floor. At last he said, "Have thy own way, Eunice, she's a girl."

Oh, but it's sweet to have the first love crowned by a parent's blessing! Well, well, with joy comes sorrow. A month after that Willie's mother died. She dropped from her chair at the dinner table, and when the servant had sped across the country and back with the doctor she was dead. I wept as I stood near the grave and saw Willie so sad, dressed for the first time in his mourning, and I had more reason to weep than I knew; for Sabrina Haslet was mistress of the Hall, and all along, in secret, she had set her heart against her brother's match with me.

As soon as she could she began to fill the house with company—young ladies, nearly all; handsome, fashionable, dressed in finery and jewels, and Will must play the part of host and make them welcome. He told me so. "Though I'd rather be with my Quaker beauty by the river side," he said. "But Sabrina wants company to keep her spirits up."

I had a guess that she hoped to wean him from me, but I never told him so. True love, I thought, needs no chain, and for a while he was my own Willie all the same. But there at last came to the Hall the handsomest lady of all—Miss Dorcas Oakley. She stayed a long, long while; and there were dancing in the evenings and riding all day; and she rode beautifully, and always with Willie. I thought to myself over and over again, "Does she know it is my love she rides away with as though he were hers?"

Then the jealousy began to grow in my heart, and I was not the same girl at times. Yet all the while he told me that it was fashion and courtesy, and kept me quiet whilst he was by. He would have had me also at the Hall often, but Sabrina sent no message. She was the mistress of the house, and I would not go there without her invitation. So I pined and grew thin, and mother thought me ill. So I was, but of heart, not of body. And when she talked of my wedding-day, my blood would boil, and I'd say, between my clenched teeth, "No, I'll marry no one who weds me because he's bound to me, and not from love!"

One night I stood by the garden palings and looked at the stars; and as I stood there a woman in a hood came over the fields and stood beside me. It was Miss Sabrina Haslet. I started as if I had been shot; and she took off her hood, for it was warm, and looked hard at me.

"What kind of a girl are you?" said she.

"What kind of one are you?" said I. "Not a civil one, to speak that way."

Said she, "What I want to know is this. Are you the person to hold my brother to a foolish bond, or to let him free when he begins to struggle? You caught him cleverly; and though his heart has slipped through your fingers, you may be mistress of the Hall yet, I suppose. Will you?"

"With his heart gone from me!" I cried. "Has he told you it is gone?"

"He'd die first," said Miss Sabrina. "His honor would not let him break troth with you. But to see how he loves Miss Dorcas Oakley, and she is a match for him in rank, and wealth, and beauty. People are talking of it, and pitying him."

"They shall pity him no more," I said. "What is that Hall to me? It was my Willie's love I cared for. Tell him he is free."

"You must tell him yourself," she said: "if you care to see him happy, open his cage," and she tied on her hood and sped away.

That night there went a note to Willie:—

MASTER WILLIAM HASLET: I've thought a long, long while that the bond between us was best broke, I feel sure of it now. It will be better that we should not meet again; and in this I send you back your ring. May good fortune and happiness attend you! And with this wish, I sign myself

HANNAH FAUTHORNE.

This I wrote with a heart torn and rent as never flesh could be, and it was sent; and though he came to the farm I would not see him; and all was over between us.

I waited only to hear that he was betrothed to Miss Dorcas Oakley. Instead of that I heard, a week after, that he had left the country. Where he had gone, and why, no one knew. When I felt sure that Miss Dorcas Oakley could be nothing to him, or at least that they were not to be married, my heart smote me a little, and I wondered whether I should not have put my pride down a bit, and have heard him speak for himself.

Miss Sabrina Haslet did not marry. The wedding was put off, first by her mother's death, and then by her father's six months after; and then folk said there was a quarrel. But be it as it may, he who was to have been her husband, married, instead, that same Miss Dorcas Oakley. Other suitors came no doubt, for Miss Sabrina was handsome and rich; but she liked none of them, and lived on in the Hall quite alone but for the servants. By and by she saw no company, and shut up half the house, and seemed more lonely and wretched than many a poor woman. All her beauty left her, too, and she became a sharp, sour spinster, always dressed in black—she who had been both belle and beauty.

I lived on at home. Ellis married, and so did Barzillai. The years did not seem to give a gray hair to my mother, nor a wrinkle to my father; they were too placid to grow old fast. No one wondered I did not marry. They seemed to think that, having been so nearly mistress of the Hall, it was not likely I should be willing to wed for less. The Hall! It was Willie I loved, and not his house or lands.

One winter night—Christmas time was nearly come, and I sat by the fire dressing dolls and tying up sugar plums in paper horns with bits of ribbon for my nieces' and nephews' stockings—there came a loud rapping at the door. I opened it, and there stood an old man-servant from the Hall.

"I'm sent by Miss Sabrina, miss," said he. "She is very ill, and desires you to come alone; she has something particular to say to you."

"Sabrina Haslet send for me!" I thought, and then my heart beat fast, and I fancied I hardly knew what. "Ill, did you say?" I asked.

"Very ill," said the man; "the doctors gave her over."

I went back to get a shawl and hood, and tell my mother where I was going, and then came out. The night was bleak, and snow was falling and lay deep upon the ground, and there stood a carriage with rugs in it ready for me. I stepped in and was whirled away towards the Hall. It was like a dream; I could scarcely believe myself awake. It was still a dream when we stopped at the Hall, and I only realized that all was true when I stood in Miss Sabrina's room, and saw her lying wan and pale upon the pillow. Oh! what a change had come over her.

"You've come, Hannah Fauthorne," she said; "thank you for that. I thought you'd refuse, perhaps. It's a long while since we spoke together!"

"A long while," I replied.

"Yet you haven't changed much," said she. "You look as you did when you stood by the hedge in the moonlight, and said: 'What is the Hall to me? 'Twas Willie's love I cared for.' I remembered the words, Hannah Fauthorne. They've stung my soul often since. Do you know I lied then?"

"Lied?"

"Yes, lied. It was I who wanted him to wed Dorcas Oakley. Willie's heart never belonged to any one but you. He was true as Heaven. I thought a poor girl like you beneath him. I told him you loved that cousin who came to your home so often, and when your letter came he believed it. I thought he would marry Dorcas then. I never meant to drive him from home and kin; but he went, and the last words he said were: 'Sabrina, my heart is broken.' And all these years he has wandered over the world a lonely, sorrowing man; and I, his sister, the cause. And she—Dorcas—oh! you know my lover jilted me for her; all the place knows that."

I looked at the poor, dying woman. I was trying to forgive her, but I could not help speaking harshly. "I am only a stranger," I said; "what I have suffered is nothing to you. But had you no mercy on your brother? You have had time to repent."

"Time!" she said. "Yes, Hannah Fauthorne, it seems like eternity; but I have sought for him in vain; for years I thought him dead. Yesterday I learned that he is alive, and not many miles distant. Old before his time, they say, but he lives. Look," she continued, drawing a packet from under her pillow; "in this I have written the truth. It shall be sent to-morrow. It is directed plainly. If I die in the night, it can go all the same. Will and you may meet again and be happy when I am under the turf." Then she began to wail: "Don't leave me! don't leave me to die alone!"

I sat down by her. "Do not fear," I said; "and try to think of other things. Forget earth, and look to Heaven." I never left her. Sitting by her side on the third night, I saw a change come over her face, and bent over her.

"Hannah Fauthorne," she whispered, "have you forgiven me?"

"As I pray God to forgive me," I answered.

"Then fainter still she spoke: 'Be kind to Will; he loved you. Oh! to think that I should have lost my soul that you might not be my sister—you who seem so like one now.' And with these words there came a look into her eyes I never shall forget; and in the Christmas dawn she lay on my arm—dead."

On Sunday they buried her. The graveyard was full. Every one came to see Squire Haslet's daughter laid in the great vault. I stood near it; but, though the solemn words of the preacher rang in my ear, and the coffin was before my eyes, and I should have thought of nothing else, my mind would wander away to the past, and I saw Will as I used to see him and myself, as in a mirror, young and blithe, leaning on his arm. Then I found myself praying for the dead woman, "God forgive her, for she knew not what she did."

I came back to the present with a start and a thrill; they were closing the vault. And beside the clergyman, speaking to him in a whisper, stood a tall man, with a foreign look about him, and a heavy hat slouched over his eyes; a man all in black, with hair dark as night, but with here and there a silvery thread. Why did my heart beat so as I looked at him? Surely I had never seen that man before? I turned away and went homeward. The path lay by the old Hall. I paused a moment to look at it. Every window was shut; from the broad front door, and from the necks of the stone lions on the porch, streamers of crape were floating. Oh! how often had I seen every window ablaze with lights, and heard music, and dancing feet, and laughter from within. And, now, in the winter twilight, for at five this day was nearly done, and the clouds lowered heavy with coming snows—now how dark and cold it was; and yonder in the graveyard lay in their grim vault master and mistress, and she who had been the pride of their hearts, the toast and beauty of the reign—Sabrina Haslet. And Willie, where was he?

The gloom, the scene I had just witnessed, the memories were too much for me. I bowed my head upon the cold stone of the gateway and wept. "Gone, gone, gone," I cried, and the sobbing wind among the branches seemed to resound the words gone, gone, gone.

I had heard no step on the snow, I had seen no shadow, I never guessed any one was near me, until a hand was laid upon my shoulder, a hand large and strong, but trembling like an aspen leaf. I looked up. Beside me stood the tall, dark man I had seen in the graveyard. When I turned, he removed his hat, and I saw the face of Willie Haslet. A face altered and aged, bronzed and sad, but still his, with love in it.

"Hannah," he said, "Hannah!"

And I, as though I spoke in a dream, murmured: "He has come back again! He has come back again!"

"Yes, Hannah, back again," said the low, sweet voice that had been in my memory so many years. "Her letter brought me back. She was my sister, and is dead. Hannah, you know all?"

"All," I said.

He looked at me; I felt that, though I dared not look at him. We were silent for a moment, then he spoke: "I have not crossed that threshold; it rests with you whether I shall. I will not be master of the Hall, unless you will be my wife and its mistress."

"The Hall! the Hall!" I cried. "Did the Hall woo me? Did I love the Hall? You speak of it first, as all do. O Will Haslet! if you had been a poor farmer's son, all might have been different. I never thought of anything but your love."

"I forgot," he said, "'tis not young Will Haslet now. My hair is gray; the time for wooing is past."

"And I am old also," I said. "This is not Hannah Fauthorne, I sometimes think, but another woman with her name."

"There is no change in you," he said. "O Hannah! must I go?" He opened his arms.

I took one step forward, and my head was on his breast, as it had been ten years before, and I was his again.

Thirty years ago—but I remember how the bells rang when we were wed, and how the church was crowded with people to see. And who so proud as mother? For her girl was the squire's lady and mistress of the Hall, where she and father sat by the fire many a long day, and died in peace and hope, almost together at last. So may we die, Will and I, for we love each other still, though both our heads are white as snow to-day. But, amidst the changes that have come in all these years, we have never changed to each other, and, as we have lived, so shall we die.

ANXIETY is the poison

I COULD NOT TELL THEE ALL.

BY FIDELIA A. JACKSON.

Oh! if thou didst not know,
Whilst on my knees I fall,
The sin, the strife, the grief,
Where there is no relief
Within my heart's deep woe,
I could not tell thee all.

No, though thou art my friend;
The dearest, truest, best,
I could not tell thee all the strife,
The woes and sorrows of this life;
Although upon thy faithful breast
I long to weep in peace.

Oh, guard me with thy love!
Protect me with thine arm,
For though my soul glide on,
Till hope and truth seem gone
Within this world's alarm,
I could not tell thee all.

Then, for the sake of Him
Who died for sin, for me,
Guide me to heaven above,
I ask with tears of love,
Although, if 'twere not known to thee,
I could not tell thee all.

MY GUARDIAN ANGEL.

BY JENNY HAYS.

THEY say thy angel form, mother,
Is hovering all the while Around thy orphan child, mother,
To guard her steps from guile.
Methinks I hear thy gentle voice,
In accents soft and clear;
Like distant music's dying strains,
It falls upon mine ear.

My heart is very sad, mother—
Oh, could I soar to thee!
The world is cold and dreary now—
It hath no charms for me.
I long to lay my wearied limbs
Beneath the silent mound;
My soul be borne away from earth
To realms of bliss profound.

I never can forget, mother,
Those counsellings of love
You breathed to me in infant years,
When all was bright above;
The little cloud that dimmed my brow,
Your smiles could chase away,
And cast a gleam around my path,
Like some refulgent ray.

You'll come and see me oft, mother,
And whisper low to me;
That I may hear thy angel voice,
Though I no vestige see.
And when my pilgrimage is o'er,
I'll join that happy band,
And soar on airy wings away,
To my home—the spirit land.

An honest man is respected by all parties. We forgive a hundred rude or offensive things that are uttered from conviction, or in the conscientious discharge of a duty—never one that proceeds from design, or a view to raise the person who says it above us.—Hazlitt.

NICODEMUS.

BY A. M. DANA.

WHEN, after his mother's death, George Melville left his father's house and his native village for West Point, his cheeks were smooth, rounded, and stained with the flush of healthy youth. Now, as he returned after four years of war, and two or three more of special service, the most careful observer would have failed to trace in the heavily-bearded, bronzed-faced officer who sat on top of the lumbering old stage-coach, much resemblance to the blushing boy who left his home so many years before.

True, he might have returned sooner had not the knowledge that a young wife resigned in his mother's stead restrained him. It was this thought that made his home-coming more a filial duty than a pleasure, that clouded his brow almost to sternness, and made his answers to the socially-inclined driver so curt and monosyllabic, that the latter finally, offended—Yankee like—blurted out:—

"You needn't be so all uncommon proud of your buttons, if you are an officer! My brother, what was killed at Lookout, wore capting's brasses, too!"

Ah! The right chord was touched at last, and for the next half mile he chatted cordially enough of the brave souls who, carried by patriotism to that mount of transfiguration, were forbidden to descend. That subject failing, however, he relapsed into silence and into gloomy meditations upon the altered home he was nearing.

"It is a chance if I know the old place," he growled—if a man can growl with his lips shut. "Ten to one she has had the folding-doors torn down, and the dear old parlor and mother's sitting-room turned into a grand saloon, with French paper on the walls, and a splatterdock carpet all running over with crimson and orange upon the floor. Faugh! Well, I shall pay my respects to the governor, and then if things are too tough, I can finish out my furlough in New York. I'll make a good time of it, somehow!" Even as he thought, the cumbrous old vehicle trundled across the creaky bridge, and they were in the village.

There was the old mill with the pond behind it, where he had fished when a boy; the blacksmith's shop, where the sparks flashed bright on frosty nights; and, a little beyond, the ancient school-house with its red shutters. He wondered whether Dame Kepel still presided over the young ideas there. "Most likely," he thought. Villages that are reached by stage-coaches change very slowly even nowadays.

Then came the more thickly-settled portion of the street. Mr. Gooding's grocery—which was also a dry-goods and variety store; the post-office, the news depot, and then the houses of the more aristocratic inhabitants. Yonder, where the setting sun flared on the windows of a white mansion, was the residence of the Trevors—a family of romping little girls, with a boy or two, when he went away—young ladies the girls were by this time, of course. Then, turning his head—just opposite—yes, there it was! the wide, old-fashioned brick house and the office adjoining, with his father's simple sign:—

VOL. LXXX.—11

DR. G. MELVILLE,
PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON.

upon the door. Vastly better it was than the be-verandahed, be-gothiced scene of desecration his imagination had pictured.

"Now for it!" he murmured, as, travelling-bag in hand, he sprang lightly to the ground. He was met at the door by an old domestic who had served his mother, and in her startled look and slow recognition he saw more plainly than in any mirror the change in his appearance.

"The land alive!" she exclaimed, after a prolonged gaze, "it is him himself! But my blessed boy, nobody but the woman who nursed ye could tell hide nor hair of you, now! Miss Melville"—opening the parlor door—"if here ain't Master George at last!"

Thus introduced, Captain Melville entered the room where a pleasant-looking lady, attired in a simple home dress of lilac material, with neat collar and cuffs, sat knitting. She rose smiling, and, giving him her hand, cordially said:—

"I am very happy to see you, captain, and your father will, I am sure, be delighted. He has talked of little else since he knew of your coming."

As she placed an easy chair for him near the window—the very old chintz-covered chair he remembered so well—took his hat and handed him a fan—for, though early autumn the evening was intensely warm—George Melville awakened somewhat suddenly to the perception of two facts: First, that his father's second wife was a lady, and second, that ideas formed a priori are apt to be mistaken.

The first greeting over, as is customary in such cases, an awkward silence ensued. It was broken, however, by Mrs. Melville saying:—

"You have been away from home a long time, I believe?"

How that little word home, coming from her lips, touched his heart! "Yes," he rejoined. "So long that I am ashamed to count up the years. And yet"—looking around the room where each well-remembered piece of furniture sat in its accustomed place—"everything seems so familiar that I can hardly realize that I have been away more than a month or so. You have not made many alterations, I see."

She raised her clear gray eyes a moment to his face. How well with the intuition of a true-hearted woman she comprehended what his dread had been. "No," she answered, quietly, "I am not fond of change, and the doctor, I think, likes it even less than I do. Besides, I have learned that though one may not positively admire a thing, one can get used to it."

The words were very simple, but what a world of self-sacrifice he recognized in them! Girlish fancies cheerfully given up, and her whole nature set in accord with the graver tastes of him whose companion she had chosen to be. Impulsive Captain Melville was ready to bow in reverence before the young step-mother whom he had almost anathematized less than an hour before.

"Even old Nicodemus is here yet!" he exclaimed, as—after a little pause, and another glance around the room, including even the books and pictures, still where his mother's hands had placed them so many years ago—his gaze fell upon a huge yellow cat lying at the lady's feet, his eyes of liquid malachite lazily following the motions of a stray fly that floated yet more lazily through the heated air around him.

Mrs. Melville laughed. "Oh, yes, Nicodemus is quite a friend of mine," she said. "I have often wondered how he came by such an outlandish name."

"I believe he owes it to me," said the captain, echoing her laugh, and stooping to scratch the cat's head. "You see I was a Sabbath-school boy when Nicodemus was a kitten—dear me, how old that makes me feel!—and as he was much addicted to night rambling, I—rather irreverently, I must own—called him for him who was a ruler of the Jews."

The merriment over Nicodemus and his quaint cognomen subsiding, questions and answers relative to the various inhabitants of the village ensued.

"And the Trevors," he asked, after a pause, "do they still live opposite?"

"Yes, indeed! and they are the merriest as well as the prettiest girls in the village. You need not expect to be heart-whole long in their neighborhood. That is"—slyly—"supposing that some fair southern lady has not subdued that citadel already."

"No, I am open to attack; but I shall trust to you for protection, seeing that I have made such a damaging confession," he answered, smiling, while a blush—that rarest but surest sign of an honest heart when seen on the face of a bearded man—dyed for an instant his brown cheek.

"Don't trust me," she rejoined, merrily. "I promise you all my aid shall be given to the enemy."

These two, who had almost feared open hostility as the character of their intercourse, were fast becoming friends.

"Well, I—may I think that is cruel, considering—relationship. By the way," he continued, after a slight pause, and with a little hesitation, "what may I call you? You see it is rather awkward to be two or three weeks in the house with a person for whom you have no more distinguishing title than madam. Mrs. Melville seems so cold, as though I did not like you, when I find that I am going to like you amazingly. Your Christian name is too familiar, while, as you are so young, mother is, of course, totally out of the question." He spoke with a frank ingenuousness which, while it atoned for any eccentricity in the question, quite won her good-will.

"I should be sorry indeed," she answered, smiling, "were you to push me so far out in the cold as to call me Mrs. Melville, and I shall not be at all hurt or offended if you call me Alice; but," raising her eyes with an expression strangely yearning, "if—if you thought me worthy, I would rather be called mother than anything else."

"So you shall be, if you wish it!" exclaimed the captain, his prejudice completely conquered by her sweet manner, "and I am sure you are just the dearest little mother in the world. I only hesitated fearing I might offend by bestowing the matronly title upon one so young."

"I did not feel too young to marry your father," she answered, with quiet dignity.

"Then, little mother, it is a bargain. You give me a mother's love, and I will render to you a son's reverence and devotion," he said, and, taking her hand in his chivalrous admiration, he had almost made a penitential acknowledgment of his former hostility, when her voice broke forth joyfully:—

"Oh, here is the doctor at last! I will leave you to give him a glad surprise," and pressing her hand softly for a moment upon the curls of her new-found son—the son who was a trifle older than herself—she slipped quietly from the room, her eyes shining with glad sympathy at the happy reunion.

Bright days followed for Captain Melville, filled to the brim with renewed acquaintance-ship, home joys, and pleasant excursions. Bright days they were too for Alice. She was only a girl after all, and if she found a girlish enjoyment in walking out with the dashing captain, or, donning the dark blue habit she had not worn during her wifehood, in riding by his side over the breezy hills; who could blame her? Certainly not the doctor. He was glad, or at least he told himself that he was glad, to have his darling enjoy herself; and if sometimes—as he saw them start upon their pleasant rambles, or when, having encountered him far beyond the village jogging around among his country patients, and having drawn their horses close up to the old-fashioned chaise for a merry chat, they disappeared again in the distance—an expression of heart hunger crossed his face; there was no sign of reproach, or, if there were, it was unselfish self-reproach for having taken so bright a creature from her sphere of youth and gayety, for having grafted so fair a blossom upon so gnarled a stem. Still, she was his one ewe lamb; and when one day—having a long country drive in view—he asked her to accompany him, he watched her countenance with an anxiety that was almost agonizing.

But there was no trace of reluctance on the face raised to meet his gaze. "I have promised George to ride with him, but I would rather go with you," she said, simply. "I'll see if he will excuse me."

She found that young gentleman comfortably ensconced on the back porch, cheroot in lips, and an open note in his hand. "George," she said, going up behind him and laying one hand gently upon his shoulder, "the doctor wants me to drive with him. You will not mind, will you?"

"Certainly not," he answered. "Besides, it suits very well. See, I have just received a note from Frank Dale, and I'm going out to Beechwood to pass the night. There are to be three or four other fellows there, and Dale says we are to make a night of it. Don't be alarmed, little mother," he continued, "it's a bachelor's party, but not so very dreadful as I suppose you imagine it to be, for all that," and drawing both her hands down over his shoulders as she stood behind him, he looked up frankly, as no debauchee can look into the face of a pure woman.

"I can trust you," she answered, brightly, dropping a mother's kiss upon his lifted brow.

"God bless her!" ejaculated the captain, as she disappeared within the house. "But what an oddity she is. One moment as merry as a kitten, and the next Methuselah's grandmother could not equal her for gravity."

The long country drive among yellow corn lands and ripened orchards, where the fruit hung golden as that of the Hesperides, was delightful. The light clouds of early September floated dreamily across the sky, but the air was as warm as summer. As yet autumn had shown her presence only by the bright-tinted flowers scattered as she passed. Coming homeward Alice had a great bouquet of these. Royal purple asters and plumes of golden-rod, with two or three splendid tufted thistles skilfully placed in the centre of the bunch. They were crossing a little brook, spanned by a rustic bridge, when her gaze was attracted up the stream, where, among the leafy shadows, formed by elder and hazel,

"A cardinal-flower in her secret bower
Had lighted her crimson lamp."

"Oh! isn't it glorious?" she exclaimed. "I must have it by all means. It will brighten my bouquet grandly."

Throwing the rein of patient Dobbin over the hand rail of the bridge, while he descended to the brook for the coveted treasure, the doctor brought it to her, the scarlet petals glowing and quivering like lambent flame. Yet such is the nature of these flowers, which cannot be carried far from their native stream, that, almost before her warm little hands could get it satisfactorily arranged, the stately head was drooping, and the gem-like blossoms hanging wilted on the stem.

"They're not worth much after they're gathered," said the doctor, watching his wife's dainty task.

"Like our hopes," she answered, twisting some grasses around the stems.

The words were spoken lightly, carelessly, but, leaning forward, he looked keenly in her face. "Are you speaking from experience, Alice?" he asked. "Have some of your hopes proved but withered flowers?"

"No, I guess not," smiling. Then, a little wonderingly: "Why do you ask?"

"Because, my darling, your happiness is very dear to me, and because I have sometimes doubted whether I sufficiently considered it, when, taking advantage of your youth and inexperience, I asked you to be the wife of a humdrum country doctor. Tell me, Alice, am I right? Have you grown tired of your old husband?"

Alice caught the anxious inflection, and glanced up quickly. "Have you grown tired of me?" she asked. Ah! there was no need of an answer, but, with a woman's fondness for tender words, she waited for them.

"The sun has not grown tired of the placid moon's companionship," he said, "nor the gray old ruin of the leaning and upbearing parasite clinging lovingly around it. Perhaps, when they do, Alice, I may grow weary of you."

"Then, I guess I ain't very tired yet," she whispered, as, with a queer little laugh of supreme content, she nestled her head down upon her husband's shoulder.

She might ride about with the captain, and laugh and gossip with the Trevor girls, but that was only her surface nature. Here was the home of her affections. It was this man, tried in the crucible of years, whom she recognized as her lord and king, and to him alone she paid the homage of her loving heart. The long ride and pleasant tea over, the flowers arranged in vases, and her feathered pets all fed, Alice entered the parlor, where the shades of twilight were fast deepening into night.

"Is that you, Alice?" called the doctor's voice through the darkness.

"Yes. Where are you?"

"Lying on the sofa in the front parlor," he answered. "Come and sit beside me."

Alice needed no second bidding. These twilight conversations were her delight, and pushing a low stool up to the sofa, she sat down prepared to talk or listen as the case might be.

"Do you know, Alice," said the doctor, after a little while, passing his hand gently over her hair, "you have made me very happy to-day?" Then, musingly: "I wonder if we shall always be as happy as now?"

"God knows I hope so," she answered, with an unwonted seriousness in her voice. "Otherwise I should wish to die."

Prophetic words they were, though forgotten almost as soon as spoken. Little did either dream that before night again veiled the earth, their hearts, now beating in sympathy and confidence, would be thickly sown with the seeds of distrust and suspicion.

"Where did you say George had gone?" the doctor asked, after a silence more eloquent than words.

"Out to Beechwood," she answered. "Frank Dale and some others are to make a night of it, George said. A gay old night it will be, I expect."

"Gayer than any I have passed for a week, I dare say," he rejoined. "I do wish people could understand that a doctor needs a night's rest once in a while. I feel pretty well fagged out."

"Hadh't you better go to bed," suggested Alice; "you would rest better there?"

"Good advice, Alice, and I believe I'll take it," he said, getting up from the sofa. "Are you coming now?"

"No. Rachel is out. I must sit up till she returns."

"You will not mind being alone, will you, pet?"

"The very idea of asking me if I mind being alone, and I a doctor's wife!" she exclaimed, in merry depreciation, taking a seat by the window.

Left by herself, however, her vaunted courage was of little value. The quaint old furniture began to assume uncouth shapes, and she was glad to turn her gaze upon the darkening street for amusement. Across the way at the Trevors' through the open window, whence issued bursts of laughter and melody, she could see bright heads glancing about. Elsie's fair curls, Maud with pink ribbons in her hair, and romping Madge, with half a dozen other young folks of the neighborhood. How dark the room behind her looked by contrast. She shivered as she glanced back into it.

"Why," she thought, "should I sit here glowering like an owl, waiting for Rachel's plodding footsteps, when so much light and mirth are within reach? I'll run over a moment anyhow, and see what the fun is about." She glided out of the parlor, darted past the open door leading into the office—a room she never willingly entered even in day time, knowing that the "skeleton in the closet" was not there a figure of speech—and, carefully locking the vestibule door, descended to the pavement. Thence, picking her way across the dark street, she ascended the garden steps, brushed quickly between the huge oleander trees standing in their great green tubs, ran up another flight of steps, and stood breathless and flushed in the lighted hall of her merry neighbors. Oh, how they crowded around her with joyful welcomes. The Trevors, Annie Burton, Connie Lester, and the rest. And how at home she looked in that "rosebud garden of girls."

She wore a delicate lawn sprigged with blue, pretty and girlish, with Etruscan bracelets upon her rounded wrists. A coquettish cluster of natural curls dripped from her high waterfall, and a soft, wild rose tint glowed on her cheeks; while the glad consciousness that her heart was safely anchored in a good man's love imparted to her face a placid serenity, which, as yet, these young girls had never known.

How they laughed and chatted; all talking together. How their eyes sparkled with youth's electric gayety. The mirth seemed contagious. Alice grew jubilant as the rest, and, when young Ralph Trevor, seizing her waist, begged for a waltz, she even whirled round two or three times ere she laughingly told him to ask his grandma to dance with him.

"You'll play for us, then, Mrs. Melville, won't you?" cried a chorus of voices. "We're going to get up a set. Play the lancers, there's a dear; you keep such perfect time."

The instrument, a grand piano, was, owing to its peculiar shape, so placed that the face of the person playing was toward the street. I mention this particularly because it has much to do with the story. Taking her seat, Mrs. Melville dashed off little snatches of schottische and mazourka, dropping finally into the graceful measure of the lancers. The piece was a familiar one, being an every-day melody in the home of her girlhood, and she did not need to follow the notes very closely. She had played but a few bars, when, glancing across the street where her home lay in shadow, she was surprised to see a light flash into the office. The blind was down, but the slats were drawn horizontal, and through the interstices she distinctly saw an arm raised to a shelf, and something poured from a bottle. "The doctor has remembered somebody's medicine, and come down to mix it," she thought. Then some one called her attention into the room behind her, and when she looked back again, the light had disappeared.

Waltz and redowa followed each other in swift succession, until Alice at last sprang up, exclaiming: "O girls! indeed I must go home," though they little guessed how she dreaded returning to the gloomy house. She could not understand it herself. She made them all cross the street with her, kept them chattering at the steps, and, but for shame, would have asked one of the girls to remain to keep her company.

There was no sign yet of Rachel, and she shuddered as she re-entered the dark parlor, less, however, from actual fear than from a presentiment of coming evil, which weighed upon her like an incubus. Once she started up to get a light, but the thought of crossing the long room was too terrible, and she sank again into her position by the window, resolved to wait bravely the return of the laggard handmaid. How loudly the old clock in the hall uttered its monotonous "tick, tick." Each second seemed an hour, and when, at last, the servant's shuffling footsteps echoed along the sidewalk, their coming was welcomed with joy such as the blithe steps of lover or troubadour never awakened.

"How long you have been, Rachel," she said. "I thought you were never coming. You may lock up the house at once."

The woman glanced at her mistress in surprise. To her, for whom the minutes had not been fear-fraught, the time had seemed very short, and it was indeed yet quite early in the evening.

Going to her room, Alice found the doctor still awake.

"You didn't sit up very late after all?" he said.

"No, it was lonesome down stairs," she answered, slowly unfastening her bracelets.

"What was that fell a while ago?" he asked. "It sounded like glass breaking."

"I don't know," she said, absently. "I suppose it was Rachel fastening the back parlor shutters. They were swollen with the rain, and she had to use a hammer."

The doctor thought that was scarcely the kind of noise he had heard; but he did not reply, his attention being attracted to the appearance of his wife, who was strangely pale, and whose fingers trembled visibly as she unbound her hair. "Why, Alice, child," he asked, "what is the matter with you? You are quivering like a leaf."

"I know. It's nervousness, I reckon; but I never felt so badly in my life."

"I will go and get some valerian for you," he said; "it will quiet your nerves."

"No, no!" she exclaimed, hurriedly. "I won't take it! You know how I detest the vile stuff. I'll be better presently."

"Yet I saw some valerian the other day on your dressing-table," he said, quietly.

Alice laughed. "Yes, I had been dosing Nicodemus," she said. "You know how it acts on cats—making them perfectly wild with excitement and glee! Well, George had been telling me that one of the amusements of his boyhood was administering it to Nicodemus, so, as 'Satan finds some mischief,' etc., I thought I would try it. I assure you there was some grand and lofty tumbling. It quite excelled the circus," and as she turned down the light she laughed again merrily at the recollection.

The next morning, which dawned bright and fair, found Alice restored to her usual spirits.

The terror of the past night was forgotten, and she sat happy and serene at the head of her well-appointed breakfast-table, waiting for the doctor, who was coming from the office.

"What were you doing with the valerian last night, Allie?" he asked, as coming in he took the seat opposite his wife.

"Nothing. Don't you remember? You wanted to get it for me, but I said I would not take it."

"But you must have been getting some before that," he rejoined, "for I find a glass containing a small quantity on the table, and the bottle of elixir of vitriol, which stood on the shelf at the right of the window, is lying shivered to atoms on the floor. That was the noise I heard last night. How did it happen?"

He spoke easily and naturally. She answered in the same tone. "I don't know, I'm sure. I expect you!"—

Her suggestion was interrupted by the entrance of George, who burst into the dining-room glowing with his morning ride in from the country. He held an official-looking envelope in his hand, and his merry countenance wore a shade of annoyance. "Here's a pleasant state of things!" he exclaimed. "Old Craiggie, it seems, cannot give a fellow a furlough once in seven years without regretting it afterward. I met the postman at the door, who gave me this," holding up the letter. "It is an order to rejoin my regiment immediately. The old chap says in a private note that the necessity is urgent—that he will be glad to oblige me another time—but I know it's only a whim. However, it's a soldier's fortune. Give me some breakfast, please, little mother, and I'll be in time for the stage yet."

A little hurried packing, a romping endeavor to kiss all the Trevor girls, from which all strangely escaped save Elsie, a tender farewell of the little mother, and Captain Melville was gone; bearing away with his glittering shoulder-straps more sunshine than any one but Elsie Trevor would have believed possible.

The conversation of the morning, though interrupted, was not forgotten. All day long the unpleasantness of the affair lay upon the doctor's mind, and when, upon his return in the evening, he found his wife sewing upon the porch, his first words were:—

"Well, Allie, have you anything more to tell me about that valerian?"

"Why, no," she said, looking up, wonderingly. "I told you I knew nothing about it."

The doctor took a turn or two across the porch, then he continued: "You know, Alice," he said in a tone of gentle reproach, "that were you to break every bottle in my office I would not be angry. And as for the valerian, though I would be very sorry to think that my wife was in the habit of using it, for I consider it little better than opium, still, if you wished to take it, it was there for you. Why, then, will you not be frank like your usual self, and tell me all about it?" He took her hand caressingly as he spoke, turning the tiny gold thimble round and round on his finger.

"What a fuss to make about a broken bottle!" she exclaimed, pettishly. "I dare say it was set upon the shelf so carelessly that a mouse in running past dislodged it."

He let her hand drop suddenly as he sadly rejoined: "Yes, Alice, that might explain the broken bottle, but the mystery of the valerian still remains. A mouse could hardly have poured that out."

"Well, I know nothing of it," she answered, a trifle coldly. "You know I would not be likely to enter the office at night alone. I have no doubt you did it yourself."

"Unfortunately for that theory," he replied, "I have not been, until this morning, in the office since before tea last evening, and then the last thing I did there was to rinse that very glass. I had been preparing some medicine for old Mr. Adams, and used that two ounce measure. I remember distinctly."

She looked up in amazement. "You certainly do not mean to tell me that you were not in the office between eight and nine!"

"I certainly was not. You know I was in bed then."

"Oh, don't; please don't tell me that!" she exclaimed, her momentary anger giving place to the nameless dread that had possessed her the previous evening; "I saw you there!"

"Alice!"

"Oh, I wish I hadn't, I wish I hadn't!" she moaned, as a cold shudder ran over her. "But I did. I went over to the Trevors a while after you had gone to bed, and it was from their windows that I saw a light in the office, and some one pouring a liquid from a bottle. O George, my husband! what does it mean? If it was not you, who was it? No one else was in the house."

The doctor seemed slightly relieved. "If you were out," he said, "some one may have entered. But why they should meddle with the valerian, I cannot imagine."

"No one entered," she rejoined, sadly. "I locked the door."

"And found it locked on your return?"

"Yes, just as I left it."

Nothing more seemed to remain to be said, and for a while neither spoke.

"Well, Alice, we will drop the subject," said the doctor at length, in a vexed tone. "It seems to be one of those cases in which the truth cannot be reached."

Nor was the matter again alluded to, though the most bitter words had been better than the silence of coldness and suspicion which followed. Try as he might, Doctor Melville could not banish the shadow from his heart. It followed him like a presence along the busy street, in his lonely drives, to the very bedsides of the dying. He could not, he would not believe his wife guilty of an untruth, and yet—and yet—her pale and startled appearance upon the night of the accident, and her apparent equivocation about the noise he had heard, together with her ingenious excuse for the valerian found upon her table, and the yet more boldly ingenious plan of attributing the affair to his own agency, formed a train of evidence that must have been convincing to any but a loving heart.

With Alice the case was even worse. Shut in by her less eventful life, her fancies became torments. I will not say that she thought of Blue Beard chambers, or of slow poison; but the memory of that unfortunate night, with the certainty that the sight she had seen was a reality and no vision, never crossed her mind without sending a cold shudder to her very heart. But worse than any gloomy remembrance was the fear that she was losing her husband's love. Were this so, life henceforward would be to her but an arid desert, for her life was all in the affections, and, dreading the worst, she mourned like Jonah by his withered gourd.

Time passed on. The flaming watchfires of autumn were quenched by winter snow, and yet she nursed her grief. She was in delicate health now, and physical weakness, added to mental distress, almost crushed her spirits to the earth. Little trace she bore of the merry girl who had filled the house with gladness early in the season.

At last, when the early snowdrops—those hardy pioneers of spring—were beginning to peep through the February snow, came her time of trial, and the one hope that had cheered her proved delusive.

The little light that was to have illumined the silent hearth-stone and reunited the hearts of its parents, flickered fitfully a day or two and went out in darkness.

"An evanescent guest below,
He came and went without a stain,
Whither and whence? We only know
Out of God's hand and back again!"

With her need all the doctor's old tenderness returned, and he resolved that the haunting phantom which had shadowed both their lives should be forever banished from his heart and home.

But alas! Who can restore lost confidence? Like water spilled, it cannot be gathered again. Vainly did Alice strive to meet her husband's love with the unquestioning confidence of the past. It could not be. The iron had entered her soul, and the wound seemed to be beyond mortal healing. Worse than all, this depression of spirit reacted upon her body, and long after the time when, according to prophetic nurses she should have been quite well again, she lay upon her sofa a weak and nervous invalid, lacking the vital will, which, more potent than any elixir of the apothecary, so often braces an ailing mother for the duties of her household.

What she most needed was a firm, loving friend, and brave as loving, who, unheeding her remonstrances, would have taken her forth into the bright spring sunshine, even though a demonstration of authority and gentle force had been necessary to the undertaking.

This the doctor could not do. What would once, through the agency of trusting love have been easy, had now, in their altered circumstances, become an impossibility. Day by day as the orchards grew white with blossoms and the air musical with song birds, he tried to persuade her to take the old drives again. But there was a point beyond which he would not go, beyond which he felt that his persuasion would seem like tyranny, and, despairing of any change for the better, he could only watch in helpless agony, while his sorrowful young wife seemed to be slowly but surely fading away from his view.

A letter written by Alice to her step-son about this time explains so well her state of mind, that I will give it entire:—

MY DEAR GEORGE: In reply to your last kind letter, wherein you chide me for my long delay in writing, I will ask you a question. Has it never occurred to you that that delay may have been caused by a desire to spare you pain—to postpone a sorrow? I trust it has, and that the revelation I am about to make may not find you wholly unprepared. For alas! I feel that the knowledge that brings to my sad heart its only joy, will be to you, who loved the little mother, a message of deepest grief. For, George, my dear boy, I am dying, and oh, I am so glad, so glad! Once, when the earth seemed all sunshine, I expressed the wish that were my happiness ever to grow less I might die, and now, when the brightness has all faded away from my life, the kind All Father is granting me my heart's desire. Oh, I thank Him! I thank Him! And my dearest friend, I want to thank you for all your kindness and gentle courtesy to me who must at one time have seemed to you as an usurper. And because I feel so sure of your affectionate sympathy, I want to make a request. It is that after I am gone you will not speak of me, unless it may be years hence when surrounded by bright young faces, you tell them of a grandma whom God in his pity took early home. With your father let me be, if possible, forgotten. It will be better so. I wish for his sake that all recollection of the past three years might be erased from his memory; for alas! I can see now what a mistake my marriage was. It was surely nothing less than the wildest presumption on my part, supposing that my love, great as it was, could atone for my childish petulance and inexperience, and make me a fitting companion for a man like him. The experiment has been made, and it has failed. Perhaps had my baby—your little brother—lived, things might have been different; but all such speculations are useless now, and all such hopes

"Have passed away,
With my desire of life."

My only hope is that he may soon forget one whose greatest trouble is that she failed to make him happy. I am so sorry to send you bad news, but I thought better that you should hear it from me. Do not let it cloud your happiness. Think rather of my release from a task to which I was unequal, and believe, my dear, that I will remain while life lasts, and perhaps beyond it, Your loving

LITTLE MOTHER.

Closing her morbid little letter in a burst of tears, Alice threw herself back upon the sofa, and, as she watched the sun sinking gloriously in the west, lay picturing to herself the land of rest, which seemed to lie just beyond those golden gates. But alas! the day dreams of the discontented are not the high visions of him who, catching through the smoke wreaths of battle a glimpse of the final victory, only girds his sword tighter, and with increased energy renews his contest in the world's great arena.

Upon Captain Melville the receipt of the sad little missive produced a puzzling sensation. Shocked and grieved as he was, his wonder was more intense. "Bless my soul! what has come over the little mother any how?" he exclaimed, in his amazement. "Trouble at home! Why, I thought everything there was as pleasant as a May morning," and, completely nonplussed, he replaced the letter slowly in its envelope. But as it was a motto of his never to passively accept a misfortune, his next action was prompt and decided.

A request, that was almost a demand, for the remainder of his curtailed furlough, backed as it was by a statement of his mother's illness, was readily granted, and, in as short a time as it was possible for steam to do it, our gallant captain was transported to his father's house. It was a gloomy contrast to his last home coming. The doctor received him kindly, but with evident surprise; and Alice, though certainly glad to see him, remonstrated gently with him for coming.

"It was kind and like you to come," she said, "but you know it will do no good, and it may make it more difficult for you to get leave should they send for you after awhile—when—when I get worse."

But had the captain needed any assurance that his visit was timely, the sight of the pale, sad face of his young step-mother would have furnished it, and he resolved to leave nothing undone which might help to banish the shadow from her life.

At tea-time she exerted herself and took her old seat at the table, even mingling in the conversation with a faint trace of her old gayety, but excused herself and left the room as soon as the meal was over.

"See here, father," exclaimed George, as soon as the door closed behind her, "I want to know what's the matter with the little mother. That's what I came home for."

"God knows, I don't," was the reply. "She has no disease." He spoke in the weary tone of calm endurance which we come to use when prolonged suffering becomes a part of our very existence, when hope gives place to dumb despair. But to impulsive George it seemed the calmness of indifference, and he broke forth, impetuously :—

"No disease! No, nothing but a broken heart! A common complaint, I fancy, and, because the poor thing is far away from home and friends, she must die of it. But I learned to love that little woman when I was here in the fall, and, though it's a hard thing for a son to say to a father, if you have injured her, you must answer to me for it." He had risen from the table in his excitement, and stood by the mantle, glaring down upon his father the picture of youthful indignation.

But no reproach passed the doctor's lips. Only a low groan escaped them as he bowed his head upon the low moulding above the grate. How many nights he had sat thus by his silent hearth-stone was known only to his Maker.

Upon George, unused in his gay soldier life to witnessing any deep emotion, the sad hopelessness of his father's attitude produced a startling effect. His anger gave place to the keenest remorse, and, in a voice of unfeigned penitence, he exclaimed: "O father! forgive me. I was mad, I was heartless, to speak so to you. I see now how it is. You are crushed with grief, and I have added my disrespect to your misery. Oh, forgive me! Say you forgive me." And, stooping, he laid his hand pleadingly upon his father's arm. Nicodemus, too, came and rubbed sympathetically against his master's feet, as night after night he had sought to express the comforting words he could not speak. Ah! if he could have spoken.

"Say no more, George," said the doctor, at length, raising his head. "Your zeal in the cause of my poor wife forbids my anger. Besides, strange as it may seem, I feel impelled to make you my confidant, and tell you of my trouble, which, as often happens, originated in a very trifling circumstance. You remember the night before you went away last, when you went out to Beechwood?" Thereupon followed a narrative of the events of that unfortunate night.

But judge of Doctor Melville's pained surprise, when, at the close, instead of the commiserating words, or, at least, silent sympathy he had expected, his son burst into uncontrollable laughter. "O Nicodemus!" exclaimed the graceless youth, as, after a while, his mirth subsiding a little, he lifted the great yellow cat, and, standing him upon his hind feet on his knee, he sat regarding him with an expression of serio-comic woe, "O Nicodemus! we're into a pretty scrape now. Why, father," he continued, "this gentleman and I are the guilty parties. The very idea of your never respecting!" And, overcome with the ludicrous side of the affair, he shook again with laughter.

A faint light began to dawn upon the doctor's mind, but the mists were yet clinging around his mental vision, and he begged his son to explain. "I cannot understand it," he said; "I thought you were in the country."

"So I did go out to Beechwood, per programme. But as it was fine moonlight, some of the fellows proposed riding over to Clarksville, taking the cars, and spending the evening in the city at the opera. We were coming down the turnpike just outside the village, when I remembered that my lorgnette was on the back parlor mantle at home, and, telling the others to wait for me at the cross-roads, I rode on to get it. Finding the house dark and the door locked, I supposed you were all out, and was concluding that I had had my labor for my pains, when fortunately, or unfortunately, as it seems, I recollected my old latch key—it had been on my key ring unused since my boyhood—and with its aid I effected an easy entrance. I had gotten the glass, and was retracing my steps, when a slight noise in the office attracted my attention, and striking a light to ascertain the cause, I found Nicodemus slowly perambulating along one of the shelves. I suppose my entrance startled the gentleman a little, for just as I reached the door, he lost his balance and fell, bringing down in his descent the bottle of elixir. 'Oh, ho, my boy!' I thought, 'you're at your old tricks, are you?' I know he deserved a thrashing, but, as I expected to have a lively time that night, I concluded that he should have the same, and, hastily pouring out a little valerian, I administered the dose, and taking him out with me, after relocking the door, I put him over the gate into the back yard to enjoy himself there to his heart's content. That, father, is the true history of the matter, and I needn't say how sorry I am for the trouble caused by my foolishness. But it seems the oddest thing that you didn't inquire—however, it was my hasty departure, I suppose, which prevented that, as well as an earlier confession on my part. Well, I'm glad it's over at last," he continued, as his father, who seemed to be slowly realizing the facts, did not reply. "And I guess there's a pretty good chance for the little mother yet, now that this bugbear is lifted from her mind. Shall I explain it to her, or will you?"

"Thank you, I will do so," replied the doctor, and taking the huge cat in his arms, he went up to the room, where his wife sat in her silence and sorrow.

She looked up a little wonderingly as he entered, for he did not often now seek her society when she appeared to desire to be alone, and the change in his tone struck her yet more strangely. It seemed like an echo of the glad old time.

"Allie, Nicodemus has come to make a confession," he said, crossing over to her, and, taking a seat by her side, he related the story.

I need not describe the feelings of Alice when the truth was known. It was as though a mountain had been lifted from her heart, and, though the reconciliation which followed was mingled with remorse on both sides, it filled her with the truest happiness. "And what shall be done to Nicodemus?" she asked, after a while, as, smiling through her tears, she stroked the unconscious cause of all the trouble.

"Give him a dose of valerian," cried George, from the doorway, and entering the room he attempted to congratulate the "little mother." But the oddity of the affair again became too much for his risibles, and he went off into another fit of laughter.

Perhaps this was better than any words would have been, for the others, catching the infection, joined in, and once more the old house, so long overshadowed, rang with peals of merriment. Would that all misunderstandings and family troubles might thus end in a hearty laugh.

TAKING OFFENCE.

THERE is immense wisdom in the old proverb: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty." Hannah More said: "If I wished to punish an enemy, I should make him hate somebody." To punish ourselves for others' faults is superlative folly. The arrow shot from another's bow is practically harmless until our thought barbs it. It is our pride that makes another's criticism rankle, our self-will that makes another's deed offensive, our egotism that is hurt by another's self-assertion. Well may we be offended at faults of our own, but we can hardly afford to be miserable for the faults of others. A courtier told Constantine that the mob had broken the head off his statue with stones. The emperor lifted his hand to his head, saying: "It is very surprising, but I don't feel hurt in the least." We should remember that the world is wide—that there are a thousand millions of different human wills, opinions, ambitions, tastes, and loves; that each person has a different history, constitution, culture, character from all the rest; that human life is the work, the play, the ceaseless action and reaction upon each other of these different living atoms. We should go forth into life with the smallest expectations, but with the largest patience; with a keen relish for, and appreciation of, everything beautiful, great, and good, but with a temper so genial that the friction of the world cannot wear upon our sensibilities, and equanimity so settled that no passing breath or accidental disturbance shall agitate or ruffle it, and with a charity broad enough to cover the whole world's evil, and sweet enough to neutralize what is bitter in it, determined not to be offended when no offence

Knit 2 rounds plain; repeat from * twice more. Repeat from * again, knitting only one round plain between the reducing rounds, until you have 15 stitches on your front needle, 7 on one back needle, 8 on the other. Knit one round plain, knitting on one needle the stitches off the two back needles. Cast off, knitting the stitches on front and back needles together.

PEN-WIPER IN SHAPE OF A SHEAF OF WHEAT.

OUR pattern imitates a sheaf of wheat. The upper part is made of ears of wheat pasted regularly upon a rouleau of card-board, and which appear to be held together by a colored silk ribbon, ornamented with point russe embroidery.

HOARSE sound the Abbey bells at e'en,
Hoarse wail the winds, the hours between;
Bleak gleam the stars, and o'er my head
Unthinking strangers coldly tread.
Cold are the clouds that round me bind,
And cold the world I leave behind;
Cold damps pervade my resting-place,
And cold the clasp of Death's embrace.
Lone is the couch on which I sleep,
And few the tears the worldly weep;
Cold is the dirge the pine-trees moan,
Empty the mockery of a stone.
Sad sigh these elms that leafless wave,
Oh! cold the slumbers of the grave;
And cold the sun's last glim'ring beam
Shall fade ere Time doth end the dream.

PARIS, 1870.

CHILL penury weighs down the heart itself; and though it be sometimes endured with calmness, it is but the calmness of despair.—Mrs. Jamson.

of calm endurance which we come to use when prolonged suffering becomes a part of our very existence, when hope gives place to dumb despair. But to impulsive George it seemed the calmness of indifference, and he broke forth, impetuously :—

"No disease! No, nothing but a broken heart! A common complaint, I fancy, and, because the poor thing is far away from home and friends, she must die of it. But I learned to love that little woman when I was here in the fall, and, though it's a hard thing for a son to say to a father, if you have injured her, you must answer to me for it." He had risen from the table in his excitement, and stood by the mantle, glaring down upon his father the picture of youthful indignation.

But no reproach passed the doctor's lips. Only a low groan escaped them as he bowed his head upon the low moulding above the grate. How many nights he had sat thus by his silent hearth-stone was known only to his Maker.

Upon George, unused in his gay soldier life to witnessing any deep emotion, the sad hopelessness of his father's attitude produced a startling effect. His anger gave place to the keenest remorse, and, in a voice of unfeigned penitence, he exclaimed: "O father! forgive me. I was mad, I was heartless, to speak so to you. I see now how it is. You are crushed with grief, and I have added my disrespect to your misery. Oh, forgive me! Say you forgive me." And, stooping, he laid his hand pleadingly upon his father's arm. Nicodemus, too, came and rubbed sympathetically against his master's feet, as night after night he had sought to express the comforting words he could not speak. Ah! if he could have spoken.

"Say no more, George," said the doctor, at length, raising his head. "Your zeal in the cause of my poor wife forbids my anger. Besides, strange as it may seem, I feel impelled to make you my confidant and tell you of my end of back needle. Next needle—Make 1 and knit 1 twice, knit 2 together twice, seam 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1 and knit 1 four times, knit 2 together twice, seam 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1 and knit 1 twice. This completes the needle. Knit the next needle exactly the same. You must have 26 stitches always on each of these needles, and, until you begin to reduce, 19 on the back needle. Work the back needle up to centre stitch as follows: make 1 and knit 1 twice, knit 2 together twice, knit 3. Repeat from * 5 times more.

CHILD'S SOCK

KNITTED IN THE SHELL PATTERN.

Materials.—Four needles No. 15, a size smaller for a loose knitter, one ounce of Andalusian wool.

CAST 72 stitches on one needle; knit them off on three needles—26 on two, 20 on the third. Knit 2, seam 2 alternately for 32 rounds. Next round—Knit 2, seam 2 alternately until you reach the 9th stitch of the needle, which has only 20 stitches on it; knit this 9th and the 10th stitch together. The next stitch is called the centre stitch of the back needle. Each round down the leg commences on it, and it must always be seamed.

* Knit 3 rounds plain (remember to seam the 1st or centre stitch). 4th round. Back needle, seam centre stitch, knit 3, knit 2 together twice, make 1 (by throwing the wool over the needle), and knit 1 twice. You are now at the 25th. Seam centre stitch, knit 1, knit 2 together, knit plain rest of round to within 3 of the end, when knit 2 together, knit 1. This is for the reducing. 26th and 27th. Knit plain. 28th. Knitted like the 4th, only after and before the centre stitch you will have only 2 plain stitches to knit instead of three. 29th, 30th, and 31st. Knit plain. 32d. Same as 28th.

Repeat from 25th round twice more, until you have only 13 stitches left on your back needle. Observe after each reducing there will be one less to knit before and after the centre stitch in the pattern rounds. The last time you must knit 2 together immediately after and before the centre stitch. * 49th, 50th, and 51st. Knit plain. 52d. Same as the 4th, only omitting to knit 3 after and before the centre stitch. Repeat from * twice more. If you count the patterns, you will find you ought to have worked 15. 61st. Knit plain. This finishes your sock to the heel. You will have 18 stitches on back needle, 26 on each of the others.

Prepare for heel by knitting to the end of your back needle, and from 1st side (or next needle) knit off on back needle 10 stitches. Knit the other 16 stitches from 1st side needle on another needle. With a third needle knit 2d side needle to within 10 stitches of the end. These 10 you must pass to the heel or back needle without knitting. You will have 33 stitches on heel, 16 on each side needle. The two front needles are not used again until the heel is completed.

HEEL.—The heel is made by working the back needle backwards and forwards, knitting and seaming alternate rows until it is long enough, which it will be after working 26 rows. Slip the 1st stitch in each row, excepting the first time you knit the first row. Seam or knit the centre stitch as required. 27th row. Slip 1, knit 20, knit 2 together, * turn your needle, slip 1, seam 10, seam 2 together. Again turn your needle, slip 1, knit 10, knit 2 together; repeat from * until you have only 12 stitches left on needle.

With the needle that has the 12 stitches on take up, and, as you take up, knit 15 stitches from side of heel, knit 3 stitches off front needle on the same. Knit plain all the stitches from the 2 front needles, excepting the last 3 on another needle. These 3 must be knitted on a third needle, with which take up, and, as you take up, knit 15 stitches from other side of heel; knit also 6 stitches from next needle on this. You will have 24 stitches on each side needle, 26 on front needle. The next needle is your 1st side needle; * 1st side needle. Knit plain all till within 5 of the end, when knit 2 together, knit 3. Front needle.—Make 1 and knit 1 twice, knit 2 together twice, seam 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1 and knit 1 four times, knit 2 together twice, seam 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1 and knit 1 twice. 2d side needle. Knit 3, slip 1, knit 1, pull the slipped stitch over the knitted one; knit plain to end of needle. Knit plain 3 rounds; repeat from * until you have only 18 stitches on each side needle. This finishes the reducing for the foot.

The 4 rounds between the last asterisks are now to be repeated, only in the pattern rounds do not reduce on the side needles; knit all the stitches plain. These rounds must be repeated until, counting the patterns from the top of socks, you have worked 28, and have the three plain rounds beyond.

THE TOE.—This is all done in plain knitting. Put as many stitches on your front needle as you have on the other two together, taking them as fairly as you can off each side needle, two off one end, three off the other. You will have 31 on front needle, 15 on one side needle, 16 on the other. Knit 3 rounds plain and up to the front needle.

* TO REDUCE THE TOE.—Front needle. Knit

1, slip 1, knit 1, pull the slipped stitch over the knitted one; knit plain to within 3 of end, when knit 2 together, knit 1. 1st back needle. Knit 1, slip 1, knit 1, pull the slipped stitch over the knitted one, knit plain to end of needle. 2d. Knit plain to within 3 of end, when knit 2 together, knit 1. Knit 2 rounds plain; repeat from * twice more. Repeat from * again, knitting only one round plain between the reducing rounds, until you have 15 stitches on your front needle, 7 on one back needle, 8 on the other. Knit one round plain, knitting on one needle the stitches off the two back needles. Cast off, knitting the stitches on front and back needles together.

PEN-WIPER IN SHAPE OF A SHEAF OF WHEAT.

Our pattern imitates a sheaf of wheat. The upper part is made of ears of wheat pasted regularly upon a rouleau of card-board, and which appear to be held together by a colored silk ribbon, ornamented with point russe embroidery.

dery. Our pattern is eight inches high; it measures seven inches and one-fifth round at the bottom. The card-board tube, which measures five inches and one-fifth round at the upper end, must only be high enough for the ears of wheat to come beyond it at the top. The real pen-wiper consists of narrow strips of black cloth, fastened in a card-board tube one inch and three-fifths high; this tube is fastened on a round flat piece of card-board, covered with cloth. The outer edge is ornamented with lap-pets of colored cloth, as can be seen in illustration. The pen-wiper is inserted within the sheaf of wheat. The case can also be used for matches.

SHIELD NEEDLE BOOK.

Materials.—Red cashmere, red and white cloth, fine white flannel, blue, black, and gold silk cordon, gold braid, narrow satin ribbon, card-board.

TAKE two pieces of card-board, four inches high and three inches broad, and cut out the outer edge as shown in the design. Cover the under part on both sides with colored cashmere or silk, turn the edges in, and sew the two pieces together; cover the upper side with the same colored lining, and draw the white cloth over it (the latter must not be turned in at the edges). Both are joined by a line of white buttonhole stitch of black silk cordon. The red fields are ornamented with flat-stitch scallops. On the white field is a red, on the other a black cross, embroidered with gold at the edges. Two pieces of scalloped flannel are fastened on each long side of the upper flat part of the needle-book, and joined together at their outer edges. The handle, which is made of blue and white striped satin ribbon, half an inch broad, is sewn on to the under flat side of the needle-book, which is fastened by a little bow on one side, and a little loop on the other.

SHIELD NEEDLE-BOOK.

FRINGE KNOTTED OR SEWN.

THE choice of material, either black silk or drilled white cotton (crochet cotton) will decide the use for this fringe whether for dresses, cloaks, sashes, etc., or for counterpanes, blinds, and so forth. The easy execution is seen from the illustration.

WATCH-POCKET OF WHITE PIQUE.

THIS pretty little watch-pocket is made of white piqué, and ornamented with white embroidery and soutache. After having traced the pattern on the pocket, work the embroldery with the knitting cotton, and sew on the soutache. Line it with calico, and join the different parts together with buttonhole stitch. Fasten some cotton balls at the bottom, and a circle of buttonhole stitches at the top, by means of which the pocket is hung on the wall.

SPONGE BAG.

Materials.—Gray cloth, yellow toile citée, a piece of white calico eleven inches square, two yards of red woollen braid one inch broad, black beads; red and black woollen cord.

THIS bag is very useful for hanging up in bath-rooms or bedrooms over washhand-stands, etc. The outer covering is of gray cloth. The border of black beads is about one inch from the outer edge. In the corners is a raised bead flower, and a corresponding one may also be placed in the middle.

Lay a piece of linen between the toile cirée and the outer covering, turn the edges over, and backstitch them together, and put a braid ruche round the edge.

The cords fastened at the corners measures one and a half yard in length, and are fastened in the middle by a looped rosette, and knotted together to form a kind of bag.

TOBACCO POUCH.

OUR pattern is made of brown leather, and lined with brown silk. It consists of a flat card-board bottom, four and two-fifth inches long, three and two-fifth inches wide. The corners must be rounded off; it is covered on the outside with leather, and on the inside with glacé silk. On to this bottom fasten a border three inches deep, ornamented with black silk point russe embroidery. This border is curved in the manner seen in Fig. 1, so as to be higher on both sides than in front and in the back, so that the sides overlap each other when the pouch is closed. Fig. 2 shows the pouch open. In closing it the sides are first overlapped, and then the front and back. The pouch is fastened by means of a piece of brown silk elastic.

SHAWL OR CLOAK STRAP TO BE USED IN TRAVELLING.

THE bands are made of canvas, worked with zephyr, lined with kid. The buckles are fastened on these.

SILK WINDER IN THE SHAPE OF A STAR.

THESE winders are meant to show how to wind cotton or silk in the shape of a star. Take two pieces of card-board, one and four-fifths of an inch square, pasted one over the other in such a manner as to form a star pattern with eight branches, as can be seen in Fig. 1. Insert into these eight pins (see Fig. 2); these pins are meant to fasten the windings of the cotton, and ornament the star in the centre with a colored wafer or point russe embroidery pattern. Begin to wind the cotton at the place marked a; continue to wind it, from Fig. 2, always 4 times double; follow the order of the letters—that is, wind 4 times from a to b, carry the thread on the wrong side from b to c, wind 4 times from c to d, then 4 times from e to f, and so on. When you have come back again to a, repeat as before, till the card-board is covered, as can be seen in Fig. 1. The cotton is then fastened on the wrong side.

CLUNY LACE PATTERN.

(See Plate printed in Colors, in front of Book.)

Materials.—Crochet cotton No. 14, Penelope needle No. 3½, and colored mohair braid of half an inch in width.

THE CIRCLE.

The Beading.—Commence with 9 chain, turn, miss the last 6 chain, and work 1 plain in the 3d stitch of the chain; then 1 chain, miss 1, and 1 treble in the 1st chain stitch; * turn back, that is, on the wrong side. Make 6 chain, and work 1 treble on the top of the last treble stitch; 1 chain, miss 1, and 1 treble on the plain stitch; turn back. Make 6 chain, and work 1 plain on the treble stitch; then 1 chain, miss 1, and 1 treble on the next treble stitch. Repeat from * until 9 points are made, counting both sides of the beading; turn back, and for The Small Star—Make 12 chain, turn, miss the last 5, and work 1 single in the 7th stitch of the 12 chain to form a round loop; turn so as to cross the chain, and in the round loop work 2 plain; then 5 chain, and 2 plain 4 times more; make 2 chain, and on the 6 chain left miss 2, and work 1 single; then 3 chain, and on the beading work 1 treble on the last treble stitch; 1 chain, miss 1, 1 treble; turn back. Make 6 chain, work 1 plain on the treble stitch; 1 chain, miss 1, 1 treble; turn back; then 3 chain, join to the next 5 chain of the star; 3 chain, 1 treble on the treble stitch; 1 chain, miss 1; and 1 treble. Repeat from * 3 times more; then fasten off, leaving an end of cotton, and when the circle is finished use it to join the 1st and last row together. Always take both edges of the previous stitches. The work should be tight.

The Centre Star.—Commence with 6 chain, and work 1 single in the 1st stitch to make it round. 1st round. Work 2 plain, both in a chain stitch of the foundation round, 6 times, then 1 single. 2d. For the 1st division, make 12 chain, take the beading and join to the first point of it; and on the 12 chain, miss 1, 1 plain, 1 treble, 4 long, 2 treble, 1 plain, 2 single; and on the 1st round, 1 single in the same stitch as the last, and 1 single in the next stitch.

2d division. Make 11 chain, miss the last 4 chain, and work 1 single to form a dot; then 4 chain, join to the next point but one of the beading; make 9 chain, miss the last 4, and work 1 single; then 6 chain, and on the 1st round, 1 single in the same stitch as the last, then 1 single.

3d. Work as the 1st division, joining to the next point but one of the beading.

Repeat these 3 divisions 3 times more. Fasten off. Work 15 circles more the same.

THE BANDS OF INSERTION.

Commence with 5 chain, turn, miss the last 3 chain, and work 2 treble stitches both in the 2d chain stitch; then 4 chain, and work 2 treble both in the 1st stitch of these 4 chain, which forms two small divisions. * Make 10 chain, miss the last 3, and work 2 treble both in the 7th stitch of these 10 chain, then 1 plain between the two divisions; 4 chain, 2 treble in the 1st stitch of them; work an extra long stitch on the 1st stitch of the foundation chain. Make 11 chain, join to the last stitch of the 6 chain to the right, miss 1, and 1 single on the 11 chain, leaving 9 chain. Make 10 chain, and work 2 plain in the centre of the 9 chain; then 4 chain, and 1 extra long on the last long stitch, Make 5 chain, miss the last 3, and work 2 treble in the 2d stitch; 4 chain, miss 3, and 2 treble in the 1st stitch of the 4 chain; then 2 chain, join to the 6th stitch of the 10 chain to the right, miss 1, and 1 single on the 2 chain. Repeat from * until four small crosses are made, and fasten off. Repeat these bands of insertion.

The Squares.—Commence with 7 chain, work 1 single on the 1st stitch; and in this foundation round work 8 chain and 1 plain, then 11 chain and 1 plain, alternately for 8 loops. Fasten off, and repeat.

THE BORDER.

Commence with 6 chain, miss the last stitch, work 1 plain; then 9 chain, 2 plain in the 1st stitch of the 6th chain; * and for the cross make 8 chain, and work 2 treble both in the 5th stitch of these 8 chain; then 4 chain, and work 2 treble both in the 1st stitch of these 4 chain; make 2 chain, and join to the 6th stitch of the 9 chain to the right; miss 1, and 1 single on the 2 chain; then 9 chain, work 2 treble, both in the 6th stitch of these 9 chain, 1 plain between the treble stitches of the cross, 4 chain, and 2 treble in the 1st stitch of it; 5 chain, 1 plain in the chain to the left; turn back. Work in the last 5 chain, 6 chain and 2 plain, 3 times; 9 chain, miss the cross, and work 1 plain in the 5 chain to the left; turn back; 9 chain, 2 plain in the centre of the last 9 chain. Repeat from * until 7 crosses are made. Then along the straight edge work a row of 3 chain and 1 plain in each loop of chain, so as to curve it.

The crochet being completed, it is now necessary to attach it to the braid, and as this must be done by measurement, the easiest method will be to tack the various lines on a strip of stiff paper about twenty-three inches by eight, and ruling it according to the following directions, this is presuming the work to be four patterns in width, but it can be enlarged to any size by allowing four inches and a quarter to each repeat, either in length or width. Our engraving therefore represents nearly one-quarter of the Antimacassar, and the lines are to be ruled in the same form, the only difference being the size, which is as follows:—

For the 1st strip of braid, rule a line two inches from the edge of the paper, and a second line half an inch from this; then leave a space of three-quarters of an inch for the bands of insertion, and rule two lines half an inch apart for the second line of braid; now leave a space of two inches and a half, and rule the lines for the two strips of braid and insertion as before. Then rule the same distances across the paper.

Take a length of braid sufficient for the two lines, that is, not less than forty-six inches, tack it along the first line, then turn it twice to form the pointed end of the border, tack it along the second line, finishing the other end the same, and joining the braid under one of the turnings. In tacking the braids on the cross lines, the point for the border should be made in the centre of the braid, so that the two ends may be left to continue the pattern when the paper is shifted.

Then with a needle and white cotton stitch the various parts of the work to the braid, placing the edge of the crochet over the edge of the braid.

KNITTED JACKET

FOR A GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS.

THIS jacket, without sleeves, is knitted with blue fleecy in common brioche stitch, and trimmed in front with a knitted strip in black and gray wool. Cut first a good paper pattern, and try it on. Begin the back and the front parts separately at the lower edge; cast on 7 stitches. Knit in rows backwards and forwards in brioche stitch, increasing and decreasing at the end of the rows from the paper pattern. The front parts are to be worked without increasings. The different parts are then sewn together on the wrong side; line the edge of the front part with a strip of black calico; make buttonholes on one side, and sew buttons on the other; the jacket is bound all round with black ribbon an inch and a fifth wide. To hide this binding, sew on the jacket two rouleaux of double gray wool; each of these rouleaux consists of a strip about three-quarters of an inch wide, knitted in rows backwards and forwards.

AN ARTICLE ON FOOD.

Food, that by which the living body is nourished, in its widest sense comprehends both liquid and solid aliment. In the following article, the subject will be considered chiefly with reference to the principles which regulate, or ought to regulate, the food of man, and on which, as far as ascertained, the nutriment of this material frame is conducted.

Water is not only the medium by means of which most of the operations which go on in living bodies are conducted, but it also enters so largely into the composition of these bodies, that it must be regarded as one of the alimentary principles, a due supply of which is necessary not only for health, but for life; and this supply must be constant, in order to compensate for the loss of moisture which is continually going on from the surfaces, exterior and interior, of the living body.

The food taken by man and animals, has, or ought to have, reference in its composition to two distinct ends—the nourishment or the bodily tissues, and the maintenance of animal temperature. Milk is the only single article of diet which in itself contains this essential combination in properly balanced proportion; we know that it is capable not only of sustaining, but of nourishing in growth the body of the young animal, and thus we have plainly set before us, what He who made and sustains all things has provided as necessary for the sustenance of the creature, when that creature is confined to one means of nourishment solely. In addition to water and saline ingredients, milk contains three distinct sets of principles: the albuminous, represented by the curd; the saccharine—in which is included the farinaceous—represented by the sugar, and the oleaginous, or fatty, by the cream. Of these, the albuminous principles and salts are requisite for the building up of the frame; the saccharine and oleaginous for, so to speak, supplying it with fuel; they are what has been called “respiratory food,” because they chiefly furnish materials, carbon and hydrogen, which may combine with the oxygen taken in from the air by the lungs, and burn as it were within the body by a slow and gentle process. It must not, however, be imagined that the saccharine and oleaginous principles are solely devoted to purposes of fuel; they also serve important ends in the nutrition of the body, but as they contain no azote or nitrogen, it is evident they cannot afford proper nutriment to tissues of which this element forms an essential component; they cannot, therefore, form muscle, but they can form fat, which contains no nitrogen, and requires none. In truth, the sugar, starch, and probably the fibre and gum of vegetables, must constitute the chief sources for the formation of fat in graminivorous or vegetable feeding animals. The albuminous, the saccharine, and the oleaginous principles must each be taken as the representative of a peculiar class of substances. Under the head of albuminous principles falls the caseine, or curd of milk; albumen, as we see it in the egg; and fibrine, as it coagulates from blood, or forms part of animal muscle. These are principles all identical, or nearly so, in composition, but in different states of vital organization; they are composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and contain phosphorus and sulphur in small proportions. They are, therefore, adapted to afford due nourishment to such portions of the living animal body as are similarly constituted; the milk curd is the only substance contained in that fluid from which the young animal can form its blood and its muscle; from the albumen of the egg alone all the tissues of the chick are constructed; and the carnivorous animal subsists upon the muscle—flesh—of its victims; these principles are therefore in themselves capable of sustaining life; not so the oleaginous and the saccharine, which represent, the one the fats and oils, and the other the starch or fecula, the sugar, and the gum. These being deficient in nitrogen, in sulphur, and phosphorus, cannot yield them, and therefore an animal fed upon them alone, will die of starvation—as regards certain essential components of its body at least. It was, for long, a paradox, how animals which lived on vegetable food, formed from it the albuminous principles contained within their bodies, because it was thought that in the vegetable kingdom these azotized compounds did not exist. Chemistry of late years has solved the difficulty, by proving that vegetables do contain albuminous principles answering to those found in animal substances; not, it is true, in the same large proportion, but quite sufficient to afford all necessary nourishment, even to the muscular bull or the gigantic elephant. These principles, and, indeed, their own entire structure, plants elaborate “from carbonic acid, water, and ammonia; that is, from the constituents of the atmosphere, with the addition of sulphur, and of certain constituents of the crust of the earth;” plants, therefore, may truly be said to produce the blood of animals. Certainly, animals which live upon vegetables have to consume a very much larger bulk of material than animals which live upon flesh; but for this, their habits and the nature of their digestive organs have been arranged by the Creator. Vegetables, therefore, are the original formers of these albuminous principles, which they present ready prepared to the digestive organs of the vegetable eating animal; the latter have simply the task of fitting them for intermixture with the blood, previous to their becoming component constituents of the animal body. In the animal, however, it must be evident that they exist in a much more compact condition than in vegetable substances, and that the flesh-eating animal will require to consume a much smaller proportion of its natural food, than the vegetable feeder. Both classes of animals, however, breathe, that is, take in oxygen by the lungs, which, in maintaining their animal temperature, must combine with respiratory elements—carbon and hydrogen—these the vegetable feeder receives in abundance, in the starch, the saccharine ingredients, the woody fibre, etc., which make up the mass of vegetable substance; sources evidently not open to the animal living on flesh alone. This, it is true, will receive some amount of respiratory food in the fat of its prey; but it will also require to make more violent muscular exertion than the vegetable feeder, so that using up its muscle in so doing it may obtain the carbon and hydrogen—which are contained in muscular substances as well as in other albuminous principles—for the purposes of animal fuel. In accordance with this, we find that the carnivorous animals expend much more muscular force in obtaining their sustenance—in hunting—than the graminivorous animal.

What is applicable to the food of animals is also to that of man, as regards the nutrient principles: the bodies of both stand upon the same level, but man has the will and the power to consume both vegetable and animal food, either mixed or singly, as may suit his habits. Existence upon animal flesh alone is not common, but it is practicable and practised by the Indians of the South American Pampas, and by many people who live by hunting; but all these, like the carnivorous animal, make long-continued muscular exertion, without which, indeed, under the peculiar diet, they could not preserve health or life. Sir Francis Head relates in his Journey over the Pampas, that whilst making immense exertions, he lived for months together exclusively on beef and water; this being the diet of the roamers over these immense plains, who spend most of their time in active exercise on horseback.

(Conclusion next month.)

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Chicken Soup.—Cut up two large fine fowls, as if carving them for table, and wash the pieces in cold water. Take half a dozen thin slices of cold ham, and lay them in a soup-pot, mixed among the pieces of chicken. Season them with a very little Cayenne, a little nutmeg, and a few blades of mace, but no salt, as the ham will make it salt enough. Add a head of celery, split and cut into long bits, a quarter of a pound of butter, divided in two, and rolled in flour. Pour on three quarts of milk. Set the soup-pot over the fire, and let it boil rather slowly, skimming it well. When it has boiled an hour, put in some small round dumplings, made of half a pound of flour mixed with a quarter of a pound of butter; divide this dough into equal portions, and roll them in your hands into little balls about the size of a large hickory-nut. The soup must boil till the flesh of the fowls is loose on the bones, but not till it drops off. Stir in, at the last, the beaten yolks of four eggs; and let the soup remain about five minutes longer over the fire. Then take it up. Cut off from the bones the flesh of the fowls, and divide it into mouthfuls. Cut up the slices of ham in the same manner. Mince the livers and gizzards. Put the bits of fowl and ham in the bottom of a large tureen, and pour the soup upon it. This soup will be found excellent, and may be made of large old fowls, that cannot be cooked in any other way. If they are so old that when the soup is finished they still continue tough, remove them entirely, and do not serve them up in it. Similar soup may be made of a large old turkey.

Stewed Rock-Fish.—Take a large rock-fish, and cut it in slices near an inch thick. Sprinkle it very slightly with salt, and let it remain for half an hour. Slice very thin a dozen large onions. Put them into a stewpan with a quarter of a pound of fresh butter, cut into bits. Set them over a slow fire, and stir them continually till they are quite soft, taking care not to let them become brown. Then put in the sliced fish in layers; seasoning each layer with a mixture of white ground ginger, Cayenne pepper, and grated nutmeg; add some chopped parsley, and some bits of butter rolled in flour. Pour in a pint of water, and, if you choose, a small wineglassful of vinegar (tarragon* vinegar will be best). Set it over a good fire and let it cook about an hour. When done, take out the fish carefully, to avoid breaking the slices. Lay it in a deep dish that has been made hot, and cover it immediately. Have ready the beaten yolks of two eggs. Stir them into the gravy. Give it one boil up; and then either pour it over the fish, or serve it up in a sauce-boat. Halibut, fresh cod, or any other large fish may be stewed in this manner.

French Stewed Oysters.—Take a hundred large fine oysters. Set them over the fire in their own liquor (skimming them well), and when they begin to simmer take them out with a perforated ladle, and throw them directly into a pan of cold water to plump them. When they are quite cold, place them in a sieve, and drain them well. Having saved their liquor, add to it a quarter of a pound of fresh butter divided into four pieces (each piece rolled in flour), a dozen blades of mace, a powdered nutmeg, and a small saltspoonful of Cayenne. Set this mixture over the fire, and stir it till the butter and flour are well mixed all through. Then put in the oysters, and as soon as they have come to a boil, take off the saucepan, and stir in immediately the beaten yolks of three eggs. Serve them up hot.

Italian Chicken Salad.—Make a dressing in the proportion of the yolks of three hard-boiled eggs, mashed or pounded fine; a saltspoonful of salt; and the same quantity of mustard, and of Cayenne; and a saltspoonful of powdered white sugar; four table-spoonfuls of salad-oil, and two table-spoonfuls of vinegar (tarragon vinegar will be best). Simmer this dressing over the fire, but do not let it come to a boil. Stir it all the time. Take a sufficiency of the white meat of cold fowls, and pull or cut it into flakes. Pile it in the middle of a dish, and pour the salad dressing over it. Have ready two fine fresh lettuces that have been laid in cold water. Strip off the outside leaves; cut up the best part of the lettuces, and arrange it evenly in a ridge, or circular heap all round the pile of chicken in the centre. On the top of the ridge of lettuce, place the whites of the eggs, cut into rings and laid round so as to form a chain. Of course a portion of the lettuce is to be helped with the chicken.

Stewed Calf's Head.—Take a fine large calf's head; empty it; wash it clean, and boil it till it is quite tender, in just water enough to cover it. Then carefully take out the bones, without spoiling the appearance of the head. Season it with a little salt and Cayenne, and a grated nutmeg. Pour over it the liquor in which it has been boiled, adding a gill of vinegar, and two table-spoonfuls of capers, or of green nasturtian-seeds, that have been pickled. Let it stew very slowly for half an hour. Have ready some forcemeat balls made of minced veal-suet, grated bread-crumbs, grated lemon-peel, and shred sweet marjoram—adding beaten yolk of egg to bind the other ingredients together. Put in the forcemeat balls, and stew it slowly a quarter of an hour longer, adding some bits of butter rolled in flour to enrich the gravy. Send it to table hot.

Lamb Chops.—Fry them a light brown in butter, then add a little water, flour, salt, and a dust of pepper, to the gravy; let it brown, and pour it over the chops.

Mutton Kidneys Broiled.—Skin and split without parting asunder; skewer them through the outer edge and keep them flat; lay the opened sides first to the fire, which should be clear and brisk; in ten minutes turn them; sprinkle with salt and Cayenne, and when done, which will be in three minutes afterwards, take them from the fire, put a piece of butter inside them, squeeze some lemon-juice over them, and serve as hot as possible.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

German Hard Chocolate Cakes.—Grate and sift half a pound of chocolate. Beat the yolks of two eggs, and add the chocolate gradually; add the whites of six eggs, beaten to snow, to the yolks and chocolate; beat well, and if not sweet enough add sugar. If the chocolate is good, they will be sufficiently sweet. Take off small bits with a teaspoon, and bake on buttered paper.

Soft Chocolate Cake.—One pound of sugar, twenty eggs beat half an hour without separating, half a pound of grated chocolate added gradually to the egg and sugar, with three-fourths of a pound of starch flour; the whole beaten half an hour. Butter the forms, and sprinkle them with pulverized crackers, and turn in the mixture.

Vanities.—Take two eggs, beat without separating as light as possible; add a teaspoonful of salt, and wet up as much flour as will roll; they should be pretty stiff. Take small bits of the dough, not larger than a teaspoon bowl, roll them in the hand until quite round, dredge the moulding-board with flour, and roll as thin as possible. Fry in sweet lard that has not been used to fry in before.

Cream Drop Cake.—A half pint of rich cream, and a half pint of egg, beat the yolks and whites separately; add a teaspoonful of salt, and as much flour as can be beat in with a spoon; it should be just thick enough to drop from a spoon; butter pans, and drop the cake on it; let it bake hard. If the cream is sour, add soda.

American Raised Waffles.—One pint of sweet milk, one heaping teaspoonful of butter, three eggs, a tablespoonful of thick brewer's yeast, one quart of flour, and another teaspoonful of sweet milk, in which is dissolved a quarter of a teaspoonful of soda. Let it rise until very light, then bake as other waffles. Serve hot with butter and sugar.

Cream Griddle Cakes.—One quart of sour cream, four beaten eggs, one teaspoonful of salt, two of soda, and one pint of flour; mix the soda in half the flour, and stir it in last; bake as soon as mixed, and serve immediately; add more flour if not thick enough to suit.

Lemon Macaroons.—Rub off the rind from a large fine lemon on lumps of loaf-sugar; roll the sugar, and add enough of powdered loaf-sugar to make a quarter of a pound. Then strain the lemon-juice through a strainer. Beat light four eggs, stir the sugar in the eggs, and beat well. Then add the lemon-juice and three large heaping tablespoonfuls of flour; mix the whole thoroughly. It must be thick enough to form into balls; if not, add flour until it will. Moisten your hands with cold water, and form the paste into balls the size of a plum; lay them on buttered papers, and bake without browning. You will be obliged to try one to see if it is done. As soon as done, remove them from the paper with a knife.

Sugar Kisses to Make Quickly.—Beat the whites of four eggs stiff, flavor with vanilla; lay sheets of white paper on a board, beat gradually one pound of powdered loaf-sugar in the egg, and drop them in small half egg-shaped piles on the paper, dry them in a moderate oven without browning; lay the boards that it may not scorch; pine boards will not do. When stiff, take them up with a knife, and lay the two together, making them egg-shaped.

Apple Pudding.—Take six tart apples, pippins or greenings are the best; steam them without peeling, after washing them quite clean; strain them through a sieve. Add six spoonfuls of melted butter and the same of sugar, six eggs, half a wineglassful of brandy, and the juice of one lemon. Line a pudding dish with puff-paste, and bake it. Serve hot or cold with sweet cream without sugar.

Apple Roll.—Make a paste with one-fourth of a pound of butter to one of flour, mixed with water, not very stiff. Peel and slice rather thick tart apples, roll the paste very thin, or as thin as the bottom crust of a pie, spread the apples on the crust so as to cover it, dredge on a little flour, and roll it as tight as possible. Cut the ends even, and put it in the steamer, or wrap it in thick cloth, and boil it. It will take one hour steady cooking. Serve with butter and sugar; cut it in thin slices from the end when serving.

CONTRIBUTED.

To Clean Marble.—Rub first with soda and soft-soap, then wash as usual with water.

To Clean Window and Looking-Glass.—After having washed and rinsed your glass as usual, dry it some with a cloth, then take soft news or tissue paper, and rub until perfectly clear.

Buttermilk Pudding.—Two eggs, two cups of sugar, half a cup of butter, one teaspoonful of soda sifted in two cups of flour, three cups of buttermilk; stir the flour in lightly. Grease your tin, and bake one hour. It can be turned out.

Sauce for the above Pudding.—One cup of butter, half a cup of sugar, yolk of one egg; beat together; stir in half a cup of boiling water. Let it come to a boil, and when ready for use, flavor to taste.

Railroad Cake.—Three eggs, one cup of sugar, one large spoonful of butter; beat together; stir in lightly one cup of flour, a little yeast powder, or soda sifted in flour. Bake in a quick oven. This is a fine dessert with the above sauce. M. E. C.

Graham Bread.—Three pints of warm water, one cup of Indian meal, one of wheat flour, three tablespoonfuls of molasses, or one cup of brown sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, one of soda dissolved in a little hot water, one cup of yeast. Mix the above, and stir in enough unbolted wheat flour (Graham) to make as stiff as you can; work with a spoon. If you wish to make it into loaves, put in enough to mould it. If made with home-brewed yeast, put to rise over night. If with brewer's yeast, make it in the morning, and bake when light in loaves the ordinary size. Bake one hour and a half.

Roll Jelly Cake.—Take three eggs beaten thoroughly, one cup of sugar, one cup of flour; stir them well together; add one teaspoonful of cream of tartar and half a teaspoonful of soda. The latter to be dissolved in a very little water, or put the cream of tartar and soda in the flour. Bake in two pie tins as evenly and quickly as possible, taking care that it does not bake too hard around the edges. A sheet of writing paper laid over the top will often prevent its burning too much. Have ready a clean towel or cloth, and when the cake is done, slip it out, bottom side up, on the cloth; then spread the uppermost side quite thickly with jelly, commencing at the end. Roll it so that it will be a round compact roll, or it may be made in round tins, and not rolled. E. C. P.

Receipt for Pickle.—Scald the pickle in brine every three days for two weeks, then soak out the brine in fresh water; wipe them dry and put them in a liquid composed of two gallons of vinegar, four ounces of black pepper, four of ginger, two of turmeric, two of cloves, two of allspice, two of mace, two tablespoonfuls of celery-seed, one pint of mustard-seed, one large handful of horseradish, one of garlic, three lemons, sliced, and two pounds of brown sugar. The spices should be beaten. Pickle made by the above receipt took the premium at one of the Richmond fairs. S.

Horseradish Vinegar.—One-quarter of a pound of scraped horseradish, one ounce of minced garlic, one drachm of Cayenne, one quart of vinegar. Put all the ingredients into a bottle, which shake well every day for a fortnight. When it is thoroughly steeped, strain and bottle, and it will be fit for use immediately. This will be found an agreeable relish to cold beef, etc. M. E.

LADIES IN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

THE State of Kansas has the honor of being the first to open its Agricultural College to young ladies as students, and to appoint a lady to one of the Professorships. Other States, we believe, have followed or are preparing to follow the example, but to Kansas belongs the credit of being the first to do an act which is not the less honorable because it is merely a deed of justice. We know that it often requires more courage to be just than to be liberal.

When Congress gave its magnificent donation of public lands to the States for the establishment of Agricultural Colleges, there is no reason for supposing that the benefits of these colleges were designed for men alone, though in some of the States this seems to have been taken for granted. Did Congress intend that our farmers should be educated for their calling, and their wives left in ignorance? Let any one who supposes this consider for a moment how large a part of the success of a farm depends on the exertion of feminine minds and hands. Take the important department of the dairy. We do not know, and probably no one pretends to know very accurately, how many millions of dollars would represent the value of the butter and cheese produced every year in our country. But we may assert—what every dealer in those articles will certainly confirm—that the value of these products brought to market would be immensely increased if the producers were better instructed in their duties. Every year, too, as our cities and towns grow, the demand for dairy produce of the best description increases faster than the country can supply it. Then there is the rearing of poultry, which is also usually in the charge of women, and is growing in importance in the same way.

But our farmers' wives have duties of a much higher cast imposed on them by their position. They must practise medicine and surgery, whether they will or not. The husband, or son, or laboring man, meets with one of those accidents which so often befall men in their work; or a stroke of disease falls upon him. The physician is many miles away. The housewife must bind the wound, or administer the proper medicines and other appliances which the case requires. Indeed, the farmer's wife must often be in her household all that the Lady of the Manor was in the Middle Ages, and frequently with much less training for the office.

There is another department of the highest importance which belongs wholly to woman's province. It is the selection and preparation of food. If we are to be a vigorous and enduring race, we must have both well-selected food and good cookery. Cookery, as every one now understands, is a science. It is in fact a branch of chemistry. No doubt, a person may be a good cook, as another may be a good farmer, without a knowledge of scientific principles. But it is now well understood that those are most successful in any work who not only know how to do it, but the reason why it is so done. This, indeed, is the very principle on which our agricultural colleges are founded. If this principle is correct, there is every reason why young women should be admitted into these colleges, and why professorships of domestic economy and of medicine should be established for their benefit. There will be no lack of educated ladies well qualified to fill these appointments. Their pupils in turn will be prepared to instruct others; and thus each college will become, as it was intended to be, a source of light and improvement to the whole State.

We earnestly appeal to the authorities who have the control of this great endowment in the different States, and ask them to take this subject into serious consideration. Is it just, and is it for the public good, that one-half of the community should be shut out from the benefits of this grant? Have the women of our republic no right in the lands of the republic? Shall we rear up a race of scientific men and ignorant women? Let our lawyers and statesmen consider these questions in the light of conscience and with the impulse of patriotism, and we can have no doubt of their decision.

FASHIONS AND EDUCATIONAL INFLUENCES.

(EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER TO THE EDITRESS.)

* * * * *

"A MAGAZINE of aids to feminine character comprehends a great deal. For the term 'a fine woman' implies not merely grace of external observance, but inward warmth and growth. It does not suffice, then, that a young lady be taught all the newest methods of embroidery, all the latest fluctuations of fashion, or even how to make, in these dear days, one dollar serve the purpose of two by skillful handling. Though these are good and useful things to know, if not for one's self, for another. The absence of caste in our country and of sumptuary laws or rules, while causing some confusion in the mind of the slight observer, gives, doubtless, a general air of prosperity and taste in external decoration, which might well have prompted the foreigner's inquiry: 'Where are your poor people?' And as the LADY'S Book penetrates to the fastnesses of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific sands, it is not strange that a homogeneity greater even than that produced by speaking the same language should be the result. Two ladies from opposite poles meeting each other on the plaza or boulevard of the city, recognize with lightning-like quickness the true fashionable height of the hat, the length of the plume, and the dress, with or without trail, as the case may be. Lace may be imitated, silks may be adulterated, but the general air which comes of familiarity with all the best modes, and which makes the dress and appearance what the French call comme il faut, can only be gained by education.

"All these graces and refinements are certainly only the bloom on the plum, the down on the peach, the hue on the flower; yet who would be without them? Granted then the comparative inferiority of externals, they have an absolute value, and should be cultivated in their proportion, as a rose-hue deepens and heightens the delight with which we inhale its fragrance.

"These thoughts have occurred to me on turning over the many-leaved directions in your valuable magazine for all kinds of work and play. I have pictured to myself scenes which indeed I have often literally witnessed, where your magazine was almost the only link between a secluded life, without grace or variety, and the distant world which seemed full of visions of brightness and beauty. As the magazine makes its appearance, the young people in the family all spring at once to grasp it, with a welcoming gladness which I am certain would give you sincere joy to witness. The love tale is conned, the newest shapes meditated on, the last receipt tried, and the drawings copied. It is a refreshment in a weary land which can hardly be overstated, to be brought thus into frequent contact with the live, stirring world of thought and action. Nature cloys a little, for the trees never whisper of new bonnets, nor do brooks babble of Parisian modes. Yet, the modes must be attended to, or how else is a young lady to comfort herself in a possible future in Washington, or even as lady of a foreign minister? As there is no height to which manly talent may not attain in our happy country, so should womanly elegance and culture be ready for adaptation to any high places that may be allotted by the possible Fates. We are proud of the simple dignity and high-bred grace of our Mrs. Abigail Adams, at the English court; how much more elegant she was than the good dowdy Queen Charlotte herself. But in her memoirs we see how such manners were naturally evolved from an upright and observant mind, a kindly heart and thoughtful intellectual habits. These made the country-bred girl a fit companion for princes, and, what was more important, for her own superior and admirable husband.

"When I see in the LADY'S BOOK such models of feminine character always held up, and think of the wondrous influence of these ideas thoroughly disseminated and ingrained in the minds of women, I feel that you are doing daily a great and good work, and that we ought 'never to despair of the republic' while such a source of right thinking remains."

LITERARY FORGERIES AND THEFTS.

THE literary world of Paris has lately had an astonishing sensation in the discovery of literary forgeries which exceed all of the kind on record. M. Chasles, the mathematician, had a passion for autographs, and from 1861 had been supplied by an Italian with extraordinary collections of autographic letters and documents. These M. Chasles purchased, paying the sum of $30,000 in gold to the man of mystery who supplied these treasures of antiquity. M. Chasles had, as he fancied, in his collection notes of Julius Cæsar and of Charlemagne, letters of Copernicus, of Christopher Columbus, and of Shakespeare, and authentic documents of some kind from the most distinguished men and women who had lived from the earliest period of the Christian era. Included in this list were letters of the apostles. The bubble burst last summer. The forger, whose name was Irene Lucas, was arrested, and the exposure was complete. All these varied papers or autographs, comprising more than 20,000 pieces, were, as he declared, fabricated by himself.

The great literary forgery is a phenomenon that will seldom occur; the petty larcenies are the parts that trouble us. We lately had a specimen of this kind that deserves exposure. A person, whom we do not know, sent us a poem for the LADY'S BOOK. It was worth publishing, and, as it bore the writer's name, Lewis Morrison, with a request to have it returned if rejected, we saw no reason to suppose it a stolen article. It appeared in the LADY'S BOOK, June, 1899. "The Last Tear I Shed," by Lewis Morrison, a tender little poem that must have moved many a mother's heart. We have learned that it was stolen from a volume, "The Faded Flowers," by Robert Josselyn, published twenty years ago in Boston. Mr. Josselyn has sent us the poem in question, as he wrote it, containing one stanza which the imposter omitted. We shall republish it in June next, as we are sure our readers will prize the finished poem. Now, we have the pleasure of giving them a poem written expressly for the LADY'S BOOK since the discovery of the larceny. It is a gratification to us that we have thus opportunity of placing the name of this true American poet among our contributors.

SONG.

BY ROBERT JOSSELYN.

SHE was sweet and as pure as the dewdrop that lies
On the rose in a morning of spring,
And her voice, and her smile, and her soft loving eyes
To my heart and my memory cling;
Through the mist and the chill of the gathering years,
Which are shrouding my spirit in gloom,
And the all, my lone pathway that brightens and cheers,
Is the light that yet shines from her tomb.

She was gentle and kind and obliging to all,
And her beauty and grace had no peer;
With a passionate glow of my heart I recall
Every charm to my memory dear.
But the flowers that are fairest are soonest to fade,
And she left for the region above,
Where her beauty and goodness immortal were made,
And she lives still an angel of love.

They may sneer, who are cold and as senseless as clay,
At a love which is fervent and true,
Which can live through all trial, and knows no decay
With a heaven hereafter in view;
Where the loved ones, long parted, united shall be,
With a joy which this earth cannot know,
And I long, like a captive who sighs to be free,
To that blessed reunion to go.

THE MARRIAGE RELATION.

IN the Edinburgh Review, for October, we find an able article on the equality of the sexes, as asserted in the theories of Mr. Mill. We quote a few paragraphs—all we have room for; the whole should be read by those who take interest in the subject. The hypothesis of Mr. Mill is that the married pair are separate persons, equal in rights.

"They are one person in law." This Mr. Mill asserts to be a cruel fiction.

* * * * *

"And we assert that this faulty law has yet, amid all its offensive and tyrannical enactments, caught sight of the principle in which lie all the difficulties of the question, and which Mr. Mill ignores. It is, that the man and the woman united in the first of all primitive bonds, the union upon which the world and the race depend, are one person. We say it not sentimentally or poetically, but with the profoundest sense of reality and seriousness. If they were two, the matter would be easy. It would be but to establish the balance by law, as Mr. Mill suggests, and to keep it even; a business requiring the watchfulness of Argus, yet probably manageable by dint of pain and trouble. The secret of all that is hard, and dangerous, and bewildering in the matter is simply the fact that in very truth the two are one."

* * * * *

"We repeat: if they are precisely the same kind of beings, with no differences except those which are physical, then we allow without a moment's hesitation that women are the natural inferiors of men. Equality must embrace the whole being; it cannot be taken as belonging only to a part of it. And woman is confessedly and unmistakably man's inferior in one part of her being; therefore, unless she is as unmistakably his superior in another, she can have no claim to consider herself his equal."

* * * * *

"But let us turn for one moment to the other view of the question. It is, that a woman is a woman, and not a lesser edition of man. The competition, in which we are forever laboring to involve them, has no existence in nature. They are not rivals nor antagonists; they are two halves of a complete being. The offices they hold in this world are essentially different. There is scarcely any natural standing ground, which we can realize, on which these two creatures appear as rivals. The very thought is preposterous. Shall the woman challenge the man to a trial of strength? Shall the man pit himself against the woman for delicacy of eye and taste? Shall she plough the heavy fields with him, wading through the new turned mould; or, shall he watch the children with her, patient through the weary vigil? An exchange of place and toil, the man taking the indoor work, and the woman the outdoor, in order to prove the futility of their mutual discontent, was a favorite subject with the old ballad-makers, and the witty minstrel is generally very great on the domestic confusion that follows, and gives the wife the best of it. But the fact is that such rivalry can be nothing but a jest. The two are not rivals—they are not alike. They are different creatures—they are one."

NOTES AND NOTICES.

THE WOMEN CLERKS AT WASHINGTON.—The Treasurer of the United States, Hon. F. E. Spinner, has paid a tribute of praise to the young women employed as clerks in his department which does honor to his own noble manliness as well as to their abilities and faithfulness in duty. We can only give an extract, but hope to find opportunity of returning to the subject. We shall take the liberty of designating these employés as men and women :—

"The women, many of whom are now employed in this office in the handling of money have, by long practice and close application, become experts, and do as good, and in many cases better, official service than men clerks who receive double their compensation."

"All the coupons, and all mutilated United States notes and fractional currency, are assorted, counted, and prepared for destruction by women clerks."

"This requires great care and patient labor, and subjects these clerks to great responsibilities and risks, and not unfrequently to pecuniary losses."

"It frequently happens that a lady engaged in the counting of money loses more than half her month's salary by reason of having lost money, or having overlooked and passed over counterfeit notes. No one, who is at all acquainted with the business operations of this office, will gainsay the fact that many women clerks, receiving only nine hundred dollars per annum, can do, and do more work of the kind mentioned, and do it better, too, than any clerk in the department, receiving double their salary, possibly can. On coupons the experiment has lately been thoroughly tried and tested. It was found that the work done by women was done much better, and more was done in a given time, than had been done by the men clerks who receive the larger salaries. In order to test the difference between the two kinds of clerks, on this kind of work, more thoroughly, the women clerks were required to review and recount the work of the men clerks; and it was found that they not only corrected errors in the count, but that they detected counterfeits that had not before been discovered or known to any person connected with the Treasury Department in this city or elsewhere, and that had been overlooked by the men clerks in the offices where they were originally received, and by those in this office, who had counted them. But for the timely discovery of these counterfeit coupons, the Government would have suffered great loss."

We are sorry to find that the introduction of woman's help into the Treasury Department has had the effect of lowering the titles of those who hold clerkships. The awkward prefix of the animal term, male and female does not accurately indicate the dissimilarity, which as man and woman pertains to humanity. We need a wider scope of feminine terminations in order to express the offices of women, as they enlarge their sphere of usefulness. We shall refer to this in another paper; now we have ventured to substitute man clerk and woman clerk, instead of male and female. The last are longer by one letter each, and neither definite nor dignified.

DOMESTIC SCIENCE.—Professor Blot has lately repeated his valuable lecture on the art of cooking.

That the ladies of Philadelphia, who had the privilege of listening to his sensible discourses, gained much useful information is certain; but ignorant domestics may fail to carry out the orders which they cannot comprehend. The women and girls employed in American households need an opportunity for special improvement in the knowledge of their duties.

School of training for household work. Such a school is needed in every American city. Why cannot Philadelphia lead in this great domestic philanthropy? Good cooks are being wanted all over our country. Cookery would be the most important department. A restaurant might be connected with this cooking school, where ladies, who come from the populous environs of this great city to pass a day, might always find refreshment. If this restaurant were wisely managed, it might furnish dinners for families. The advantages of a judicious system, such as Professor Blot teaches, would soon enable such an establishment to become popular and profitable, and thus aid in supporting other branches of instruction, such as that of chamber-maid, waitress, nurse, etc. A laundry would also be profitable, and an intelligence office necessary. In short, such a "Training School" is the great want of Philadelphia. If the hundreds of ladies, who heard the lectures of Professor Blot, would interest themselves in this plan, it would be sure to succeed.

CHESTNUT STREET SEMINARY FOR YOUNG LADIES.

—Parents desiring a thoroughly good school for their daughters will find this, under the charge of Miss Bonney and Miss Dillaye, one of the best in Philadelphia. The course of instruction is thorough, and the system exceedingly good.

"Physical education receives special attention. Thorough ventilation, calisthenics, a walk in the morning and in the afternoon are among daily school duties. To these may be added lessons in riding, swimming, and dancing. The natatorium and lessons in calisthenics are under the personal and constant care of a physician, who regulates the kind and degree of exercise with direct reference to the health of the individual pupil."

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE, September—December, 1869.—We are compelled, in our notices of this excellent weekly, to condense many numbers into a few lines of comment; but every new Living Age would give us abundant opportunity for appreciation and praise. We have read Littell for many years, and no other eclectic in the country can approach it in the variety and interest of its contents. In each number is generally one story, one or two articles upon important subjects from the quarterlies, a number of shorter and lighter papers upon the topics of the day, and an excellent selection of poetry. The most famous men of the country have commended this excellent magazine.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—We have returned many poems, as desired by the writers, because we had not room, and this month have only accepted the following: "Winter on the Sea"—"My Lost Friend" and "The East."

These articles are declined: "Dora"—"Song"—"Beautiful Hills"—"Gates Ajar"—"A Memory"—"Visit to the Parsonage" and "Before the Battle." "Omega" was sent as requested.

NOTICE.—Manuscripts must in all cases be accompanied with the name and address of the authors, and stamps for their return, if not accepted. The utmost care will be taken and all possible expedition used with regard to them; but it must be understood that the Editor is not responsible should a MS. be mislaid or lost.

Literary Notices.

From D. ASHMEAD, Philadelphia :—

THE ILLUMINATED CHRISTIAN YEAR. The artist of this curious and costly work, Miss Jean Lee, has given us a new pleasure. This young lady has, by her fine taste and enthusiastic perseverance, succeeded in proving her genius for the unique Art of Illumination. "The Christian Year" is a higher effort of her mind and of her art than was shown last year in the much admired work—"Nothing but Leaves." In her illumination of the "Collects," she touches the deep affections of the Christian heart. The publisher well deserves the warm approval these beautiful books are winning.

TOM HARDING AND HIS FRIENDS. By Nellie Eyester. The fourth volume of the "Sunny Hour Series," describing Tom's experience at sea, and his visit to New Orleans.

HOUSEHOLD RECEIPTS. Comprising Two Hundred and Seventy-Four Receipts, for Cooking, Preserving, Pickling, etc. By A. L. O. M.

From OLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAWFELFINGER, Philadelphia :—

JACK AND FLORIE; or, The Pigeon's Wedding. By Harriet B. McKeever. A very pretty book for children, illustrated by numerous colored plates.

TWISTED THREADS. By M. D. Nauman, author of "Sidney Elliott." An American novel of moderate merit and interest.

SLOAN'S ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW AND BUILDERS' JOURNAL. We have received No. 6 of the second volume of this highly useful periodical. It contains a view of the new United States Naval Hospital, Annapolis, Md., now in course of erection.

From HENRY C. LEA, Philadelphia :—
STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY. The Rise of the Temporal Power. Benefit of Clergy. Excommunication. By Henry C. Lea. Our thanks are due to the author of this learned and ably-written volume for the copy now before us. Endeavoring to confine himself to points illustrative of the temporal aspects of ecclesiastical history, Mr. Lea has sought to present facts rather than to draw inferences. His work is one that will be read with especial interest at the present time.

From HENRY CAREY BAIRD, Philadelphia :—
DIRECTIONS FOR COOKERY IN ITS VARIOUS BRANCHES. By Miss Leslie. This is Miss Leslie's old standard and renowned cookery book, which has now reached its sixtieth edition.

From J. P. SKELLY & Co., Philadelphia :—
FARMER BURT'S SEED. A True Story. By Mrs. E. E. Boyd.

AUTUMN LEAF STORIES. By E. M. J. Two nicely illustrated, interesting, and morally instructive stories for children.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia :—
PETERSON'S NEW COOK BOOK; or, Useful and Practical Receipts for the Housewife and the Un-initiated.

From A. WIXON, Philadelphia :—
THE OLD FRANKLIN ALMANAC FOR 1870. No. 11. With astronomical calculations, statistics, chronological tables, and much useful matter for the household, counting-room, and manufactory.

From LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia :—
MAGDALENA. Translated from the German of E. Marlitt, author of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," etc.

THE LONELY ONES. (The Solitaires.) Translated from the German of Paul Heyse.

Two interesting novelettes reprinted from Lippincott's Magazine.

From ALFRED MARTIEN, Philadelphia :—

A MENDED LIFE; or, the Carpenter's Family. By Mrs. Joseph Lamb. This is a pleasant and instructive story of humble life. It is prettily bound, and will make a nice present for the children's library.

MAPLEVILLE BOYS. By Miss C. M. Trowbridge. Another story by the authoress of "Dick and his Friend Pidos," which has always been a favorite with the children. Good Doctor Norton, his friends the boys, and his work among them will, we think, prove as interesting.

From CHARLES DESILVER, Philadelphia :—

THE BOOK OF DRAWING-ROOM PLAYS AND EVENING AMUSEMENTS. By Silas S. Steele, Dramatist. Private theatricals are becoming everyday more popular, and the lovers of that amusement will gladly welcome this beautiful book.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia :—

BIBLE ANIMALS. By the Rev. J. E. Wood, M. A., F. L. S., etc., author of "Homes without Hands," etc. This book contains a description of every living creature mentioned in the Scriptures. However indirect or vague the allusion, reference is made to it, and the text made clear as to what animal was meant. The book is exceedingly interesting, not only as a description of the animals of the East, but as giving us a clear insight into the habits, ideas, and prejudices of the ancient oriental nations in regard to these animals. There are one hundred excellent illustrations in the volume.

LADY GERALDINE'S COURTSHIP. By Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Illustrated by W. J. Hennessy. Engraved by W. J. Linton.

SONGS OF LIFE. Selected from many Sources, with Numerous Illustrations from Original Designs.

These two beautiful volumes have reached us too late for notice before the holidays. The first of these is too well known to require other comment than a reference to its elegant and tasteful appearance. "Songs of Life" contains a large and varied selection from the very best of English and American poetry, and the illustrations, engraved from drawings by many of our most distinguished designers, are highly creditable.

RAMESES THE GREAT; or, Egypt 3300 Years Ago. Translated from the French of T. De Lanoye. This volume gives us historical and traditional facts concerning Egypt in the days of its magnificence and power. There are numerous illustrations. It belongs to "The Illustrated Library of Wonders," now in course of publication by Messrs. Scribner & Co.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia :—

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By John S. C. Abbott, author of "The French Revolution," etc. We have here, in a compact form, a narrative of the more strange and wonderful, though well-authenticated events in Spanish history, from the earliest times down to our own day. The book is one of exceeding interest, and, as a popular history of the Iberian peninsula, supplies a want that has long been felt.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By Edmund Yates, author of "Kissing the Rod," etc. A pleasing writer, though not taking rank among the first of English novelists, Mr. Yates finds many readers. His works are of that semi-domestic semi-sensational order which, never sinking into dullness, are yet seldom guilty of the extravagances of the genuine sensational novel of the day.

HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By John S. C. Abbott, author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," etc. Of the popular histories by the Abbott brothers, President Lincoln once said: "I have not education enough to appreciate the profound works of voluminous historians, and if I had, I have no time to read them. But these give me, in brief compass, just that knowledge of past men and events which I need." In the present interesting volume, giving an account of the momentous scenes in the life of Joseph Bonaparte, and of the social and political relations existing between him and the great Napoleon, Mr. Abbott seems to have spared no pains to be accurate, while aiming to give a concise narrative adapted to the wants of just such readers as President Lincoln—men who, in the midst of a busy career, have no time to wade through ponderous folios in quest of knowledge which they yet feel they must possess.

GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By William Henry Waddell, Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. This grammar claims to be "a school-boy's book, intended for a school-boy's use," in acquiring a knowledge of the elementary principles of the Greek language. Everything in it is to be committed to memory by the pupil, there being nothing in the shape of notes, observations, remarks, etc., to be marked by the teacher for omission. This, in a Greek grammar, is a desirable novelty, and will be appreciated by both teachers and scholars.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A Country Family. By the author of "Found Dead," etc. An English novel of considerable merit, and by an author not unknown to fame. It belongs to Harpers' Library of Select Novels.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: A Book of Natural History and Adventure. By James Greenwood, author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidge," etc. This is undoubtedly one of the most complete and entertaining books of its class we have ever read. It is a rich storehouse of curious and interesting facts and anecdotes relating to the history, habits, instincts, and modes of hunting of some twenty or thirty of the principal animals of the world, the pursuit of which, either for excitement or gain, is recognized as among the wild sports followed by men, civilized and savage.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and revised for the use of American readers. This useful and valuable book has long been popular in England, where, some three years ago, a twelfth edition was called for. That edition received numerous corrections, and much new matter was added; thus rendering it a digested summary of every department of human history down to the very eve of publication. In the present American edition a vast amount of fresh material, especially in regard to American subjects, has been incorporated, while this "chronicle and chronology of the World's Progress" has been brought down to the year 1870. We can heartily recommend it as the best and completest work of the kind ever published.

LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By Paul du Chaillu, author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," etc. Narratives of discovery and adventure always have special attractions for the young, and we are glad that one of our well-known travellers has prepared a second volume suited in subjects and language to meet the wants of juvenile readers.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By Justin McCarthy, author of "The Waterdale Neighbors," etc.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH: or, Maid, Wife, and Widow. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By Charles Reade. Another volume of Harpers' cheap edition of Reade's works.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF. By S. Baring-Gould, M. A., author of "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," etc. Part I. Heathenism and Moaism. This book, we are told, is written from a philosophic and not from a religious point of view, the philosophy of its author being, we infer, the positive philosophy of Comte. "The question of the truth of Revelation," writes Mr. Gould, "is one which I do not touch. * * * I hope in this volume to show what are the religious instincts of humanity: in the second volume I intend to show how that Christianity, by its fundamental postulate—the Incarnation—assumes to meet all these instincts; how it actually does so meet them; and how failure is due to counteracting political or social causes."

THE PURSUIT OF HOLINESS. A Sequel to "Thoughts on Personal Religion." Intended to carry the reader somewhat further onward in the Spiritual Life. By Edward Meyrick Goulburn, D. D., Dean of Norwich.

MEN'S WIVES. By Wm. M. Thackeray. This volume, containing "Mr. and Mrs. Frank Berry," "The Ravenswing," "Dennis Haggarty's Wife," and "The ——'s Wife," belongs to Appleton's cheap edition of Thackeray's works.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part, No. 8.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS and OLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

SUSAN FIELDING. A Novel. By Mrs. Annie Edwards, author of "Archie Lovell," etc. No one who has read Mrs. Edwards' novels will need be told that this, like her previous efforts, is superior to the ordinary class of English and American novels, that it is vivacious and life-like, and, though not strictly sensational, it is yet sufficiently entertaining to secure the interest of the reader at the first, and retain it to the last.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE. Part First. By Charles Reade. As far as it goes, this is, to our mind, the best work its author has written, equal in romantic interest to "The Cloister and the Hearth," and far superior to it as dealing with contemporary facts, people, and peculiarities. We shall await the second part with a great deal of impatience, as will also thousands of readers who have been charmed by the dramatic vigor of the narrative, and have taken a living interest, as it were, in the imaginary characters so vividly portrayed.

From CARLETON & Co., New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

PHEMIE'S TEMPTATION. A Novel. By Marion Harland, author of "Ruby's Husband," etc. We have no need to tell the readers of the LADY'S Book that among all the authoresses of America, there are none who excel Marion Harland in vigor and fearlessness of thought and expression, in beauty and delicacy of style, and elevation of tone and sentiment. "Phemie's Temptation" is the story of the trials and struggles of a young girl who is left to make her own way in life; and the author, while writing an entertaining story, has not hesitated to convey many lessons of real profit to her readers, and to state her ideas and opinions boldly on certain great questions of the day concerning woman's labor and woman's wages.

VASHTI; or, Until Death us do Part. A Novel. By Augusta J. Evans, author of "St. Elmo," etc. A woman of superior gifts, of rare intelligence, and of extraordinary attainments, we believe all that hinders Miss Evans from producing a novel of real and undoubted merit is the lack of a practical knowledge of life. As it is, her works can never bear close and careful criticism and analysis. They are the productions of one who has obtained all her ideas of life from books, and those books of the most abstruse character, instead of from the humanity around her. In the conversations of her heroes and heroines, she bridges the narrow chasm which divides the sublime from the ridiculous. They are not real flesh and blood persons at all, but caricatures which stalk around, sometimes grimly, sometimes ludicrously, according to the humor of the reader, from beginning to end, neither eating, nor sleeping, nor doing anything like the people in this every-day world of ours. Still, we dare say her publishers will not quarrel with her on account of her peculiarities of style, so long as there are so many people who testify by their admiration of her writings that they mistake the use of long words for beauty and elegance of expression, grandiloquence for eloquence, pedantry for wisdom, priggishness in the heroes of a novel for gentility and high-mindedness, and a morbid condition of mind and heart as an essential to an interesting heroine.

STRANGE VISITORS: A Series of Original Papers, by the spirits of Irving, Willis, Thackeray, Brontë, Ritchie, Byron, and others, now duelling in the Spirit World. Dictated through a clairvoyant while in an abnormal or trance state. From perusal of this volume, we have come to the conclusion that, whatever other good one may derive from "dwelling in the Spirit World," it is not perfection in the art of writing. Whether offered in good faith as genuine emanations from the spirits of their professed authors, or only designed, like the "Rejected Addresses," to take off the styles of those authors, these "original papers" are veritable trash.

From LEYPOLDT & HOLT, N. Y., through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THROUGH NIGHT TO LIGHT. A Novel. By Frederick Spielhagen. The readers of Spielhagen's "Problematic Characters" will find in this novel a sequel to that work. Notwithstanding its somewhat hopeful title, "Through Night to Light" is, like its predecessor, a story in which the tragic predominates, though, as in the tragedies of Shakespeare, the clown and the jester are not wanting.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through the PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL BOOK SOCIETY, 1224 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

LAMPS, PITCHERS, AND TRUMPETS. Lectures on the Vocation of the Preacher. By Edwin Paxton Hood. Second Series. This entertaining volume, which will receive a welcome at the hands of people of all religious beliefs, is illustrated with biographical, historical, and elucidatory anecdotes of every order of pulpit eloquence from the great preachers of all ages.

From WOOD & HOLBROOK, N. Y., through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; or, The Philosophy of True Living. By Prof. F. G. Welsh, Instructor in the Department of Physical Culture in Yale-College. This is the work of one who, whatever may be his capacity for advancing the moral and intellectual culture of his fellow-men, has, we know, had sufficient experience in their physical culture to be entitled to claim the title of teacher in that regard at least. It is just in the portion of his work that treats of physical culture that Professor Welsh is most original. Here he can be considered a competent authority, whose utterances may be relied upon with assurance.

A WINTER IN FLORIDA. By Ledyard BULL. Illustrated. This is a tolerably interesting book, referring to a state concerning which comparatively little is known. It is partly historical and partly narrative in its character. The facts it contains, and the information it imparts are useful; but the literary merits of the book, while it has really no serious faults, are yet only of moderate order.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., and D. ASHMEAD, Philadelphia:—

THE CABIN ON THE PRAIRIE. By Rev. C. H. Pearson, author of "Scenes in the West," etc.

PLANTING THE WILDERNESS; or, the Pioneer Boys. A Story of Frontier Life. By James D. McCabe, Jr. Two highly interesting juvenile books which demonstrate the toils and hardships endured by the inhabitants of our Western States and Territories. These volumes belong to a new series entitled "The Frontier Series."

DOWN THE RHINE; or, Young America in Germany. A Story of Travel and Adventures. By Oliver Optic. This is the sixth volume of that excellent series of juvenile books called the "Young America Abroad Series."

HESTER STRONG'S LIFE-WORK; or, The Mystery Solved. By Mrs. S. A. Southworth, author of "Lawrence Monroe," etc. This story has for its theme the evils of intemperance, and it is written with an earnestness of purpose that ought to appeal to the reader, and produce much good. Judged as a literary production, it is, however, rather commonplace, and is not likely to attract any great degree of attention.

THE SUNSET LAND; or, The Great Pacific Slope. By Rev. John Todd, D. D. A lively, readable book, which gives us a better idea of California—her exhaustless mineral wealth, her advantages of soil and climate, and her wonderful grandeur and beauty of scenery—than any we have heretofore read. The author discusses the Chinese question with much ability, stating his belief that both Chinese and Americans will be benefited by a free admission of the former into our country.

LIVING THOUGHTS. A beautiful little volume, containing a selection of thoughts culled from the writings of the earnest and gifted, likely to aid those who are striving to lead a Christian life. These thoughts have been arranged under the heads of "Christian Experience," "The Christian Graces," "Christian Effort," and "The Source of Strength."

From LORING, Boston, through TURNER BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HITHERTO. A Story of Yesterdays. By Mrs. A.

D. T. Whitney, author of "Faith Gartney's Girlhood," etc. In "Hitherto" the delicate and graceful pen of Mrs. Whitney has produced a novel which not only equals her former productions, but even exceeds them in its clear insight into girl nature and womanly wants and needs. As wide asunder as the two poles from the conventional sensational novel of the day, it is neither a juvenile story, though girls approaching womanhood may read it with profit.

LUCK AND PLUCK; or, John Oakley's Inheritance. By Horatio Alger, Jr. The first of a series which will be called the "Luck and Pluck Series," and which, if we judge from the volume before us, will possess rare charms for the boys.

ROUGH AND READY; or, Life among the New York Newsboys. By Horatio Alger, Jr. This is the fourth volume of the "Ragged Dick Series," and will give country boys an insight into city life.

THE SOPRANO. A Musical Story. By Jane Kingsford. This is a feelingly told American art story, plain yet lively in style, and unmarred by any of that strained sentimentalism so characteristic, especially of the German novels and sketches of the same class. The narrative is one of deep interest, while throughout the entire book there is a profound reverence for music, especially of a sacred character, which seems to us quite strange in one who professes to have been a member of a church choir and chorus singer at oratorios.

From the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY AND PUBLICATION HOUSE, New York:—

COMMUNION WINE AND BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Being a Review of Dr. Thos. Lauré's article in the Bibliotheca Sacra of January, 1869. By Rev. Wm. M. Thayer.

From THE AMERICAN NEWS CO., N. Y.:—

GOING AND SON. A Novel. By "Monk." The plot and characters of this story purport to have been taken from the midst of New York life. If this be so, New York life is something which might be vastly improved in a moral point of view. The story is strictly a sensational one, and in style, though somewhat turgid at times, is yet that of a practical writer.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN EUROPE IN THE TIME OF CALVIN. By J. H. Merle D'Aubigné, D. D. Vol. V. Dr. D'Aubigné's first historical series has become almost classical, as the orthodox Protestant account of the Reformation down to the time of the Confession of Augsburg. A second series has lately been published, carrying down the history of the movement until the final crystallization of beliefs. The division into series is made only for convenience: the narrative of the ten volumes is continuous. One or two more, we learn from the preface, will complete the work. The series will be valuable alike for professional theologians and for the general reader.

BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS. By John Kitts, D. D. Four Volumes. Dr. Kitts's name is familiar to the Bible students of the last generation. He was a voluminous writer on Scriptural subjects, and his works have a more popular tone than the heavy Commentaries. This book, for instance, is designed to furnish "a daily course of Scriptural reading and reflection for one year." It is divided into weeks and days. The Bible is divided into four portions, one for each of them, and the verses chosen for each day are read and explained. The work furnishes, therefore, a manual of "Sacred history, biography, geography, antiquities, and chronology;" and will prove a most useful companion to the Scriptures themselves.

SORROW. By Rev. John Reid. Since the Countess de Gasparin's work on Human Sadness, more than one volume on the same or a kindred subject has appeared. None as yet have approached in power or beauty to the prototype. It was, perhaps, impossible for any but a woman's hand to touch the sensitive chord into music. The present volume is beautifully bound and printed.

THE SHEPHERD OF ISRAEL. By Rev. Duncan MacGregor, M. D. A series of sermons preached at St. Peter's church in Dundee, Scotland. The only link of connection between them is the authorship. Dr. MacGregor is an eminent Scotch clergyman, and this handsome volume will no doubt meet with great acceptance.

From the Authoress, MRS. MARGARET HOSMER:—
THE VOYAGE OF THE WHITE FALCON.
A YEAR IN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Mrs. Hosmer, who has written two successful novels—"The Morrissons," and "Ten Years of a Life"—is now devoting her fine talents to the service of her country in the way by which the heart of humanity can best be reached; she is writing books for the young—"published by the American Sunday School Union." The two books named above are her last; both are very good, deserving a place in every home and library where children are readers.

From L. STEBBINS, Hartford, Connecticut:—

WOMAN: Her Rights, Wrongs, Privileges, and Responsibilities. By L. P. Brockett, M. D., author of "Woman's Work in the Civil War," etc. Doctor Brockett has prepared a mild, weakly-flavored protest against the spirit of progress which would secure a wider range of labor and usefulness to women. What he finds woman already doing and doing well, he reluctantly consents to, insisting at the same time it is impossible she should ever do as well as a man. But farther than she has already gone he refuses to permit her to go. From the dreadful picture he gives of political life, we should judge that not only would a man be unwilling his wife should enter into it, but that a woman, who had any regard for the manners and morals of her husband, would be equally desirous of secluding him from its pollution.

From the HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Connecticut:—

THE COURT CIRCLES OF THE REPUBLIC; or, the Beauties and Celebrities of the Nation. By Mrs. E. F. Ellet, author of "The Queens of American Society," etc. We have been favored with advance sheets of this work, which promises to be quite an entertaining addition to the lively, gossip, personal literature to which it belongs, stored as it will be with characteristic anecdotes of the celebrities and beauties of our national capital. It is to be illustrated with original portraits, engraved on steel in the highest style of the art, and will be sold by subscription only.

From LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO., London, through D. ASHMEAD, Philadelphia:—

RHYME AND REASON. By S. Stockton Hornor. A neat little volume of pleasantly-flowing verses, which cannot fail to be appreciated by those who love the beautiful and the true when adorned by the charm of graceful and harmonious rhyme.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

FEBRUARY, 1870.

OUR EMBELLISHMENTS.—The steel plate this month, "Feeling the Patient's Pulse," is a choice picture. If we interpret the design correctly, another physician is needed to make the pulsations correct. Love is the all-powerful potion necessary to be administered in this case. It will bring back the healthful glow to the pale cheeks of our beauty.

The fashion-plate comes next; a tinted picture of "The Snow Man" for the juveniles, and a colored plate of an antimacassar, a description of which will be found on page 184. The usual variety of wood-cut fashions and other articles will be found in their proper places.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The January number of Godey's inimitable magazine is out. It would require superhuman versatility to say anything new about this work, which has been praised in all moods and tenses of commendation, and which deserves it all. When he "folds his robe about him and lies down to pleasant dreams"—in his last eternal rest, his place will be worthily filled, and our daughters and granddaughters will still delight in the LADY'S BOOK—long may it be, however, before that gentle, manly heart shall cease to beat on earth.—Democrat, Hoboken, N. J.

We certainly do appreciate the renewed efforts this year of our old friends in endeavoring to increase the number of names on their club lists. This increase has been far more than last year. In many cases, parties who only sent us a club of five for 1869 have increased it to ten for 1870. This shows the hold that the LADY'S BOOK has taken on the mind of the people. We return thanks to those who have sent us this increase to our subscription list.

MISSING NUMBERS.—Subscribers will please take notice that a missing number must be applied for at once. We are often applied to several months after the publication of a number for a missing number, which may have been lost by lending or some other way. If not applied for at once, it will not be sent.

COUNTRY NEWSPAPERS.—It is the duty of every one to take his own town or country newspapers. Any person who does not take the papers is certainly "out in the cold" as to the great events that are happening in this world of ours. A newspaper and a magazine in a household make everything and everybody connected with it cheerful and happy. In taking a magazine, you want one that contains good stories, excellent essays, receipts for the kitchen and boudoir, drawing lessons, model cottages, fashions, and everything else that can please the older and younger branches of the family—and such is the LADY'S BOOK.

THEN for the feminine portion of the family circle. The LADY'S BOOK by all means, for what would sisters, sweethearts, and wives do without Godey, who for a lifetime has reigned all but supreme in the world of fashion; and who this month returns from his long sojourn in Paris, richly laden, we may well imagine, with all that is worthy of note to enrich the LADY'S BOOK, which, in his absence, has been so gracefully reigned over by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, a lady quite deserving of the title of queen in the realm of good taste, as Eugenie is of empress in the world of fashion. What can we, or rather, what need we say more than advise respectable papas, loving brothers, and gay gallants, to write forthwith to Louis A. Godey, Esq., LADY'S BOOK, Philadelphia, who will furnish further particulars.—Camden (N. J.) Democrat.

FREIGHT ON LETTERS AND PREMIUM ON DRAFTS.—We wish our subscribers distinctly to understand, that when they send their letters by express company they must pay the freight, and those who send drafts must pay the premium. We advise subscribers to remit by mail a post-office order or a draft payable to the order of L. A. GODEY. Should either be lost, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

We ask attention to the advertisements of Monsieur Drevet and Madame Van Coeckelberghe, which will be found in our advertising department. The former is an old acquaintance, with whom we have transacted business for years. He is prompt and true, and every reliance may be placed upon him. Mr. D. has an able assistant in Mr. Wildey, an English gentleman, and it would be a difficult matter to decide which is the most polite—the Frenchman or the Englishman. In Madame Van Coeckelberghe, ladies visiting Paris will find a most able assistant. She will save them a heap of money and a great deal of time. She is an American, and a daughter of a late officer in the old U. S. Bank.

WISCONSIN, 1869.

DEAR GODEY: I have received your LADY'S BOOK for January, and surely it deserves the highest of praise, and every young lady ought to cherish it as a dear and instructive companion. It has been a true friend and adviser to me, and served to cheer many lonely hours in my country home. Your portrait will do great honor to my album; many thanks for your thoughtfulness in presenting it to us.

Yours respectfully, N. P.

FURS.—In purchasing furs a sure test of what dealers call a "prime" fur is the length and density of the down next the skin; this can be readily determined by blowing a brisk current of air from the mouth "against the set of the fur." If the fibres open readily, exposing the skin to the view, reject the article; but if the down is so dense that the breath cannot penetrate it, or at most shows but a small portion of the skin, the article may be accepted.

It is full of freshness, life, and vigor. By those who have taken this household favorite, the question is often asked: "Who can do without Godey?" Children love it, gentlemen admire it because it is the favorite of the ladies, and the ladies cannot do without it; therefore every family should have it.—Democrat, Chatfield, Minn.

ALL ABOUT A HAT.—And a great deal may be said about a hat. It is pretty well known that in April, 1869, we went to Europe. Of course we took a hat; we wore that hat on the passage—when, one night, an awful fate befell it. It was in the upper berth; a trunk was there; a lurch of the vessel, and our hat was crushed. It was a sad looking hat—a melancholy spectacle when we rescued it—looking like a smash-down opera hat; we thrust our hand in it in despair, but "what to our wondrous eyes should appear," it resumed its old shape, hardly the worse for its mishap. We wore it when we arrived in old Europe, and through old Europe. On one occasion, a hot day, it was lying in the car on the opposite seat; at a station some ladies got in, and one who was not a fairy in weight sat down on our hapless hat; down it went again; again did we apply the restorative, and, like a vessel that pitches, it came up again. We landed in this country after seven months' absence; we still wore that hat, and it is still good-looking. We ought to have mentioned that it was made by Jones & Temple, No. 929 Chestnut Street, who want to purchase it of us and put it under a glass case, but no money can purchase that hat.

"CHRISTMAS DAY. The night before and the night after." A beautiful little book, and does great credit to the publishers. Everybody should have these delightful little poems. As Mrs. Toodle says: "They are handy to have in the house." Price 50 cents, postage free. Address Turner Brothers & Co., 808 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

EUGENIE.—Some gossip writes: "The Empress of the French speaks and writes French quite incorrecly. Whenever she gets excited, she uses a great many Spanish words in her conversation, and when really angry, she will, at last, only speak Spanish. The servants at the Imperial Court, therefore, when saying, 'The empress has talked Spanish to me,' mean 'She has scolded me.'"

AMUSEMENTS.—Let none decry innocent amusements; they are the means of much real good to the human family. Social merry-makings, not intrinsically sinful, are good and healthful indeed. Let the laugh, and innocent joke, the song, the tale go round, for blessings follow in their wake. Many have naturally cravings for excitement, which, if not satisfied in the manner referred to, will lead their subject to scenes of sensuality, from which only wretchedness can flow. The producers of innocent amusements and recreation for the people are, then, benefactors of their fellow-men.

It contains something of almost everything of interest to the ladies; literature, pictures, music, fashions, receipts, etc., all are presented in a most convenient and attractive manner.—Journal, Salem, Ohio.

We have received from Paris "The Absent One," poetry by S. S. Hornor, M. D., music by Giunti Bellini. The words are very pretty, and the music sprightly and melodious. We are not aware that it has been republished here, and it would be a good speculation for some one of our musical publishers to reproduce it.

FRENCH TELEGRAMS.—We give two telegrams; one received, and the other sent by ourselves. No. 1 was sent from Bordeaux to Paris. We wrote it: "Madame G., Hotel de Capucins, we will be home to-night about eleven." This is the version as received: "Mde. G., Hotel des Carcius, Vvut be home to-nught about eleven." No. 2 was received by French cable: "All vell and protperous—pleasant voyage."

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.—Apply to your postmaster for a postal money order. No more losses by mail.

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money orders shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge shall be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

MRS. WHITNEY, 314 South Third Street, Philadelphia, teacher of piano and guitar. Terms.—$15 per quarter.

A MILE OF CABINET ORGANS would seem a large number; yet, if the instruments manufactured and sold by the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN Co., during the past year alone, were placed close together in a line, they would reach a distance of more than three (3) miles; or, if arranged three (3) in a tier, would make a solid wall, nine (9) feet in height, around the Boston Common. We hardly know which is the more surprising—the demand now existing for these Organs, or the improvements made in them the past few years. That which was formerly a weak and ineffective instrument becoming possessed of such qualities of tone and variety of expression as to command the unequivocal praise of artists and connoisseurs both in this country and in Europe. It is not strange, therefore, that the Cabinet Organ is fast taking its place as the favorite parlor instrument among all classes of society.—Boston Traveller.

Always fresh, bright, beautiful, and interesting. Without extraordinary merit this periodical could not have maintained for nearly forty years the high place which it has held in the public esteem.—Democrat Northwest, Napoleon, Ohio.

SHORT-SIGHTEDNESS.—Short-sightedness is the natural and hereditary tendency of city eyes, produced by the constant self-adaptation of its organ to the short distances which are the subjects of its habitual experience in large and thickly-settled towns. It must make a vast difference in the constitution of the eye, in a lifetime, to say nothing of successive generations, whether it is concerned in looking at a brick wall twenty feet distant across the street, or at mountains and forests miles away, as would be the case in the country. In the old cities of Europe that have been inhabited, perhaps, for fifty generations, the majority of the inhabitants are near-sighted.

AN exchange says: "Georgia has a patent churn which allows the lady who operates it to nurse her baby, read GODEY, and bring the butter in eight minutes."

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY occurring this month, a good present to make would be a year's subscription to the LADY'S BOOK. No more useful Valentine could be sent.

SHORT CUT TO MISERY.—Begin by fancying that no one cares for you, that you are not of use to anybody—a sort of nonentity in the household, where your place would not be missed, but easily supplied. Ponder on your want of beauty, and lead yourself to believe that no one can love a plain face, or think you agreeable because there are others more charming. Fancy that every one who looks upon you makes a mental comparison which militates against you in favor of some one else. Imagine that every word said in jest is only meant to cover a deeper and more painful one—that every article of wearing apparel you don is criticized and ridiculed. Do all this, and your tendency to morbidity of feeling will so increase that in a very short time you will become one of the most miserable of human beings.

THE Cheapness of the LADY'S BOOK, in comparison with the lower-priced magazines, has always been conceded. The reading matter is of a higher order, the plates are more numerous, the music is all original, and cannot be procured until after we have published it; the same of our model cottages and drawing lessons. And the fashions! where can you find their equal for truthfulness!

ABOUT GLASS, AND CHINA, AND THE LIKE.—Glass was discovered at an early epoch; many improbable stories are handed down to us on this subject. The first regular historical record is that given us by the author of "Researches among the Egyptians," which teaches us that at Diospolis cups were made, and glass cut and gilded with admirable skill; colors were even made to change as you looked at them from one tint to another; and Winckelman, in his "History of Art," adds that the ancients understood making glass much better than the moderns. However that may be, the Phœnicians for a long time monopolized all the trade in glass, and, according to Pliny and Strabo, the manufactories at Sidon were in a very advanced state, and those of Alexandria, under the Ptolemies, enjoyed an equal fame. The art of glassmaking passed from Italy to France, and later from France to England; that is to say, in 674, at the time of the construction of the Abbey of Wearmouth, the church belonging to which was built by French masons and architects after the Roman fashion. The French workmen, says the venerable Bede, ornamented the windows of the church and monastery with glass, and taught the English how to make it.

France and Frenchemen have been very famous in connection with the class of productions with which we are now concerned. There is Paillassy, whose interesting history reads more like a romance than plain matter of fact. Here is a morsel of it:—

"In 1539, one morning in May, the inhabitants of the town of Saintes were surprised and displeased to find a new family had come to establish itself among them. But dislike soon gave place to admiration. The inhabitants of Saintes learned that the head of the family was named Bernard Paillassy, a man renowned for his paintings on glass, and from that moment all feelings of enmity and jealousy disappeared. Perhaps the people thought of the windows of their poor church. Matters went on very well for some time, until Paillassy, now having been two years at Saintes, saw a cup of some sort of composition very beautifully turned and finished, and became immediately possessed with the idea of making a vase of similar construction.

"Under the influence of this idea he abandoned the employment which had before supported his family, spending all his time in kneading earth, and afterwards baking it. But his first endeavors were unfortunate, and poverty with all its horrors entered his house. No matter, Paillassy struggled on, sustained by a hope that, although a beggar to-day, to-morrow he may have more gold than his strong box will hold. But many to-morrows came, and no gold. His wife complained bitterly, and his children, their eyes streaming with tears, clasped their thin hands, and implored him to resume his old profession of painting on glass, by the profits of which they had lived so comfortably, but all in vain. Twenty years passed in this manner. The genius of invention, a long time deaf to his cries, at last laid the crown of success upon his head. Success, that magic sound to the ear of genius. Paillassy had the faith which never deceives. The rumor of his discovery spread far and wide. Poverty fled from his house. Henry III. sent for him to Paris, and gave him lodgings in the Tuilleries; it was here that he obtained a patent for the invention of Royal rustic pottery of all sorts. He was now known by the name of Bernard of the Tuilleries.

"The invention of the fine opaque and solid enamels is due to the French. John Toutin, a jeweller of Châteaudun in 1630, was the first, it is said, who made enamelled jewels. This style of painting, improved by Gribelin, his pupil, and afterwards by Dubré and Morliere, whose rings and watches were much sought after, led to the idea of attempting portraits in enamel, the execution of which was in a somewhat different style from those done at Limoges under Francis I.

"Enamel is a particular preparation of glass to which various colors are given. The art of enamelling on earthenware and metals is very ancient. According to the early historians the bricks of which the walls of Babylon were constructed were enamelled with various figures. But this art remained long in a simple state, from which it did not rise until the time of Raphael and of Michael Angelo."

Mirrors were originally of polished metal, as is well known; but eventually they came to be made of glass, coated with a preparation of quicksilver. Early specimens are, under favorable circumstances, by no means undesirable acquisitions, as they can be placed in positions where ordinary objects are scarcely suitable:—

"The art of making looking-glasses originated at Venice, which city furnished all Europe with them, until Colbert persuaded many of the workmen, who were Frenchmen, to return to France, and sent them to the manufactory founded in 1661 by Eustache Grandmont and Jean Antoine Autonneuil, which was in a languishing condition, not being able to compete with the Venetians. He built the large houses used for that purpose in the Rue de Reully at a great expense, and made the whole establishment a royal one, so that, from that time, the French looking-glasses were equal to the Italian, and some of them are superior in size and perfection to any in the world. A workman, named Thevart, became master in 1668, made great improvements, especially in the size. The establishment was then removed from Paris to Saint Gobin, in Picardy, where a few years since eight hundred workmen were employed."

But what shall we say of porcelain? Here is a rapid glance at its history:—

"The art of making porcelain originated ages ago. The Egyptians were acquainted with it, and we know that they used the same process as we do; so that it is probable that the art passed into Asia, and thence to China, where porcelain, called tsé-ki, was common, as well as in Japan, four hundred and fifty years before Christ. The Portuguese imported this beautiful manufacture into Europe in 1517. They called it loca, whilst we, somewhat strangely, have borrowed their word porcelana, signifying a cup or porringer. The Chinese kept the precious composition a secret; but Barton Boettcher, chemist at the court of the Elector of Saxony, discovered it in the seventeenth century by combining different earths for the purpose of making crucibles. The rumor spread into France and England, where every chemist set to work to make porcelain, but in vain; until at last M. Tschirnhausen discovered a composition to all appearances similar to that in Saxony. He confided it to M. Homberg, in France, but they both died without having made the secret public. Reaumur guessed at the articles which must enter into the composition of the Chinese porcelain, and published some very just ideas concerning them and the means of employing them. He made some imitating the Saxon exactly, and thus gave France a useful art as well as a new branch of commerce; and it was according to his directions that the Marquis of Fulvy, Governor of Vincennes, established there a porcelain manufactory in 1738; but the success attending it was not equal to the zeal of the institutor, for the marquis lost all his fortune by it. In 1766 Louis XV. purchased the now almost desolate establishment, and transferred it to Sèvres. Maëquer and Montigny, excellent chemists, enriched it by a composition uniting all the qualities necessary for making first-rate porcelain, being no other than the kaolin and the petunse of the Chinese earths, of an extreme whiteness, discovered in 1757 by M. Valleria at St. Yriex in Limousin. The manufactory at Sèvres then attained its great celebrity."

Sèvres! What a magic effect this word produces upon all genuine lovers of porcelain and kindred products. Its artists have won an imperishable name, and its marks and monograms are most carefully registered. Of the past we can very briefly speak, but, as we are inclined to be historical, we append a few notes and opinions about Sèvres:—

"It was at Sèvres," says M. Capéfigue, "that Colbert established a vast manufactory, where antique vases were modelled, and Chinese and German urns imitated; the best paintings copied, hunting-scenes, battles, and natural flowers of brilliant colors. Fifty workmen were convoked from various parts of Europe; everything was reduced to rules, and experiments tried upon the earth and water used. The Sèvres china acquired a great reputation over all Europe. The king sent presents of it to every court, and it became a gracious offering at the conclusion of the treaty. The Sèvres manufactory was a subject of pride to Louis XIV.'

"Napoleon betrayed no less solicitude for the prosperity of this fine establishment, the direction of which he intrusted to the learned mineralogist, Brongniard. In 1805 the fabrication of soft porcelain was entirely given up at Sèvres. Nevertheless, it must be confessed, as M. Brongniard very judiciously remarked, it required more research and more genius to compose this artificial porcelain, which is the result of the simple mixture of two natural materials, kaolin and felspar. After this reform the new director of the Sèvres manufactory applied himself particularly to the composition of hard porcelain, giving a whiteness and delicacy never previously obtained. In 1803 the Sèvres porcelain was embellished by the superb green chromium, a metal discovered by Vauquelin.

"To M. Brongniard's wise direction were owing the improvements made in the chemical mode of painting on glass, a new style of painting, which is done by mixing the metallic oxides with a flux composed of glass with lead.

"It was under the empire that historical subjects were first represented upon porcelain, and especially upon very large vases. The painter Van-Ors was called to France in 1811 to paint flowers upon porcelain, and in this branch of art he was distinguished as much for the richness of his shading as the brilliancy of his coloring. The fine paintings upon porcelain by Drolling, Lauglace, George, Constantin, and, above all, Madame Jaquetot, are well known.

"M. Charles Dupin speaks as follows: 'By means of the new method of painting upon porcelain, perfected as it now is, the finest masterpieces of the greatest masters, which are liable to decay in the course of a few centuries, may be copied and consigned to posterity in a most beautiful and imperishable form. Mineralogy and chemistry have lent their aid to render this execution less expensive, more faithful, and more delicate than mosaic imitations.'

We copy the following notice from that able work, The Journal of Health, published by Dr. Hall in New York:—

"The magazine and the newspaper have become the family teacher, are excluding better and safer reading; and it becomes every parent, who has a regard for the religious welfare of his children, to see to it, that the publications which are placed on the parlor table CAN BE TRUSTED as never having, by any possibility, any word prejudicial to the religion of the Bible. Many there are which avoid these things in the main, but every now and then give a secret stab or malignant side thrust, all the more effective for evil by the measure of influence gained over the reader by reason of the general better tenor of the teachings. Graham's Magazine now discontinued, Arthur's and Godey's are all safe monthlies in the direction named, and some others. We certainly know that some of the most pretentious prove by their occasional utterances that, at heart, their conductors are enemies of the Christian religion. It will be our earnest and steady endeavor that such a charge shall never be truthfully laid at our door.

THAT WAS a very pretty conceit of a romantic father, whose name was Rose, and who named his daughter Wild, so that she grew up under the appellation of Wild Rose. But the romance of the thing was sadly spoiled when she married a man by the name of Bull.

I HAVE in my family a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine that has been in almost daily use for the past ten (10) years, and not a thing has ever been done to it in the way of repairing; not a screw loose, or any part of it out of order, in all that time. It has been used in making coats, vests, and pants of the thickest woollen goods, besides doing all kinds of family sewing, and is now, this day, the best machine for work I ever saw.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY for February.—This is a beautiful number, containing, as was promised, nearly twice the amount of music formerly given. Look at the contents: La Chatelaine, brilliant Polka Mazourka, by Carl Faust; Beautiful set of Quadrilles, six pages, from Offenbach's opera of Orpheus; Katy's Letter, pretty semi-humorous song by Lady Dufferin; The Happy Gypsy Girl, charming new English song by George Linley; Saint Valentine's March, easy arrangement for beginners; As Lifted in the Wilderness, new Sunday School Hymn, harmonized for four voices with Organ or Melodeon accompaniment. To the yearly subscriber all this music costs but 33 cents, or $4 per annum, and we are safe in asserting that nowhere, excepting in the Monthly, can the the same variety and quantity of real sheet music, from engraved plates, be purchased for four times the price.

The following were given in the January number, commencing the eighth yearly volume of this periodical. The Fairy Sprite, brilliant Salon piece by Mack (of itself worth 60 cents in the stores); Little Maggle May, beautiful song by Blamphin; Say my Heart, new song, with English and German words, by Abt, author of When the Swallows, Ivy Green Polka; Pulling Against the Stream, easy lesson for beginners; and Still Closer to Jesus, new Sunday School Hymn, harmonized for four parts. We will send these two numbers, as samples, free of postage, to any address on receipt of 75 cents, confident that no one who gets them will fail to subscribe for the balance of the year. To insure the volume complete subscriptions should be sent in at once, as we shall not continue the plan of keeping on hand a large quantity of back numbers.

Terms and Premiums.—Single numbers 40 cents. Yearly subscription, $4. For every two new subscriptions at one time we send as a premium $5 worth of the latest sheet music, which can be ordered from our new catalogue to suit the abilities of the performer. Catalogues sent on receipt of the $3. Clubs of five, without the premium, $15. The Musical Monthly and GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK one year, without the premium, $6; or with the $5 premium, $7 50. The Monthly will be sent one year free to any one ordering $6 worth of music direct from us. Address orders only to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

A GENTLEMAN of Philadelphia saw an advertisement that a receipt for the cure of dyspepsia might be had by sending a postage-stamp to the advertiser. He sent his stamp, and the answer was, "Dig in your garden, and let whiskey alone."

AN amusing circumstance occurred in a singing-school some time since. A Mr. Paine was the teacher and a Miss Patience one of the pupils. In the course of the evening the teacher gave out the tune set to the words—

"Come, gentle Patience, smile on Pain."

The pupils were so excited by laughter that it was found impossible to sing the line. Soon the teacher gave another, in which were the following lines:—

"Oh, give me tears for others' woes,
And patience for my own."

The risibilities of the school were so affected that all singing was deferred until another occasion.

BEST BOOK FOR EVERYBODY.—The new illustrated edition of Webster's Dictionary, containing three thousand engravings, is the best book for everybody that the press has produced in the present century, and should be regarded as indispensable to the well-regulated home, reading-room, library, and place of business.—Golden Era.

SAVINGS' BANK AT PITTSBURG.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 430 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

Description.—A office of receiving and paying teller, B vault, C cashier's room, D president's room, E closet.

We give in this number the design of a bank, the erection of which we are now superintending in Pittsburgh. It possesses a handsome front, built of pink Quincy granite. The steps, which are over twenty feet in length, many of but one piece, were cut out by J. Cumber & Co., of this city. The superstructure of the front and return sides is of the finest quality Connecticut brown stone, executed by Mr. Wm. Gray—also of Philadelphia—in the highest style of art. On the front we find two lions guarding the entrance, each eight feet long; they are being made by our best sculpturer in a superior, first-class style. The female Cariatides over the door-jams are to be made over life size, so that viewed in perspective they will appear natural. Over the door is a large dollar, and beneath the words "Savings' Bank." The sculpture is all of the highest art and the finest material. Scrolls and ornamental carvings form the head of the main entrance, and the front, when finished, will be the finest in the country. The design is entirely original.

The sides and rear will be of brick with freestone dressing; the cornice and roof will be of galvanized iron; the flowing base, wainskirting, and the counters will be of white Italian or black Irish marble, executed by Mr. Gray. The iron work is by Wm. B. Scalf & Co., of Pittsburgh; the plumbing, which is of a very superior order, is by Halpin & Co; the brick work by Boyd & Son; the vaults by Bank & Barnes; the smith work by Marshall & Bro., all of Pittsburgh.

The frescoing and the large walnut doors in the front, with bronze panelling in relief, are not yet under contract. The building is progressing rapidly, and we expect the whole to be finished in twelve months. It will cost less than $200,000, and it is a work that will last for ages. An idea can be formed of the massiveness of the front, when it is known that the brown stone alone weighs fourteen hundred tons.

EVERY BUSINESS MAN should subscribe to Peter-son's Counterfeit Detector and National Bank-Note List, price only $1 50 a year.

A MURDEROUS SEA-FLOWER.—One of the exquisite wonders of the sea is called the opelet, and is about as large as the German aster, looking indeed very much like one. Imagine a very large double aster, with ever so many long petals of a light green, glossy as satin, and each one tipped with rose color. These lovely petals do not lie quietly in their places, like those of the aster in your garden, but wave about in the water, while the opelet generally clings to a rock. How innocent and lovely it looks on its rocky bed! Who would suspect that it could eat anything grosser than dew or sunlight? But those beautiful, waving arms, as you call them, have another use besides looking pretty. They have to provide food for a large, open mouth, which is hidden deep down amongst them, so well hidden that one can scarcely find it. Well do they perform their duty, for the instant a foolish little fishlet touches one of the rosy tips, he is struck with poison, as fatal to him as lightning. He immediately becomes numb, and in a moment stops struggling, and then the other beautiful arms wrap themselves around him, and he is drawn into the huge, greedy mouth, and is seen no more. Then the lovely arms unclose and wave again in the water, looking as innocent and harmless as though they had never touched a fish.

A GENTLEMAN was making comparisons between men and women, derogatory to the latter. And among others he said: "Man is strong, and tough, and towering, like the oak; while woman is weak and drooping, like the willow." Whereupon a young lady retorted: "If the willow is weak, it is often used to bind up other wood." The gentleman had nothing more to say.

A CINCINNATI genius advertises for a situation, saying that "Work is not so much an object as good wages." He ought to have a place in the police force.

A WIT being requested to say a good thing, laconically responded, "Oysters!"

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE writes: "I would say to all young ladies who are called to any particular vocation, qualify yourselves for it as a man does for his work. Don't think you can undertake it otherwise. And if you are called to a man's work, do not exact a woman's privileges—the privileges of inaccuracy and of weakness."

USE OF LEMONS.—When persons are feverish and thirsty beyond what is natural, indicated in some cases by a metallic taste in the mouth, especially after drinking water, or by a whitish appearance of the greatest part of the tongue, one of the best "coolers," internal or external, is to take a lemon, cut off the top, sprinkle over it some loaf-sugar, working it down into the lemon with a spoon, and then suck it slowly, squeezing the lemon and adding more sugar as the acidity increases from being brought up from a lower point. Invalids with feverishness may take two or three lemons a day in this manner, with the most marked benefit, manifested by a sense of coolness, comfort, and invigoration. A lemon or two thus taken at tea-time, as an entire substitute for the ordinary supper of summer, would give many a one a comfortable night's sleep, and an awakening of rest and invigoration, with an appetite for breakfast, to which they are strangers, who will have their cup of tea and hearty supper.

Kate Clyfton's Revenge. No letter received with MS., and no stamps.

Mrs. M. J. P.—I. Pronounce it as if spelled Trooso. 2. Westchester Co., N. Y.

Fannie B.—An invitation to "call any time" means no time; and therefore the absence of the young lady was excusable. But there can be no excuse for the inhospitality of her mother to a party who had travelled fourteen miles to see her daughter.

Irene Morris.—Yes. But if the inquiry is made in reference to contributors, we are obliged to say that we do not at present need any.

Inquirer.—"Jesus's bark" is the name originally given to the bark of the cinchona. It was first discovered by the Jesuits in use among the natives of South America about the year 1600. Many marvelous tales are told of the way in which the virtues of cinchona were first discovered by the natives of the country, but they have been proved erroneous. Its remarkable power in curing fever and ague, and its efficacy as a general tonic have rendered it one of the most valuable drugs possessed by man.

M. A. F.—Among princes or nobility a marriage with a woman of inferior rank, in which it is stipulated that she and her children shall not enjoy the rank or inherit the possessions of her husband, is called a morganatic marriage.

Betsy.—Your pictures should be dusted lightly with cotton wool or with a feather brush.

A Mother.—In clothing your infant, the chief object to be attained is lightness, looseness, ease, and moderate warmth.

Skater.—If the chest be irritable, it is neither salutary nor easy to skate against the wind.

C. M. G.—1. It is a matter of taste. 2. Tonics and a change of air are usually the best remedies.

A Subscriber.—Pay no attention to such advertisements; they are all humbug. It can be seen at a glance that the sending of a stamp will not pay the advertiser for the trouble of writing a reply.

Anxiety.—There is but one way for you to improve, and that is to practise daily from good copies.

Frances.—The present you suggest will be both useful and pretty.

Jessica.—Gum-arabic starch is used for putting a starch on linen.

May.—The story was written by a lady.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The Publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

Fig. 5.—Suit of purple silk poplin, made with two skirts, the lower one trimmed with a deep ruffle, headed by a box-plaited quilting. Overskirt looped up and trimmed with a ruche of the same; the ornaments are made of velvet. Plain corsage, trimmed to correspond. Purple velvet hat, trimmed with feathers and lace scarf.

Figs. 6 and 7.—Fashionable winter boots. Now that short costumes are permanently adopted for out-door wear, great variety is noticeable in boots, and great care is taken in their manufacture. The accompanying engravings illustrate two of the newest styles of high or Polish boots. Fig. 6 is made of black kid, the front and heel being black patent leather; the lining is fur, and there is a border of black fur round the top and down the front. The boot is tied in front with bows of black ribbon. Fig. 7 is made of a fancy material in imitation of quilted serge. It is trimmed, as the preceding boot, with fur, and the front is fastened across with cord and buttons.

Fig. 8.—Gauntlet glove of white, embroidered in colored silks.

Fig. 9.—Gauntlet glove, trimmed with swan's down.

Fig. 10.—Gold ear-rings, composed of red and yellow gold.

Figs. 11 and 12.—Edging, Vandyke braid and crochet.

SECOND SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Bride's dress of white corded silk, made with two skirts, the lower one trimmed with a plaited ruffle. The overskirt is puffed in the back and trimmed with two rows of point lace. High corsage, with bertha formed of puffed illusion, edged with lace. Coat sleeve, trimmed with lace. Veil of illusion, and small half wreath across the front of head.

Fig. 2.—Metternich cape for a girl of nine. This cape may be made either of the same material as the dress with which it is worn, or of fine white or striped cloth. It is trimmed with a plaited ruche and pinked-out frill, and fits the waist at the back by means of a band that passes under the arms at each side through a small slit, and fastens in front underneath the cape.

Fig. 3.—Chignon of long and short curls and one long thick plait hanging down in the middle of the back. The chignon is completed by a bow and coronet of tortoise-shell. The front hair is arranged in short curls.

Fig. 4.—Coffure arranged in puffs to entirely cover the head, finished by two long curls in back.

Fig. 5.—Infant's night dress of fine cambric muslin, made with a yoke, and skirt cut full. Coat sleeve.

Fig. 6.—Gentleman's morning shirt, made with plain linen bosom, and cuffs ornamented with several rows of stitching.

Figs. 7 and 8.—Necklace cravat of velvet, with satin ribbon, bow, and locket. The mode of folding and sewing on the ribbon is seen in Fig. 8.

Fig. 9.—Sailor costume, for a boy from four to eight, to be made in marine blue cloth, and braided with black.

Fig. 10.—Knitted cloak with cape for girls from two to four years. This pretty cloak is knitted with blue and white fleecy wool. The border, which is finished off into a Vandyke edge, is worked with white wool. The hood is gathered in the back by a rosette of ribbons. Cut first a good paper or muslin pattern, and try it on. Begin the cloak with the white border, which edges the front and lower edge, and which is knitted in one piece; make a foundation chain corresponding to the edge of the cloak; take a crochet à tricolor needle, and work with white wool. Then take the wooden knitting needles with which you are going to work, take 1 loop on the needles in every chain stitch of the foundation, as you do in the 1st row of crochet à tricolor (on our pattern about 880 stitches), and knit in rows backwards and forwards. 1st row. Purled. 2d. Knitted. 3d. Alternately purl 2 together, throw the wool forward. 4th. Purled. Purl every stitch of the preceding row formed by throwing the wool forward. Repeat from the 1st to the 4th row, but knit 2 stitches together after the 70th stitch from the beginning, and before the 70th stitch from the end, in every row. These 70 stitches on either side form the border for the front edges; the decreasing, which are always repeated at the same places, and which must meet on 1 stitch of the front edge and 1 stitch of the lower edge, form the lower corners. After the first repetition of the pattern, knit the stitches of the front edges in such a manner that the next 3 rows appear knitted on the right side; the following 5 rows are knitted on both sides of the work, but continue to work on the stitches of the lower edge the pattern described above. The stitches of the front edges are cast off in the 17th row; on the remaining stitches purl 1 row, knit 4 rows, but in these last 4 rows knit together on each side 3 stitches where the stitches of the lower edge and the selvedge stitches of the front edge meet; knit together one of the selvedge stitches with one of the stitches on the needles. In the following rows this takes place as far as the upper edge of the front parts. Then take blue wool, and knit the ground of the cloak in a spotted pattern, which consists of the 2 following rows: 1st row of the ground (right side of the work). Knitted. 2d. Alternately knit 3 together, knit 3 stitches in the following stitch: knit 1, purl 1, knit 1. Then knit again 1 row, and repeat the 2d row, only the 3 stitches which have been formed in 1 stitch must be knitted together, and 3 stitches formed in the next, so that the pattern is alternated. The work must be decreased where there are seams in the paper pattern. When you have got to the arm hole, divide the back and front parts, and knit each part separately, increasing and decreasing according to the paper pattern. The front and back parts are then sewn together on the shoulder. The sleeve is begun on a foundation chain of 40 stitches; knit then 3 times the pattern of the border, then purl 1 row, 2 rows knitted, 1 row purled; then work on the sleeve with blue wool in the pattern of the ground till it is long enough. Sew the sleeve together, and sew it into the cloak, so that the seam of the decreasing is under the arm. The hood is worked partly in halves; begin each half on 76 stitches, knit first the border like that of the cloak, and then with blue wool the pattern of the ground, but leave on each side of the border the 30 stitches unnoticed which form the front corners of the cutting-out of the neck, and increase on the slanting side of the pattern as much as necessary. The remaining stitches of the border are knitted together with the stitches of the ground, 1 or 2 stitches at the end of every row, so that all the stitches of the border are knitted off with the last row of the hood. Then take all the stitches on the needle, and finish the hood in one piece. The two slanting sides of the hood are then gathered closely in the middle of the back, and edge the hood, the cloak, and sleeves with the following border in two rows: * 1st row. 1 double in one selvedge stitch of the border, 3 chain, missing 1 selvedge stitch. 2d. 1 double on the middle one of the 3 chain, 1 double on the middle of the preceding row, * 2 chain, 5 chain, 1 double on the middle of the next scallop, 2 chain, 1 double in the following scallop. The hood is then gathered round the neck, sewn on to the cloak, and bound with blue silk ribbon. Sew on a ribbon rosette in the middle of the back, and draw a ribbon through the Vandyked border. The waistband is likewise knitted with white and blue wool. It is edged with Vandykes of blue wool. It fastens with a rosette in front.

Fig. 11.—Muff, with a pocket, made of gray curled Astrakhan fur in the shape of a travelling bag. It is lined with quilted blue silk, and trimmed with gray silk cord and two large gimp tassels.

Fig. 12.—Muff of white fur. The muff is eighteen inches long, nine inches wide when spread out. Lined with quilted white satin, trimmed with small bows of white satin ribbon and tufts of Angora fringe.

Fig. 13.—Muff of white fur (dog's fur imitating ermine), with black tufts, of the same size as the preceding. It is lined with quilted blue silk. The muff is ornamented at the sides with long tufts of white Angora fringe, and on the outside with bows of white satin ribbon and bronze buttons.

Fig. 14.—Muff of black velvet, with strips of fur, lined with quilted black satin. This muff measures twenty-five inches round and twelve inches across.

Fig. 15.—Muff of dark brown leather, with strips of fur. This muff measures eleven inches across and twenty-four inches round. It is lined with quilted brown satin.

Fig. 16.—A new sort of pelerine of white cashmere to throw over the shoulders. This pelerine, pointed and with hood, is ornamented with embroidery pattern in colored silk and rosettes of silk to match.

Fig. 17.—Night-dress. This form is very serviceable, as it is cut so that the upper part can be lined. It is cut square at the throat, where it is trimmed, as likewise the band down the front and the cuffs, with fine Madeira embroidery.

Fig. 18.—Ladies' night-cap, made of fine linen, and edged with narrow worked edging.

Fig. 19.—Ladies' chemise, with embroidered yoke. This chemise is buttoned on the shoulders. The yoke is heart-shaped in front, and consists of strips of plaited Nainsook, strips of embroidered Nainsook insertion one inch wide, and strips of embroidered Nainsook three-fifths of an inch wide. The sleeves are ornamented in the same manner.

Fig. 20.—Square chemisette, with small tucks, trimmed with insertion and lace.

Fig. 21.—Ladies' skirt of black satin, trimmed with a bias facing of green and blue plaid satin, ornamented at top with fancy loops of satin.

Fig. 22.—Night-gown for lady of fine long cloth. The yoke is pointed, and composed of tucks and insertion; a pointed piece is formed on cuffs to correspond.

HATS AND BONNETS.

Fig. 1 is a Paillassé hat of black felt, bent in at the top, and having the brim turned up and bound with black velvet. It is trimmed all round with folds of black velvet, and in front is a plume of black and white ostrich feathers, with a white aigrette, the white feather extending round to the back of the hat.

Fig. 2 is a bonnet, composed of four long bouillons of black velvet, intertwining with each other. The front is edged at top with a narrow black lace, and on the left side is a large rose with buds and leaves. Brides of black spotted tulle.

Fig. 3 is a round hat of brown felt, bossellee or bent in at top, having the brim turned up at the sides, and lined with velvet of the same color. It is trimmed all round with three bands of brown velvet, and at the left side are bows of the velvet, a large green butterfly, and brown ostrich feather, starting from which a long lappet of brown gauze is suspended, and may at pleasure be carried round the neck. At the right side are bows of brown velvet.

Fig. 4 is a bonnet of black velvet, trimmed with bows and flowers of sky-blue velvet, with buds, foliage, and green leaves. At the back is a twisted band of sky-blue velvet. There are broad strings of blue satin ribbon and also a continuous bride, formed of narrow black ribbon, edged on each side with black lace.

Fig. 5 is a bonnet of ruby velvet, having on the left side a large bow of the same material. The front edge is covered with black lace, which is prolonged on each side forming the brides, which fasten with bows of scarlet velvet at the bottom. Besides this there are loose floating strings of scarlet velvet, and at the top of bonnet is a black ostrich feather, which is long enough to fall partly over the chignon.

Fig. 6 is another bonnet. The front consists of a band of black velvet, edged on each side with narrow black lace, and partly covered with an arabesque design in jet beads. In front is a large pink rose with buds and leaves, and on the left side are several loops or bows of black velvet. Strings of black velvet, fastening under the chin.

Fig. 7 is a bonnet of black velvet. The front is trimmed with six bows, edged on the outer side with black lace, and in the centre is a large full-blown rose. The back of the bonnet is formed of a loose frill of black velvet, edged with lace, and starting from the top, and falling over the left side, is a spray of foliage with four long trails, each terminated with a rose bud. The continuous bride is of black lace, headed with a band of black velvet, which is plain at the sides, and plaited in the centre part, and on the left side, at the point whence it starts, is placed a small spray of rose buds and foliage.

Fig. 8 is a hat of black velvet, with a broad brim turned up at the sides. The edges and the top of crown are all trimmed with three rouleaux of the same velvet; on the left side is a large rose, mixed with fullings of black lace, which lace is prolonged at back to form the edging to the brides, which are of black spotted tulle, and fasten under the chignon with a bow of black velvet.

Fig. 9 is a Fontanges hat of sky-blue velvet. The brim is turned up at the back, and the hat is trimmed all round with white lace and also with two upright frills of similar lace. The top is covered with white tulle and a white ostrich feather, and the right side is a large rose with buds and foliage. At the back, starting from under the turned-up brim, is placed a white lace lappet.

High bodices are still worn close to the figure; the sole innovation appears to be that the backs are fully as much trimmed as the fronts. The accompanying engravings illustrate a few of the prevailing styles.

Fig. 1.—Green silk bodice, trimmed with fancy gimp and quilted ruffles of the same.

Fig. 2 is a brown poplin bodice. The trimmings consist of a satin rouleau of the same color and black lace.

Fig. 3.—Black silk bodice, trimmed with fancy satin trimming. This bodice is cut surplice.

Fig. 4 illustrates a black silk bodice, trimmed with blue and green striped velvet; the sleeves correspond, and the tunic worn with this bodice is ornamented in the same style.

Figs. 5 and 6 show a white cashmere bodice trimmed to simulate a jacket. The lower part is striped with several rows of narrow black velvet, and the jacket is simulated with a broad line of velvet edged with points of either silk or satin.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

THE cold winds of this month make us think of the comfort of furs, and reminds us we have not spoken this season of those now necessary additions to the toilette.

Fur garments are necessarily small, in order to be in keeping with the short costumes now in vogue. Otherwise there is but little change from last year's styles. A set consists of a collarette, or boa, and muff; cuffs are only made to order. A collarette of graceful shape, called the Favorite, is shown in all the different furs. It is rounded behind, with long tabs in front, sloping broader toward the belt, and finished with tail tips. The Marie Antoinette collar is similar to this with narrow straight tabs. Plain collars are slightly pointed back and front. Boas are especially popular with young ladies. They are two lengths; the short boa a yard long, and a more dressy boa, measuring two yards, to be fastened at the throat with fancy buttons, or else wound around the neck. Round muffs are smaller than we have ever seen them; the most comfortable are stuffed with elder-down, making them soft, light, and warm. For different styles of muffs, reference can be made to the extension sheet of this number. Mink continues to be the standard fur. Sable is, of course, richer and more valuable; but good mink yields the preference to no other fur for style, service, and adaptability for all occasions. Sets of Russian sable of fine long fur are made in a plain pointed collar and a round muff of larger size than is worn in other furs, trimmed with fur tassels. These sets are very elegant, and cost $1000. Fine Hudson Bay sable is a most desirable fur; a long boa of dark natural color, not dyed, and a round muff, softly stuffed with down, are handsome and elegant styles for a set. Seal skin is very popular; sets are made of it, also sacques.

A sacque of fine seal is an object of desire this season, as few garments are at once so elegant yet so unpretending, so suitable for plain and for dressy costumes. The short, loose sacque is the style most worn, but young ladies of fine figure have tight-fitting basques made to order. If the sacque is not provided with a turned-down collar, a short boa should be worn, as the standing bands have an unfinished appearance. Astrakhan and Persian are used for plainer furs. Royal ermine is worn for calling, matinees, and evening wear; it is the prettiest fur that can be worn by children.

The handsomest opera cloaks are Metternich circulars of silvery white plush, as soft and warm as fur. A large circular, with Watteau fold in the back, is of white, spotted with crimson. A circular of elder-down, as white as a snow-drift, has a Vandyked border of the down, colored a dark brown. A beautiful sortie de bal is of a new cloth, white lamb's wool back, with a silken surface that seems to be covered with fine soutache. The shape is an improved burnouse, rounded in front, and laid in deep plaits behind. It is trimmed with a fringe of white chenille and gilt. A very beautiful sacque is of white satin, finely quilted in diamonds, and lined with cherry-colored silk; it is bordered with a deep band of white Russian hair.

As there are many gay weddings to take place at this season, a few words on dresses, etc., may not be amiss to our fair lady friends. Wedding dresses of white velvet, either plain or uncut, are considered the most elegant for this season. They in our eyes form a stiff-looking dress, not in accordance with our ideas of a light, graceful toilette for a bride. A very beautiful dress is of soft, rich corded silk, edged on the bottom of skirt with a narrow satin flounce, headed with a deep flounce of point-appliqué lace. This is the mode of arranging a lace flounce, for, if it is put on the edge of skirt, it is liable to get injured. A half high corsage, either round, square, or heart-shaped, with plain sleeves frilled at the elbow, and a train of three yards, not longer. A frill of tulle and point lace, interspersed with orange buds, surrounds the neck and sleeves. A tulle veil four yards long and three or four yards wide; the corners are rounded, and either cut plain, trimmed with a ruche, or hemmed. Long kid gloves, fastened with six buttons, reach almost to the elbow. A tulle flounce, closely plaited, can be substituted for the lace one, and an overskirt of tulle, looped up with flowers.

Brides who are no longer young select delicate pearl-gray silk for a wedding dress. A tulle veil and orange flowers accompany this bride-like color. A bride who has been a widow does not wear a veil. Full trousseaux of lace contain a shawl, flounce, handkerchief, barbe, fan, parasol cover, and narrow lace for garniture. The shawl is draped to form a veil at the wedding. A bridal fan has pearl sticks exquisitely carved, and mounted with point lace; the monogram of the bride is wrought in the centre of the lace. Tarlatan is in favor for bridesmaid's dresses. It is made with a train and tunic almost covered with plaited flounces. New floral sets are vines of rose-buds, or of scarlet geranium, forming bretelles on the corsage, and, instead of a sash at the belt, there is a rose with buds and two long drooping sprays. Upon a trousseau we will not attempt to speak, as every person must regulate the number of articles which are contained by their means. One word of advice we will give, however. Brides of small means who can have but one silk dress should choose a black one, as it is stylish, serviceable, and suitable for all occasions, and should be married in a travelling dress and hat. The dress should be of poplin, cloth, or serge; the hat of felt or velvet to match in color. All conspicuous colors, trimmings, and everything that will proclaim bridehood should always be avoided.

Parisians are attempting to revive pointed waists for evening dresses; they as yet do not meet with favor here, as they necessitate the giving up of the now important addition to every toilette—the sash. However, fashion is given to change, and the new corsage will probably be adopted in time.

House jackets of different kinds are very much worn, a new style is called the châtelaine. It is tight-fitting. Behind there is a rather long postillion basque, arranged in three plaits; in front it is double-breasted, open, with wide revers, and cut square at the waist. This jacket is made of black cashmere or fine cloth, and ornamented with a rich braid pattern worked in black and gold. When made of colored material, as a dress bodice, it is deeply trimmed with velvet, as the marinière jacket, which is also double-breasted and open, with revers, but which is quite loose, and has no basque. The marinière is mostly made of white cloth or cashmere, trimmed with black silk, rep, or velvet.

To wear with jackets and bodices thus open en redingote, with revers, we see the marin collars of the same shape, also open very widely, so that the throat remains quite open. We hope this fashion will go out with the winter, for it is neither pretty nor becoming. To our taste, the redingote dress or jacket is pretty only upon a white chemisette, either simply plaited or trimmed with embroidery and Valenciennes lace.

Bonnets continue as small if not smaller. In fact it seems that the bonnet, properly so called, with crown, border, and strings, is fast disappearing altogether. What remains of it cannot last long; it is now reduced to a mere diadem smaller even than the ball coiffures of a dozen years ago. The hair being raised higher than ever on the top of the head, though now drooping very low down in the neck, there can be no very material change in bonnets, which still occupy a very small space on the front of head, leaving the back and ears entirely uncovered, except for the tulle veils, which become large in the same proportion as the bonnets themselves become small.

A novelty in the way of hats is the Tyrolese hat. This fashion was first sported by gentlemen who copied it exactly from the Tyrolese peasants. The ladies have also taken a fancy to them, but wear them excessively small, of soft gray felt, and vary the trimming according to fancy; but in general it is formed of wide ribbon and an aigrette of peacock, pheasant, or heron's feathers. So tiny are these hats that one would really think they were meant for the marionettes of a puppet show. Ladies stick them on the top of their heads, very much forward, without attempting to make them fit. Next to the Tyrolese the tricorn hat is most in favor. It is made of black velvet, trimmed with feathers or gilt braid, the latter being worn to a certain extent this winter.

For the complete costumes, which are still so popular, the tight-fitting paletôt is likely to continue the most popular covering. These paletôts have a waistband, with a very large bow of the same material at the back; it is draped over the dress. The upper part, or bodice, is frequently covered with a small pelerine or fichu, also made of the same material, or perhaps merely simulated by the trimming. Cashmere and serge are very much employed for these costumes. Also the new material called Oriental satin, which is all wool, or wool and silk. These (so called) satins are of a beautiful tissue, thick and soft, woven of two colors, one of which is brilliant and the other black, or very dark. In wool the Oriental satin is generally violet, blue, green, or crimson, shot with black. In wool and silk it is black or dark brown, shot with copper red, gold yellow, or silver white; the brilliant colors being very glossy silks, and the dark ones wool. The Panama tissues are also very fashionable and of very good wear. They, like the Oriental satins, are of two colors, but instead of being shot they form an almost imperceptible chess-board pattern, and when draped they have, like the shot materials, very pretty effects of lights and shades. All the above materials are generally trimmed with velvet and with fringe, which trimmings by no means exclude flounces and flutings, which are more fashionable than ever.

Fashion favors jewels of chiselled red gold studded with jet. These are an imitation of the ancient Norman jewels. The Louis XVI. jewels of enamel with small precious stones of all colors are also very fashionable, as well as the Byzantine jewels in old silver, whose chief value lies in their artistic chiselling. The two most eccentric fashions of the season are the Tyrolese hats and the small sabots, pink, black, or white, worn as ear-drops. Another fanciful jewel is the sleeve link representing two half masks, one gilt, the other of black enamel, or two cards—the queen of spades and the knave of diamonds.

A MARCH DAY.

To My Mother.

CLINTON MAZOURKA.

Composed and Arranged for the Piano-Forte.

FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.

BY MRS. LIZZIE BOWERS.

Published by permission of J. STARR HOLLOWAY, 811 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia.

PIANO.

The musical score is written for piano and consists of three systems. The first system begins with a piano (p) dynamic. The second system continues the melody and accompaniment. The third system includes a trill (Sva.) and a forte (f) dynamic. The score features various musical notations including eighth and sixteenth notes, rests, and triplets.

THE VANES.

BY MARION HARLAND.

PART II.

TALK ran high in the Vane family when it was known upon what grounds Doctor Wilbur refused his consent to his daughter's union with his sister's son. He had struck a blow at prejudices and usages venerable with age, and made respectable by their practice. Democracy was rampant, indeed, if they were to be judged by the rules of health and life governing common mortals. The gist of their arguments reminded me of a plea for suicide I had read somewhere: "What Cato did, and Addison approved, cannot be wrong." What Vane had done, and never thought of repenting and censuring, should be above the reach of other men's criticism. Indiscriminate marriages had long been adjudged by them to be confusion, destructive to the best interests of the best society, and, for their custom of straining their blue blood yet thinner and finer through a succession of sieves of like tissues and make, they have the precedent of royalty itself.

The lovers were everywhere pitied, and the inexorable parent blamed, by his warmest friends. Even my aunt took him roundly to task for his eccentric opinion and barbarous persecution of two people who were made for each other, while her husband quarrelled outright with the bold alien who dared cast discredit upon the customs and principles of his honorable house. I was surprised that my father stood his ground. Not that the cavils of neighbors and the reproaches of relatives failed to stir his resolute soul, but that he bore up against Addie's sorrowful eyes and waning bloom. They had one talk—a long one—the particulars of which I never learned. But my father renewed his caution to me, when it was over, not to betray to her the secret of her mother's misfortune. She went about the house very quietly after that; not mopingly, she had too much spirit to play the languishing maiden, but with a sober mien and a slower step than her old light bound from stair to stair and fleet tread through the rooms. Her ripening had come suddenly. Rick still visited the house, although he seldom saw her alone. They were too honorable for clandestine interviews, and it was my father's command that their betrothal should be ignored by the household and our visitors. He had a difficult part to perform, but he did not shirk it. His demeanor to Rick was, if possible, more affectionate than ever. At all seasons and in all companies he treated him as his best-beloved nephew and as a pupil of whom he was very proud, yet, with respect to his pretensions to his daughter's hand, he was inflexibly dumb.

Rick made a last attempt to move him to a reconsideration of his sentence when the time came for him to go to Paris, for it was thought good in the family council that he should study in that city. I could not but sympathize with the poor fellow when he declared the prohibition of a consinly correspondence unkind and unworthy of his uncle. "The utmost concession I could win was the remark that, should our feelings and intentions remain unchanged at the end of two years and a half, we could do as we pleased, since his legal authority over Addie would be at an end. This is a sorry preparation for exile and hard work."

This was told me in Addie's presence, and when she came toward him with swimming eyes and a would-be hopeful smile, that was yet more eloquent of heart-break than any other expression I had ever seen upon her face, and he opened his arms involuntarily, I ran away and shut the door behind me. I was a coward, and to my father a traitor, but I could not help it. They should have the memory of this sadly-dear parting to live upon during their separation. I think Addie always loved me better thereafter, but we never referred to my breach of faith. Rick wrote to me every few weeks, and I invariably handed his letters to my father, then to Addie.

Her name occurred now and then. "My love to uncle and to Addie." "Tell Addie I wish she were here to see the Louvre." "I visited the Place de la Concorde last night by moonlight, and longed for you and Addie to enjoy the scene with me." Nothing more pointed and tender ever crept into the brotherly epistles, and in the two years of his trans-Atlantic life, he did not see a scrap of her handwriting besides the mementos he took with him.

"They have behaved well, father," I said, on the day of his return to Briery.

"You take it for granted, then, that their purpose is unaltered?" he said, quickly, understanding my meaning, although we had not named the subject to one another in eighteen months.

"I do," I answered.

"Has your sister told you this?"

"Never. As you desired, we have refrained from talking about Rick or their prospects."

He breathed more freely. Did not I say awhile ago that women's instincts are to be trusted rather than men's? Of course, I was right in my prognostications. Rick preserved a profound silence with regard to his love and his intentions until Addie's twenty-first birthday. Then, he walked into his uncle's study, and informed him respectfully that he meant to be married in a month. My father bore the blow like the great-hearted man he was.

"You take this step under my protest," he said, firmly. "But, since resistance is useless, I shall make none. You must live here, and I now offer you a partnership in my practice. It is a fair opening for a young man."

Rick broke down at that. He sobbed like a child in telling me the story, and I can well believe that he spoke the simple truth in describing how he knelt at the feet of his more than father, and besought his forgiveness before he asked for his blessing.

Well, they were married, and the Vane clan turned out en masse to the wedding. Congratulations rained upon the happy pair in a jubilant shower, and the whole affair was discussed as a romance with the legitimate ending, "And they were happy always afterward." Not a mingling was hinted, not even when the extraordinary resemblance of bride and groom was the theme of remark. On the contrary, the circumstance that they might be mistaken for twins made the affair all the more interesting. According to the Vane code, marriage within all lawful degrees of consanguinity was accounted a safe investment of affection and reputation. In these degenerate days, the sacredness of many so-called good families were wofully in need of scouring, while theirs remained untarnished.

For my part, I was heartily glad Addie had married the man of her choice, pleased to have Rick for a brother, and I know that my father was measurably comforted for the miscarriage of his plan for sundering them by the sight of their domestic felicity. Their tempers were too generous for resentment, and the most vindictive of beings could not have studied revenge, subjected, as they were, to his ceaseless benefactions—the loving kindness that surrounded his children like an atmosphere at all times and places.

The first cloud in their sky lowered suddenly and blackly when they had been married ten years. Their third child, a healthy, handsome boy of two years old, sickened at the close of a summer's day, and died in forty-eight hours, almost before we could feel alarmed at symptoms which, to my inexperienced eye, menaced nothing more serious than a brief and not painful illness, such as is common to children of his age in warm weather.

"It is unaccountable to me that he, with his splendid constitution, should make so little resistance to the disease," I remarked, when left alone with my father beside the beautiful clay. "He succumbed with scarcely a struggle."

"Splendid constitution!" retorted he, bitterly. "He had none. How could he have? His noble physique was nothing better than a brittle shell. Nature is implacable."

I asked no explanation. I understood him but too well, and—may I be forgiven—I thought him cruelly harsh in judgment, rough in speech. Yet he mourned the boy as if he had been his own, and when the next babe born to the bereaved parents, after lingering through five months of sickly infancy, let go its feeble grasp upon a life that had been all anguish, and his successor was seized with violent and fatal convulsions after a slight fall that would not have drawn a cry from a robust infant, the grandfather was the wisest and tenderest earthly comforter the mourners had.

Four years elapsed between the death of the fifth and the birth of the sixth child, a hearty girl, whose rapid growth in strength and size was a continual solace to the anxious mother. Not that she imagined in her day of darkest despondency that there could be any connection between the facts that she and her husband were not only blood-relations, but the offspring of a long, unbroken line of intermarriages between the nearest of kin whom the law permits to wed with one another, and the succession of afflictions that had changed the summer of her existence to a dreary autumn. But the frequency of sorrow's visits had made her timid. Baby Sophie brought back the faded light to the mother's eyes, the glad ring to her voice. For three years the patter of her feet, her laugh and her prattle, her winsome and her saucy pranks, filled the house with music, and supplied an endless theme of talk and encomiums to her elders.

She had never been prettier or more engaging than when she climbed upon "papa's" knee one winter afternoon as we all sat about the parlor fire, and, after exhausting her repertory of tricks and caresses, and exciting many a laugh by her merry and intelligent repartees, fell asleep upon his shoulder. He let her rest there until supper was announced, then moved to lay her upon the lounge. I saw him start and bend over her as her cheek touched his hand, and, unperceived by Addie, he motioned me to get her out of the room. I easily succeeded by naming some household errand, accompanying her myself, and leaving my father with Eick. The result of their consultation was not long kept secret. Our bonnie birdling was in a high fever, which, from the hour of its development, laid a hold upon the brain, never relaxed until the tortured, tossing head, the writhing limbs, were frozen in death.

Four short graves in the family burying-ground under the willows, and in our hearts a great stillness, an aching not to be told. Yet I wished since that the mother had died then, while the woe was fresh upon her, and gone to keep her darling's company in that happy, dreamless sleep. I think she could not have lived through the year succeeding baby Sophie's departure but for the love that bound her heart to those of her living children. Any parent might have been proud of them. Amy—we believed in family names, you see, after the manner of other noble houses, and Addie would bestow her mother's and sister's upon her first-born—was nineteen when her little sister was taken from our arms. "A Vane, every inch of her," said the scores of elderly relatives, who considered themselves not for the defence and glorification of the ancient name. I could not see her with impartial eyes, but those who did declared that in beauty she had no peer in the country, and it was renowned for the number of fair women within its borders. She had the clearly-cut features and large, liquid eyes, the blonde complexion, and bright chestnut hair which had made her grandmother the belle of her day, but in vivacity, as in depth of mind, she far excelled her prototype. These were her own mother's gift, and an unspeakable comfort to my father's holling heart, when it thrilled with unspoken fears awakened by her marvellous resemblance to her he had mourned for almost forty years. Ernest, Addie's only living son, was strongly stamped with the Wilbur traits, and, although but seventeen, gave promise of eminent scholarship and a career worthy of his lineage. We had abundant reason for rejoicing in these thrifty young branches of an ancestral tree, and our love had thus much of selfishness in it that when Beverly Randolph, one of the down-country family of that name, and the heir of a fine estate, followed our girl home from her first season at the White Sulphur, we were for a time ill pleased. All the influence of his personal attractions, which were not few, and the well-substantiated reports of his goodness of heart and unblemished character, were needed to reconcile the quartette of guardians to the prospect of losing our treasure.

I marvel now, in looking back, that my father held his peace, when, at Beverly's third visit to Longridge, the engagement was announced, and in solemn conclave—as was the Vane custom—we seniors made the young man welcome to the inner circles of our home-sanctuary. Such a radiantly happy couple as they were then, and upon their bridal eve, one seldom sees twice in a lifetime. I will say, for the credit of the connection, that love-matches were the rule among the Vanes, and marriages of convenience regarded with marked disfavor. It may have been the spectacle of this perfect bliss, moving my father's heart to boundless pity, that wrought with his love to seal his lips and induced him to withhold the warning he had not scrupled to sound when Richard had wooed his daughter. Perhaps, he argued that since the Randolph line had, nowhere in the past, interceded ours, there was less to be dreaded in the possible results of this union. Or, it may well have been that he hoped the curse had worn itself out, or that, having slumbered through one generation, others might pass away without its reappearance. It is certain that he nor Richard ever intimated to the exultant bridegroom what might be his wife's inheritance, or their children's.

They were married in June, and in place of their coming to us at Christmas, we accepted their pressing invitation to pass the holidays at Riverdell—the old Randolph homestead, a hundred miles distant from our plantation. It was no trifle to any of us—sober, quiet-loving elderly people that we had come to be—this winter journey. But we were more than repaid for fatigue and inconvenience by the sight of our darling's delight at the meeting, and the pleasure of seeing her in her own house—the graceful mistress, the worshipped wife, and yet our own affectionate, unspoiled child.

I love to remember how she flew down the broad flight of stone steps when our carriage stopped at the foot, unmindful of the fast falling snow-flakes that powdered her sunny hair and silk dress; how she hung about her grandfather's neck, and called me "Dear, dear old auntie!" in a laughing sob, and how, while Beverly, with the punctilious courtesy that gave a charming flavor of old-time gallantry to his manner, escorted his mother-in-law—his proud young head uncovered, as in the presence of royalty—up the steps, across the broad portico, and so on, up the staircase to the door of the chamber prepared for her, Amy and Ernest, their arms intertwined, brought up the rear of the little procession, chattering gleefully as when they were respectively eight and six years old. We had a quiet, happy evening. Beverly was a thought graver than are most Southern youths, but he appeared to relish the more, on this account, his wife's unflinching flow of spirits, her lively rattle and frolicsome ways. I caught him, several times that night, watching her with delighted fondness, that was to me additional surety of the continuance of her domestic blessedness. He lost nothing, not the lightest word, that fell from her lips, and basked in her smile with a supreme content that would have been amusing had it not been beautiful. She sat upon a cushion at her father's feet, her arms crossed upon his knee, her eyes, wide with pleasure and soft with love, passing from one beloved face to another; her every feature and gesture so expressive as to prepare us for the fervent exclamation that broke from heart and lips when some one made a motion to retire.

"Oh, dear! I wonder if it is a sin for any one to be as happy in this world as I am! Why, papa," as his hand was laid among her curls, and he smiled down into the face flushed into tearfulness with the earnestness of her emotion, "I think GOD never blessed another mortal as He has me. I have not an ungratified wish, not the shadow of a care, and such plenitude of mercies that I am frightened, sometimes, in numbering them over. GOD make me thankful enough for His marvellous kindness!"

With that the head dropped upon Richard's breast, and she lay in his arms, crying heartily, like an over-excited child. We all crowded about her—Beverly nearest, as was his right—and, with tender chidings and playful fondling, checked her hysterical weeping.

"Is it hysterical, really?" she said, in such comic distress as made us laugh, when she was somewhat composed. "I had rather you would tell me I have the smallpox, papa. I shall never respect myself again."

She was bright as an April noon, as, leaning on her husband's arm, who seemed afraid to let her quit his side for an instant, she kissed us all "good-night," and went away to her chamber, still supported by him. Upon the first landing she stopped to throw us a kiss, as we stood below in the hall, and repeating, with a droll grimace of vexation and shame, "Hysterical! think of it!" vanished from our sight. We heard Beverly laugh after they reached their room-door. His admiration and lovely assiduity of attention satisfied even us who thought nothing too good for her.

She was all right again next morning, so far as we could tell. It was Christmas day. The storm had ceased and the sunshine lay brightly upon the snow that covered the road, and bedecked the trees in hoar-frost. There was a general distribution of presents to high and low. The servants received theirs in the dining-room from their mistress' hand, and she accompanied each with some pleasant word; some assurance of kindly feeling or commendation, worth more than the presents, well-chosen and valuable as they were. We had a social breakfast—just ourselves—at which Amy amused us by sporting her husband's gift, a diamond brooch and ear-rings—her mother's, a lace shawl—and Ernest's, a pair of bracelets—in whimsical defiance of fashion's laws controlling morning costume. She looked very bewitching, however, in her blue cashmere wrapper, her pretty trinkets hung about her. She was not to exert herself that day, Beverly ordered, as the gentlemen went off for a forenoon's partridge-shooting, and her mother and myself were not backward in impressing the injunction upon her.

"There was to be a large party at Riverdell that night, but with her efficient corps of servants there was really nothing more for her to do than there was for us. The housekeeper had been an attaché of the Randolph family for fifteen years, and was thoroughly competent to her work. We would have had Amy lie upon the sofa and chat with us until she got tired, then doze until it was time to dress for dinner. But there was no such thing as managing her, we soon discovered. She behaved, as the saying is, like a witch, and a very erratic one. Up stairs and down, she roved and ran; to the kitchen to direct the cooks and consult with the housekeeper, who humored and petted her, as did everybody else; to the green-house, where she drove the gardener out of his senses by breaking off armfuls of fragrant and blossoming boughs—lemon, verbena, geranium, and orange—to decorate the parlors.

"Nothing is too good or precious to be used in your house," she pleaded, when we expostulated with her upon this wasteful and needless spoliation. "Then, it was such fun to see poor Johnson's face! I thought he would have dropped dead when I refused his knife, and bit off the branches. I believe he would have preferred I should gnaw at his fingers instead."

"It was very foolish and unkind, dear child," replied Addie, seriously.

Whereupon the offender made a saucy mouth, and flew off "to apologize to the king of the conservatory," she called over her shoulder as she went. Three minutes later, we saw her walking the piazza, carolling a popular song, bareheaded and without a shawl. Addie called her in and began to scold in earnest, but was assured that "the day was mild as May, and the house like a furnace for heat."

"I am afraid we have not controlled this madcap as we should have done," said her mother to Beverly, upon his return. "But she is sadly spoiled, I find—far less tractable than she used to be."

"If I am, I know who is responsible for my degeneracy in morals and manners. Fie! Bev! I am ashamed of you!" she cried, running up the stairs before him, although he begged her not to go so fast.

"What an impish thing she is, to-day!" said Addie, laughing. "She is fairly intoxicated with happiness, the darling girl! And she grows more beautiful every day, doesn't she, papa?" as they sought their dressing-room.

It adjoined mine, and the murmur of their cheerful talk came pleasantly to me while I made my toilet. I knew the theme was the same that occupied my thoughts, and that their hearts were, like mine, full of thankfulness for the unbroken flood of sunlight poured over one rich, beautiful life.

Amy was queenly in apparel and figure that night, very lovely and gracious in demeanor while she stood to welcome her guests to her husband's homestead. The wild merriment of the morning was chastened into matronly vivacity; the mischievous, elfish expression had given place to a smile that was winning without being gleeful. We—her admirers, par eminence—encountered one another by adroit accident, in corners and other retired places, and exchanged whispered praises of her mien and conduct, agreeing—it is superfluous to say in what verdict. It was the hour of our triumph, because it was hers. When the arrivals were over, she moved through the crowd, tactful and vigilant, dropping a lively sentence here; proffering an introduction there, and, it was easy to see, converting new acquaintances into friends rapidly and completely, as she had done in her childhood's home.

Then, a Christmas reel was formed, and she was led out by a distinguished Congressman, with "a front like Jove's," the particular star of the occasion. She enjoyed the compliment of his homage—delicately yet unequivocally expressed—enjoyed it as she did most other agreeable things, heartily and with the naïveté of a girl of fourteen. She did not dance in the next set, nor yet in the third, lest she might seem negligent of her guest's pleasure in seeking her own; but she took the floor for the fourth, having, as her partner, a gallant ex-governor, who had not hesitated to pronounce her the finest woman he had ever seen between tide-water and the Alleghanies. People looked hard at them as they stood up together—he courtly and handsome, despite his whitening locks, and she—I will use the term that came into my mind as the music called them to their place—fearfully beautiful. Her eyes were glittering globes, so delicate and brilliant were they; her complexion heightened as by a burning fever; her lips parted in eager curves they did not lose even in her smile.

"I never beheld the evidence of such intense vitality in another creature," said a gentleman—a doctor, by the way—to me. "Existence is unmixed happiness to her. It is a luxury to be and to breathe."

Richard was standing by me, and although he smiled at the praises of his daughter, he moved uneasily as the other physician walked off. "From what Addie tells me, I doubt the prudence of all this excitement," he said, aside.

I was past the age of prudery—a gray-haired auntie, to whom doctors and mothers spoke freely.

"She certainly ought not to dance again, the giddy puss!" added the father.

The set over, she promenaded directly by us, hanging on the arm of the venerable beau, talking with much animation of countenance and action. Her tone struck me disagreeably. It was shriller than usual, and her articulation so hurried as to be, at times, unintelligible. Rick noticed it, too, for he arrested her with an apology to her cavalier which was nearly as peremptory as polite. "My child," he said, in a low voice, but audible to me, "this is not wise. You will injure yourself, and you distress us. You must not dance another set."

She looked up at him in bewilderment.

"For your husband's sake I say this," he subjoined. "You are risking his peace of mind and your own health. Sit down in some quiet corner and rest."

"Rest!" with a singular laugh that stopped the blood in my veins and heart. "I will! By and by, by and by." She sang the words to a wild, fantastic air, and stopped, as I imagined, to kiss her father's hand; then swept on, throwing a salute to us from her gloved fingers.

I was shocked to see how pale Richard was, and half-exclaimed at it, but he hushed me instantly.

"Not a word here. But when you can leave this, come to my room; I must speak to you."

I rejoined him in less than five minutes. He sat in an arm-chair, faint and ghastly, and was only able to hold up to my view his right hand, bitten to the bone.

I bathed and dressed it as well as I could, without inquiry or comment, brought hartshorn and cologne, and lastly a glass of wine.

"Did you see her eyes when she did it?" he said, when this was swallowed. "Oh! that she, too, had died in her cradle."

How it all rushed back upon me. That autumn morning twenty-three years ago, and another father's moan: "Heaven help me! I would sooner bury her alive." This was the echo, long delayed, but terribly distinct and faithful.

There was no time for mourning, little for consultation. She must be watched, and by us. Husband and mother should be kept in ignorance, if possible, with the rest of the crowd below, until this miserable farce was played through. Then—but of that when the duty of the hour had been fulfilled. How we went on with it I cannot tell. It is a shuddering dream in the retrospect, with one wildly-beautiful face and its gleaming eyes as the central point of thought and vision, and close beside it the pale, high-bred physiognomy of the father, smiling at her jests, while he dexterously covered incoherent and extravagant sallies, his bandaged hand thrown carelessly behind him. I am sure that I chatted, and, I believe, laughed, and suffered, until the last adieu was said, the last carriage had driven from the door. I fancied the ground sounded hollow under the wheels, and that, now and then, the floor was sinking beneath my feet.

"Our child is not quite well, love," Richard said to Addie, in his gentlest accents. "Auntie and you must get her to bed without delay. Good-night, my darling!" taking her in his arms, and kissing twice the mouth that had wounded him. "Be a good girl, and do as papa bids you."

She obeyed meekly and silently. In quitting the room, I heard Richard's next words:—

"Ernest, you had better leave us. Your grandfather and I want to speak to your brother."

Dazed as I was, the conviction darted through my brain that the parent's torture had just begun.

"Was it wise or kind to break the awful truth to Beverly last night?" I said, reproachfully, to my father, on the morrow which was as the night to yesterday's sunlight.

"It was necessary," was the short reply. "He must be continually upon his guard. He blamed us very severely—poor fellow!—for not having told him everything before his marriage. And he is right."

Nevertheless, I never loved Beverly Randolph so well after I heard it. He was very kind to our afflicted one, very solicitous, very wretched. I know his heart well nigh broke when the two physicians advised her return with us to her old home, and he owned that the pressure of other duties would keep him upon his plantation during much of the time they decreed she was to spend with us. She did not care, she said, wearily, when appealed to as to her willingness to leave him. The reaction from the excitement of the Christmas festival was a sullen melancholy, so opposed to her temperament and habit, we could hardly believe the object of it our docile, yet spirited pet. She did not weep when, after spending two days at Longridge, her husband bade her farewell in the very room in which they had been married six months before.

"I shall see you again in a fortnight," he faltered, still holding her to his bosom, and covering the impassive face with kisses. "Shall you be glad to have me back?"

"I don't know. Let me see you squeeze me too hard," she said, smiling. And when released, she seated herself on the side of the parlor that did not command a view of the drive, where the carriage awaited him.

Nor did she appear to miss him in his frequent absences. She said but little at any time, and that only in reply to our questions, and Beverly's name—once forever upon her lips—never passed them now. It was seemingly less than nothing to her that he was with her during the physical agony and mental perturbation of the long, long June day, in the twilight of which the weak wail of their baby vibrated upon our ears. By a preconceived arrangement, it was he who took the little creature to her bedside, unfolded her arms that he might lay it within them, and begged her—his voice choked and changed by tears—to look at it and speak to him.

"It is ours, my sweet wife. Our dear and beautiful little son. You hoped it would be a boy, you remember."

We drew closer, yet keeping out of range of her eyes, holding our breaths in the intensity of our suspense, and praying, as people never pray save in extremest peril and dread, that God would take pity upon him, upon us, upon her, the blinded, distraught lamb of His fold and ours. For this was the crisis in the opinion of all the medical authorities we had consulted. There was a possibility—a slender chance, but precious beyond all other earthly hopes—that, with the mystery of birth, the light might dawn upon the darkened mind. As I have said, we had arranged this little scene beforehand—ordering the minutest details with thoughtful care, saying to ourselves tremblingly, but with a brave show of hopefulness to each other, that the sight of the babe, whose coming she had anticipated as a new and crowning glory to her wealth of blessings, would restore the wandering reason, awaken the dormant affections. We had heard of such instances, studied and talked them over until we were almost persuaded that her insanity was but one feature of an abnormal state of body. One and all, we had counted the days, then the hours, prior to the event which was to return our beloved one, clothed and in her right mind, to our waiting hearts and desolate home.

It was dusk, and we had set a lamp where the light showed us the figure upon the bed and that which bent over it. One could hear the deep of silence answering unto deep in the room as the husband's broken petition for more than life sank and died into them. It was not faintness or syncope that delayed the wife's reply. My father signed as much to us when he had stolen behind her and laid his fingers upon her wrist. Her pulse was even, her color good, and breathing regular. But her eyes roved unmeaningly over him and other objects in the apartment without reverting to her child. One hand toyed with a fold of the coverlet, and her lips moved whisperingly. They were not often still while she was awake, but we could distinguish nothing she said.

"Amy," repeated Beverly, more distinctly, laying his arm upon the restless fingers, "do you know me?"

I shall always believe that the beaten, straying reason, led, perchance, by some pitying angel, essayed at that instant to regain the home from which it had been driven. Her eyes steadied themselves upon the face above them in dire perplexity and trouble, that was compounded of amazement and fear. Still it was Amy's look, and it was her voice that replied: "Yes. You are Beverly Randolph, the man who married poor Amy Vane, are you not? But, but," the perplexity deepening, "then, who am I?"

Beverly controlled himself manfully. "Darling!" He spoke gently and lovingly, although the surges of passionate emotion—hope, fear, rapture, and anguish—threatened to suffocate him. "You are my wife, the dearest being in the universe to me. We love each other, Amy. You recollect and believe this now, don't you, my blessing?"

Just then, while the scales of fate were beginning to turn under the priceless burden of our newly-found hope, the baby, he who was to have been the saviour of his mother, and to us the bearer of exceeding joy, began to cry. Red fire blazed in the wistful orbs, the lurid gleam of angry astonishment. A bitter and blasphemous execration fell from her tongue, and, gnashing her teeth like a wild beast, she seized the infant with both hands, and would have hurled it against the opposite wall, had not my father, more watchful or expectant of evil than her husband, caught it as she let it go. Then she began rave. * * *

It was mid-winter before we could gain our own consent to place her in a public asylum for the insane. The glimmer of consciousness we had seen sustained our false hopes against the evidence of sense and sight. She grew worse daily—less amenable to control, more violent in language and conduct—but we clung to one idea with the tenacity of drowning wretches. Granted that there was but one chance in a thousand of her recovery. Should she have but a single lucid interval, we ought to be near her at the conspicuous moment. Grief and horror at finding herself in durance under paid guardians would terrify her into incurable madness. We kept her securely then in her old home, watching her by day and by night, never leaving her alone for a second. Beverly transferred his plantation to the care of his youngest brother, and lived altogether with us.

It is not so easy to be quite just to my nephew-in-law as I could wish it were. To be frank, I rather resented his behavior to us after that fatal Christmas night. He dealt no recriminations upon those who had, as he considered, deceived him. Indeed, he clung to us and to his wife with the dumb patience of one stricken beyond the power of healing, yet who must live on without comfort as without hope. Our compassion for him helped us to bear with his reserve, his fits of coldness, and moody reveries. I suppose we should have been grateful for his forbearance and so much of forgiveness as was evinced by his residence under our roof. At least, so my father said, and he was the wisest of us all.

It was Beverly's turn to watch in Amy's chamber on Christmas Eve. He had been greatly depressed all day, and at supper complained of headache and a heavy cold as an excuse for not eating. Nevertheless, he would not resign his task to another, although plied with importunities to do so. He was sternly conscientious in every respect, and I fancied—it may be uncharitably—the more inexorable in the discharge of the duty he owed his wife because it was so irksome, because he shrank from seeing or taking care of her as from handling the mouldering remains of one formerly beloved and fair. The Amy he had wooed, and who had slept in his bosom for a brief half-year, was utterly and forever dead to him. The wreck he tended was a hideous caricature.

She was sleeping when he entered upon his vigil, and, seating himself by the shaded lamp in the chimney-corner, he tried to forget the misery of memory and bodily indisposition in the perusal of a new book. He had pretended to read for perhaps two hours, during which the patient had not stirred, when sleep fell irresistibly upon him. It was two o'clock when he was aroused from the slumber of fevered exhaustion by the touch of a cold wet hand. His wife stood before him in her night-clothes, dripping with water, her teeth chattering in a chill.

"I've been in the well," she said, hollowly, but without agitation. "I thought the time to die had come, so I jumped down. But then they told me I was mistaken, and I climbed out upon the stones. I wasn't ready to be judged, they said. Look at my hands."

They were cut and bruised by the sharp rocks, as were her feet; her stockings and gown were stained with moss and mud. She had feigned slumber, watched her husband lock the door and secrete the key, and, while he was unconscious, possessed herself of the latter.

The next week her grandfather and her father took her to the asylum. Her mother and I went with them. I have been there three times a year since to see that she was comfortable and properly looked after. For the past ten years I have gone alone. My father and Richard Vane are dead. Addie is a confirmed invalid—childish in mind, almost helpless in body. Ernest is married, prosperous, and happy, doing well his part in his day and generation.

I seldom see or hear from Mr. Randolph. He is a rich man and fond of his only child. His sister keeps his house and takes care of little Beverly. My heart yearns over the boy as it does not for Ernest's three healthy, merry children, although they are very dear to me, and will inherit my property at my death. But his father objects to his visiting us often. "It will have an unfortunate effect upon his spirits," he fears, and he lives in constant fear lest the lad should learn that his mother is alive. "Nothing could be more inexpedient," he urges upon us.

We cannot gainsay it. His marriage was the ruin of his life. He knows it and so do we. Yet nobody else dreams of blaming us for allowing the marriage. Least of all do our kinspeople. And the Vanos are an honorable race.

HOUSEHOLD PETS.

BY L. F. MOWER.

GOD bless Mr. Henry Bergh! May blessings descend in overflowing measure upon the field he labors in! This prayer is often in my heart, and my natural fondness and admiration for the entire brute creation are so great, that I would not dispute the theory that the Great Creator permits an after existence wherever He has permitted life. Yet, in the face of this, if I could, I would have a "Society for the Prevention of Animals as Household Pets." It is averred that their fidelity, which so often exceeds that of human friends, is an equivalent for the almost idolatry they in some cases receive; but that quality is only possessed by those noble specimens that have but their due share of regard from man (too seldom that). One does not meet them in the drawing-room. I have seen two Maltese cats receive a tender, loving consideration, that, had it been transferred to the children of the same household, I should have congratulated them, and held the mother in deeper respect. I have seen a father pass almost rudely the sweet home greeting of his fair child, to fold warmly in his arms a favorite grayhound. We have all at times been made very uncomfortable in the houses of our friends by the sudden uprisings—violent draughts of cold air, etc., incident to the attendance upon pet animals—while tiny human feet stagger with their weary march, the conceited parlor favorites look with complacency from the windows of stately equipages. It is sad, however, that this excess of affection for some particular dumb creature, while it tends to wean one from human kind, will not always insure just treatment for the whole race. Wee to the evil one who dares offer one shade of cruelty to any one of God's creatures! But, while "The cry of the Cuckoo" is not only sounds from England's across our western world, and moans wildly in our cities, oh! let not their baby heads be displaced by a race that the Creator has made with other designs.

THE YEARS THAT ARE GONE.

BY C. B.

SWIFTLY as the sunset brightness
Fades from out the glowing west,
Leaving clouds of ashy grayness
Where the sun has sunk to rest.
So, from out my life once joyous,
All the glory disappears;
Leaving but the ghosts of memory,
And the joys of vanished years.
Return, oh, ye years! ye beautiful years!
Return, oh, ye years that are gone!

Thickly as the shadows gather
Over mountain, earth, and sea;
Resting with a shroud of darkness
Where the sunshine loved to be.
So around my lonely pathway
Deep and dark the shadows fall,
And no sounds but dreary echoes
Answer to my spirit's call.
Return, oh, ye years! ye beautiful years!
Return, oh, ye years that are gone!

Before me lies a troubled ocean,
Starless, rayless, drear, and dark,
On its waves in restless motion
I must launch my fragile bark.
'Tis the future, and all blindly,
Alone, unguided, I must roam
With my spirit's cry still ringing
Over billows white with foam.
Return, oh, ye years! ye beautiful years!
Return, oh, ye years that are gone!

And as o'er the swelling waters
Drifted by the sweeping blast,
Swiftly, blindly speeds my shallop,
I turn one look upon the past.
Lo! a strain of music tender
Followed by a path of light,
Floats awhile in peaceful splendor
Slowly sinks into the night.
'Tis the mem'ry of the years,
The beautiful years that are gone!

LINES

On finding a flower of the SANGUINARIA CANADENSIS (Bloodroot), in the month of March, on the banks of the Schuykill River.

BY EMANUEL PRICE.

ERE the forest is dressed in its mantle of green
Or the storms of the winter are past,
The bloodroot its pale pearly blossom upheaves
In the cold cheerless forest amidst the dry leaves
Which protect its frail form from the blast.
It looks like a snowflake old winter has left.
A plant of so tender a form.
One would almost imagine it would have been best
To have let such a delicate plant been at rest
Till the weather was genial and warm.
But He who created made all for the best,
Still bestows with a bountiful hand:
While we, his frail creatures, through folly and pride
Often feign to be wise, our own folly to hide,
And condemn when we can't understand.

MARRYING A WIDOWER.

BY FLORENCE HARTLAND.

"SHALL you attend Mrs. Anderson's grand party, to-morrow night, Emily?" asked her friend Carrie Simpson of Emily Graham, as the two sat before a cosey fire in the latter's chamber. "They say it will be a superb affair; all the girls are on the qui-vive, for you know Mrs. A.'s parties are always so exclusive and recherché, that 'tis really considered quite a distinction to be one of her-guests."

"No," was the careless reply of the young lady addressed, as she played with the silk tassel of her handsome morning dress, "I think it very improbable that I shall go. Fanny will attend, and, for a novelty, I promise myself a quiet evening at home. Fanny is always so stupid and dull the day after a party that I despair of getting any information from that quarter, so do come round directly after breakfast on Thursday, and tell me all about the dresses, flirtations, etc."

"Flirtations!" echoed the vivacious first speaker, theatrically; "don't mention them, Emily! To think that I, the incorrigible little Simpson," as I hear myself called; I who have tilted lances so successfully on many a hard-fought field, should after all be ignominiously routed by that horrid little Esmonds, is really too much for my philosophy! And you are the Brutus who assisted in my downfall. Let me tell you all about it," continued the lady, settling herself more comfortably in the large cushioned chair she occupied. "You know, Emily, I made a violent dash upon young Harry as soon as the arrival of the rich young Southerner at the Fifth Avenue House was made known to our set. I always had a decided penchant for magnolias and orange bowers, and, considering this a favorable opportunity for gratifying my taste, I made my lazy brother John call on my intended victim and invite him round to dine. I was wreathed in smiles, and wore that moon-on-the-lake moiré which Tom Cranston had declared irresistible. Well, Harry was evidently struck, and continued his visits until I was beginning to feel triumphant, when, unfortunately, Mrs. Archer gave that never-to-be-forgotten party. Mr. Esmonds was to take me, and I made superhuman efforts to look my best. Mamma was taking a nap, papa and the boys were down town; so I gave James strict orders to admit no one, and ran up stairs, two steps at a bound, to put my hair in crimping pins. About five o'clock this interesting operation was completed, and just then the door-bell rang. Running out in the hall and leaning over the balusters, I heard James say, as if in answer to some request, 'Yes, sir, I will send the flowers up to Miss Simpson immediately.' Then the door closed and I, of course, thinking the person, whoever it was, gone, ran down to take the flowers from the servant. Hearing a slight noise in the front parlor, and thinking he had gone in there for something, I entered very eagerly, with—'Where are the flowers, James? who sent them?' when lo! to my horror and amazement, standing by the centre-table with a book in his hand was the elegant and stylish Mr. Esmonds. O Emily, just imagine it! There I stood, facing him, in a tumbled, frowzy morning wrapper, with eyes almost starting out of their sockets, face I'm sure as red as a Giant of Battle rose, and my head bristling all over with crimping-pins, looking precisely like an angry porcupine! My lord turned pale from astonishment, and cast his aristocratic eyes slowly over me; then I flew from the room and raced up stairs. It seems that after leaving the bouquet the gentleman had gone to the parlor in quest of 'Lucile,' which I had promised him. I certainly never looked better than at Mrs. Archer's that night; wore my pink tarletan and prettiest laces with tuberose in my hair, which, by the way, was as wavy and fascinating as possible. But the charm was broken. I think the pink tarletan and stylish chignon were entirely overshadowed by the picture which existed in Mr. E.'s imagination of the dowdy little fright in the tumbled gown and vicious looking head fixings. I saw that my star had set after his first waltz with you. I might have regained the ground so ignominiously lost but for that dance, so you see now how you assisted in my destruction! Really," exclaimed the young lady, after pouring forth this lengthy tirade, "I do feel rather tired, but still have sufficient strength left to ask if you do not consider me a very nonpareil of a friend to overlook this conduct on your part, and still honor you with my companionship?"

Emily could not help laughing at this ridiculous narrative, although her cheek did flush up rather hotly at its conclusion, for Harry Esmonds' devotion to herself was too marked to be mistaken, and she knew that on his arrival in New York he had been very attentive to Carrie Simpson. She loved her wild, rattle-brained friend, for she knew what some never suspected, that underneath that gay, thoughtless exterior beat a warm, sincere heart. She did not guess now, though, well as she knew Carrie, that there was an undercurrent of real feeling and wounded pride running through this wild, purposely exaggerated narration. Carrie had really been attracted by the young stranger's handsome person and the dash of insouciance in his manner, and had shown her preference for his society rather too plainly, perhaps, considering that he had not declared himself her suitor. But the unselfish honest girl never once thought of blaming Emily for entrapping one whom she had begun to regard as her lover. Neither did she blame him; he had done nothing dishonorable, and Emily's beauty was certainly dazzling enough to be-witch any man. Emily herself thought nothing about it. She had supposed Carrie only amusing herself by a flirtation with Esmonds, and if he chose to come over to her—Emily's—standard, and swell the list of her adorers, she really felt that she was doing her friend no injustice in accepting his attentions. She was too accustomed to the homage of all who approached her to be flattered much by this new conquest at first; but, without being remarkably intellectual or erudite, he was a thoroughbred, good-looking, dashing youngster; played some on the piano, and sang a fine tenor; besides, he was known to be rich; so Mr. Esmonds was quite the rage in town, and as Emily pretty soon became aware that her new beau was looked upon as a decided catch, she paid more attention to him than she had hitherto done, and ere long found, to her own surprise, that she was rather more interested in the game than she had at first supposed possible. The night before Carrie's visit to her friend, he had called on Emily, and as they sat in the luxurious drawing-room with the gas turned down, and the mellow moonlight streaming in at the deep window, near which Harry had drawn their chairs, he had come very near making a formal declaration. Emily was too experienced in such affairs, had passed through the "trying ordeal" too often, not to be well aware of what was coming, and she very gracefully warded it off by introducing a new topic; but she knew perfectly well that at their next private interview the subject would unavoidably be renewed. She had promised that if she attended Mrs. Anderson's party Mr. Esmonds should be her escort, and this was in reality her reason for staying at home.

The unsophisticated reader must not suppose for an instant that this fashionable young lady of the nineteenth century really desired to ward off so flattering a proposal altogether, in order to save the gentleman the pain of hearing that his ardent love was unrequited. Our grandmothers might have done such a thing; but in this enlightened (?) age when "dirt," "dashing," "fast," are the epithets that young women generally covet, and each one vies with her neighbor in the number of her conquests, of course such a proceeding on Miss Graham's part would have been extraordinary, not to say impolitic. So Emily was simply determined to play with her intended victim a little longer before she listened with well-feigned surprise to his avowal of love, and very sweetly pronounced the little "no" that was to arouse him from his dream of hope and happiness.

This, then, was the state of affairs when Carrie Simpson made her morning call on her confidential friend, Emily Graham, and after this long digression, we return to a snug hiding-place in the lady's superbly appointed sleeping room, where we can conveniently see and hear all that is going on.

"I always keep my choicest bits of information for the finale," Carrie is saying, "so this shall not be an exception to the general rule. You positively must go to Mrs. Anderson's. Do you know that 'Rupert,' the long-wished-for 'Rupert,' is actually arrived at last. He only reached New York yesterday in the 'Ocean Queen,' and of course will be at his sister's to-morrow night. Emma Stone says the party is given in honor of his return. I'm dying to see him! Mrs. Anderson has done nothing all these years of his absence but prate of 'Rupert's' perfections, his wonderful talents, good looks, etc. His history is certainly romantic. He married when only twenty-two a beautiful English girl, and took her immediately to France and Italy, as her health was delicate. Just a year after her marriage this lady, Alice Clare her maiden name was, died, and the young widower was so inconsolable that he turned a deaf ear to the repeated entreaties of his friends that he would come home, and has ever since wandered about the Continent. He is now nearly thirty, if not quite, as 'tis eight years since his wife died."

"You seem to have gotten his entire history by heart, Carrie," laughed her auditor, "and I've no doubt can give me much valuable information yet concerning this Ajax, who is coming home to slay hearts, I suppose, by thousands. Can you tell me?"

"Be silent, miss!" was the undisturbed rejoinder, "and wait till you hear the sequel to all this. Emma Stone is, you are aware, a particular favorite with Mrs. Anderson, and knows all about the family. She also is a disciple of mine, and considers it, I verily believe, her pious duty to regale me with every bit of gossip she hears, so I am as much au fait with the Anderson affairs as she is. Now, I've a plan; I've no doubt this Adonis will come home the most conceited, unbearable travelled monkey imaginable—full of high, foreign notions and French fopperies—shrugging his aristocratic shoulders at American society in general, and American ladies in particular. Now, Emily, wouldn't it be glorious to melt this heart of stone, to bend his stiff neck, and teach him that there's another woman in the world as lovely and lovable as his English choice? You are the very one to bring about this desirable state of affairs. If you cannot touch his heart, it is useless for the rest of us to try; so go you must and shall, to-morrow night, to make a first reconnaissance, and effect a breach in the fortification. Do, Emily, change your mind and go. Seriously, it will be such fun to see Marion Hennegan and Kate Howard angling for this rare fish, that I would not miss it for anything."

"If you so ardently wish it, Carrie, perhaps I may change my mind, and go to take a peep at this admirable Crichton; but as to breaking his heart, you know I have always said, and intend solemnly to keep the vow, that I would never marry a widower. I think it absolutely humiliating to be any man's second choice!"

The young lady's emphatic tones and flushed cheeks fully corroborated the sincerity of this assertion, but Carrie laughed incredulously, as she said, "Wait until you've seen Mr. Alston. If he's only half as handsome as the picture of him in Mrs. Anderson's gallery, I'm afraid I'd not have the moral courage to say 'no' if he had been married as many times as Blue Beard instead of only once!" with which declaration of her sentiments Miss Carrie drew on her No. 6 kids, walked to the mirror to see that her jockey was tied becomingly, and, kissing her hand to Emily, ran gayly off home.

The half-hour succeeding her visitor's departure was spent by Emily in what she usually denominated "one of her brown studies," the result of her cogitations being a sudden determination to accept Mrs. Anderson's invitation for the next night, even at the risk of bringing the game she was playing with Harry Esmonds to an abrupt termination.

The young lady rang for lights in her dressing-room an hour earlier than usual on the succeeding evening. Perhaps, as her maid assisted in robing her for the occasion, she thought more than once about Carrie's enthusiasm concerning the new arrival, and it is certain that she nearly tormented the maid out of all patience by repeated alterations and suggestions connected with the arrangement of her hair, ornaments, etc., before her fastidious taste assured her that nothing was wanting to complete the perfection of her toilet. Her appearance, as she gazed in the full-length mirror, was sufficiently gratifying, for a proud smile curved her lip at the stately, satin-robed figure it reflected. Emily was very beautiful, and she knew it. She had been told so ever since she was old enough to understand what it meant, and when she grew up and went into society, she became at once a reigning belle. This was only her second winter out, but even in this short time her naturally sweet disposition and unselfish nature were becoming spoiled by the constant atmosphere of flattery and adulation in which she lived. She had awakened too early to a knowledge of her beauty and its power, and depended too entirely on that to win the love of those around her, forgetting the priceless, immortal jewel which was daily becoming stained and marred, while the beautiful but frail casket which enshrined it was constantly idolized and adored. Her mother had been a pure, gentle, Christian woman, and from her Emily had inherited many lovely and attractive traits of character, which under favorable circumstances might have developed into beautiful maturity; but, unfortunately for her child, this mother had died several years before, while Emily was off at boarding-school, where she remained until her graduation, which took place with high honors, when she returned to New York, the petted idol of her father, to preside over the elegant home to which he proudly welcomed her, the only other inmate of the house being a cousin, Fanny Ellis, who had been given a home by Mr. Graham. So the star, par excellence, of society, no less than of her home, unaccustomed to the denial of a single wish, witty, accomplished, and very pretty, the elements of true womanhood which the girl really possessed were in danger of total extinction, and she was even glorying in the reputation she had lately won of being the most practised flirt and thorough coquette in her circle.

Beautiful she certainly was as she finished her toilet this evening by clasping around her neck and arms a set of glittering rubies, and murmuring, almost involuntarily: "Marry a widower, indeed! what supreme folly!" swept haughtily from the room and down the broad stairway to take the arm of her escort, who was waiting to hand her to the carriage. The first person she met, after paying her respects to the hostess, was Carrie, who seized her arm eagerly, saying:—

"Have you seen him? Now, you needn't pretend ignorance; of course, you know I mean Mr. Alston. There he is, talking to a prosy little chit, just out of bibe, I believe. The girls say he's distingué, and I suppose he is, but still I'm disappointed. Positively his skin is yellow; maybe it's caused by the suns of Italy, or, perhaps, he's sick. I hope so, at least, for in either case, I suppose, it will improve. See! he is taking the young lady out for a promenade. Do observe her, Emily," was added, sotto voce. "She looks as though she had suddenly been translated to the society of the angel Gabriel, judging from the ecstatic way in which she is casting up her eyes, and trying to put on the seraphic. Now, it is too bad, when I had planned that you should be the sun around which this new planet should revolve the entire evening, for him to be wasting himself on poor little Anna Barksdale, who has only intelligence enough to walk through a cotillon, and if he talks to her about la belle France, would as soon ask him if he had ever danced that 'heavenly German' with the empress as anything else. Have patience, dear; Mrs. Anderson will bring about an introduction shortly, I am confident, and then I shall secure a good stand of observation, and watch the commencement of the campaign."

Still later in the evening, during a pause in the waltzing, when the lady of the house approached with her brother, and, after a smiling introduction, left them alone, Emily remembered Carrie's threat, and it caused her to treat the new-comer with even more than her accustomed hauteur. "He shall not think me at all impressed by his numerous perfections," she mentally resolved, yet she found herself, at the end of half an hour, yielding to the charm of her entertainer's voice and manner.

He was, in spite of Carrie's disparaging remarks, a handsome man; not so, perhaps, to the careless, indifferent observer, who looked merely to regularity of feature and stateliness of person, but there was about him an air of superiority, not conceitedness or arrogance, Emily was forced to admit, but conscious, innate power and will to do and dare anything; and yet, as she glanced curiously up in his cool, dark blue eyes, she felt very sure that the "anything" would only be what was noble and honorable. He was not at all pedantic; did not mention his travels once, but talked pleasantly about books, music, and the latest art celebrities. He was sounding her depth, Emily thought, indignantly, and piqued out of her usual proud indifference, she exerted herself to talk well, in which she certainly succeeded, as the rather bored look, which his good manners could not entirely banish from the gentleman's face, gradually gave way, and his eyes lighted up with more animation than they had shown since his entrance into the rooms. And Emily, too, to her surprise, found herself deeply interested in discussing subjects very alien to the gay scene before them, actually forgetting for awhile her passionate love of dancing in listening to this stranger, who, she remembered with vexed perplexity, had not once during the evening asked her to dance. Once, however, in the midst of an animated talk about some new and favorite poem, the band commenced a Strauss waltz, and Emily stopped abruptly, saying, eagerly:—

"How glorious! Do you not waltz?" Then, blushing scarlet at his amused smile, as he answered "No," she half in pique accepted the invitation of her escort, Harry Esmonds, who was loitering near, looking daggers at the polished stranger, who was engrossing so much of the attention of his lady love.

The waltz was over, and Emily, flushed and exhilarated by an exercise of which she was passionately fond, would have continued dancing; but her partner, with a nervous trepidation he vainly endeavored to conceal beneath his usual gay, laughing exterior, drew her away from the merry throng, through the hall and spacious library, on to the dimly-lighted, exquisitely-arranged conservatory. It was entirely vacant; the first notes of delicious music from the band had drawn away the few couples who had been attracted there by the perfect seclusion and fairy-like beauty of the place, and now the faint tinkle of the fountain, as the waters dripped slowly on the marble, alone awoke the stillness, and the creamy cape jessamines and stately oleanders flung their tropical perfume on the warm air all unheeded and unappreciated.

"It is so deliciously cool here," Harry said, lightly, striving to overcome his embarrassment, and wear at least the semblance of composure, while he told the beautiful creature by his side the sad havoc she had made in his heart. But failing utterly, and not daring to touch even one of the small hands crossed so idly on her lap, he commenced a hurried story of his love. It was love, warm, sincere, manly, with which she had inspired the generous, impassioned Southerner, deeper far than she had supposed him capable of feeling, and when he paused and waited for an answer, with his handsome, hopeful face upturned to hers, Emily found it a harder thing than she had supposed to tell him that his appeal was hopeless.

But an answer must be given. So, raising her dark eyes to his, she very gracefully and becomingly went through the usual formula on such occasions, assuring the gentleman that she felt highly honored by his preference, but regretted very much that his heart had been given to one whose affections were entirely disengaged, and who must very positively decline his flattering proposal. "I hope, however," was the conclusion of her prettily-turned sentence, "that you will still consider me your friend. I am sorry that your unexpected declaration to-night has taught me that I was ever regarded in a warmer light. And, now, will Mr. Esmonds be kind enough to take me back to the drawing-room?" So, rising very quietly and carelessly, without another glance at the dismayed face by her side, she took his proffered arm, and walked back to take her acknowledged place as queen of wit and beauty among all the moving, sparkling throng who crowded the saloons of the fashionable Mrs. Anderson. Strive as she would to throw it off, however, the remembrance of the pained, surprised look on Esmonds' face, as she answered his passionate appeal, clung to her the whole evening; and her own unwomanly, nay, criminal trifling, in purposely winning, only to cast from her as a broken plaything, a heart like this, never appeared so distasteful to her before. "Unexpected declaration!" Once during the evening, while standing near Mr. Alston, these words recurred to her, and a hot, bright glow rushed to her cheeks as she thought what would his opinion—this stranger's, whom, in spite of her preconceived determination to dislike, she yet felt to be a specimen of true manhood—be of her could he know the pitiful falsehood she had uttered. Altogether, Miss Emily Graham's evening at Mrs. Anderson's was not so pleasant as she had anticipated.

Just one month from this time Emily Graham and Carrie Simpson were again en tête-à-tête. Carrie had dropped in "for a second" as she was passing, she said, simply to give her "a rap" on account of the "high game" she had been carrying on. "Don't you talk any more, Miss Graham, of not caring to catch a widower! Oh, no! you would not even con-descend to flirt with a member of the despised fraternity! And yet for a whole month you've done nothing but ride, walk, and talk with Mr. Rupert Alston. Your doings have kept me in a constant state of excitement and expectation. Even the children seem to understand that I am undergoing mental tortures about something in which you are concerned, and every day salute me with something of this kind: 'Carrie, I met Miss Graham and Mr. Alston just now on the avenue;' or 'Mr. Alston took Miss Emily out to the park to-day, he seems very devoted.' What does it all mean? Do you intend to 'marry a widower' after all? If so, my love, I'd advise you by all means not to settle in New York, as the girls have all heard you express your opinion on this subject, and would positively die laughing at such an inglorious renunciation of your old principles. Tell me all about it, dear. Are you flirting, or is your heart really interested at last? Don't be offended at my straightforwardness, Emily; like Rosa Dartle, I only 'ask for information.'"

A very deep crimson overspread Emily's face. "Really, Carrie," she said, haughtily, "I do not acknowledge your right to question me in this manner. Of course, it is utterly preposterous to use my name in connection with a gentleman whose acquaintance with me dates only a month back."

"Of course," quoted Carrie, merrily, not in the least disconcerted by this unexpected reply. "Well, good-by, most reverend madam. I shall expect soon to hear that you have renounced the pomps and vanities of this sinful world, and started out with the widower on a tour to the Feejee Islands to distribute tracts to the natives. Adios!"

Long after Carrie had left her, Emily sat thinking, with crimson cheeks and flushing eyes, of their conversation; and now in solitude she asked herself did she really feel interested in this grave, quiet stranger, who had so lately come in their midst? The blood on her cheek deepened painfully as she was compelled to admit the truth. His earnest manly nature and superior intellectual endowments, above all, his pure and consistent Christianity, had awakened a deeper interest in her heart than she was willing to confess even to herself. In the weeks that had elapsed since their first meeting she had been thrown with him nearly constantly, and, as memory ran back now over these scenes, she felt, yes, she was sure that her beauty and accomplishments had exerted a powerful influence upon his heart.

He had been attracted at first by the girl's striking beauty, but soon her cultivated taste and bright talent surprised and fascinated him; and his own nature was so sincere and truthful, that, involuntarily, when with him Emily had in very shame checked the trifling, frivolous manner, her passport in society, and allowed him only to see the lovely and winning traits of her character. The consequence was that Rupert Alston, the fastidious, reserved, and exclusive student, he who had thought his heart dead, his best affections hidden away with the lost love of his youth beneath the flowers of sunny France, found himself loving with all the intensity of his ardent nature, this beautiful fascinating creature, as perfect a picture to look at certainly as a person need wish for, but evidently, and positively a thorough coquette.

That evening Emily had promised to accompany Mr. Alston to a concert, but she mentally resolved to write an excuse and remain at home. She did this with an indefinable sensation that it was better not to trust herself too much with him, as she was fully determined to crush out this love that was springing up with such quick growth in her heart. Marry him she had resolved she never would, no matter how strongly inclination might urge such a thing. Judging from the well-known strength of will and determination Miss Graham possessed, matters certainly did not look favorable for our friend Mr. Alston.

So after tea the young lady took herself off to the large old library, and ensconcing herself comfortably in a reading-chair, took up a volume of Mrs. Browning lying on the table near her, and idly turning over the leaves, she was arrested by that exquisite little poem, "Loved Once." She read it carefully over, then again and again, and fell into a long reverie, only broken at last by a quick pull at the door-bell, and hurried footsteps coming quickly down the corridor toward the library. It was not too late to retreat, so springing up and pulling aside the heavy curtain which concealed an arched doorway between this room and a smaller one, her father's special sanctum, she escaped thence to the hall, and ran up stairs to her own chamber. "Tell Mr. Alston I am unwell and cannot receive visitors to-night," she said, imperiously, to the servant who rapped at her door a moment afterwards; but the man replied, respectfully, "Mr. Alston begs to see you if only for a moment," and the girl, biting her lip with a feeling of scorn or exultation, she did not know which, walked to the mirror, and looked fixedly at the regal figure it reflected.

She had never looked more radiant than to-night in her home dress of garnet merino, made perfectly plain and relieved only at the white-curved throat by a dainty lace collar, confined by a small gold clasp. "Passably good-looking!" was her audible comment; then she went down to receive her visitor in her own careless, queenly manner, slightly bowing as she entered the room, without seeming to notice his outstretched hand.

"I beg that you will be generous enough to pardon my intrusion," he said, courteously; "the servant told me that you were slightly indisposed; but I ventured to presume on our friendship and beg a short interview, as I leave town to-morrow to be absent several weeks. I have brought a last bouquet and the new work we were speaking of lately. You must give me your opinion of it when I return."

Emily was rather ashamed of the cool reception she had given her guest, who after all might not think of her except as a friend, so she thanked him cordially for the exquisite flowers, as she bent her head to inhale their delicate perfume, and then asked him to be seated.

"If I am not intruding," he said, and Emily, on answering "No," soon found herself chatting in the frank, easy way into which they had fallen, and which was so delightful to her.

"And so you love Mrs. Browning?" he said, presently, taking up the dainty blue and gold volume, and turning over the leaves idly as Emily had done. "I am glad you admire her; she is certainly one of the noblest, truest poets that this or any other age has produced."

"Yes," Emily replied, "I love her very much, especially some of her shorter poems. 'Aurora Leigh' I admire less than very many of those simple little pieces which perhaps a majority of her readers overlook, or undervalue. I have heard that you are a fine reader, Mr. Alston; will you oblige me by reading aloud this little poem, one of my choicest favorites. I am sure you will enjoy it, it is so beautiful!" and Emily pointed to the lines she had read, called "Loved Once."

She had given him this purposely, wishing to note the effect of the touching words upon him, and see if indeed he still lingered fondly over the memory of his dead wife. He read beautifully, and Emily sat entranced, with the glow from the coal-fire lighting up the crimson of her dress and lending an additional color to her cheeks; listening almost dreamily to the deep, flexible voice of the reader, as the sad, earnest words fell from his lips. Was he thinking of the fair girl sleeping in her lonely grave far across the blue ocean? else why did his voice tremble and grow husky as he read:—

"Of those who sit and love you up in heaven, Say never 'We loved once.'"

Or why did he pronounce with such passionate earnestness the last line:—

"They never loved, who dream that they loved once."

In her secret heart she honored and respected him for cherishing thus the memory of the dead, and yet, as he laid the book down, it was with a feeling of dull, dreary pain that she said, looking up in her old impulsive way, "You believe, then, in first and only love?"

"No," he answered, while the swarthy hue of his cheek caught something of the fire which burned on the girl's, "this is not my belief, neither, I think, did the authoress mean to convey such an impression. She means that if we once love a person fondly and truly, that love becomes part of our being, incorporated into our very nature. A new inspire another worship equally pure and ardent as the first; but still the old love remains; still fills up the niche we gave it long ago in the inner chamber of our heart," he went on, musingly, tenderly, as though he had almost forgotten her presence; "we may love one very devotedly, and God may take her from us. In time the wound may heal, and we may take another to our heart. But the old love is not crushed—love is infinite, and need not, should not confine itself to one object. One link in the chain of our affection may be on earth, another is drawing us to heaven."

Emily sat motionless, only the deep crimson which had now covered her entire face and the bright sparkle of her eye betrayed the least agitation.

The gentleman rose and walked to the window, looking out at the cold gleam of the wintry stars. If he had felt any agitation before, he very effectually crushed it during the second he stood there, for, turning presently, he resumed his seat by Emily, and said, quietly enough: "Miss Graham, six months ago I never thought to tell another woman what I tell you now. I came back from Europe a weary, dispirited man, with all the freshness and sparkle of life gone. But I met you and loved you—not better than my lost Alice—that could not be; but with a love equalling that which I gave her. Will you give yourself to me, and let us try together to lead a better, purer life than our past has been? This endless round of dissipation is not your proper sphere; you cannot develop the higher, holier traits of your character in this hollow, artificial atmosphere. Will you come with me, Emily, and let us learn together what a true life is?"

Emily had trembled excessively while he was speaking, but now she lifted up her proud, graceful head to meet the gaze of the handsome face beside her, and cool and cuttingly clear came her answer—it was very much what she had told Harry Esmonds. She thanked Mr. Alston for the honor he would confer on her, but it was her intention to remain single for a number of years yet. "I know very little about love, except theoretically; believe I am entirely fancy free; but even were this not the case, I could not accept and return the love of one who had given his earliest and best love to another, and then brought the ashes of his heart to me. I trust you will understand that my answer is irrevocable when I say that I could never marry a widower!"

The tender, eager light that had glowed upon the gentleman's face but a moment before died out, and a scornful smile curved his lips, as the girl, with voice that her firm will kept steady, replied. He seemed about to answer in the same tone, but checking himself, bowed to his companion, simply saying, "If this be your answer, I have the honor to say good-evening!" and was gone.

The tiny marble clock on the low mantel chimed hour after hour, and still Emily sat before the fire in the silent library. What had she done? Why did the world seem suddenly so black and cold, and her heart rise up in such angry rebellion at the restraint she had put upon it? She had accomplished the secret intention formed as long ago as Mrs. Anderson's party—had captured the catch of the season, and better still, greater triumph than all, had rejected him! had rejected him, too, in a style that must have lowered his high pride considerably. Emily tried to console herself with all this, but it was a miserable failure; here, with only God and her own conscience for monitors, she felt the false part she had acted. Yes, she loved him; nothing but her strong, imperious will had sustained her through the interview. How grandly he had looked and spoken when bidding her good-by—how different from the perfumed, kid-gloved exquisites who fluttered around her at parties and operas. She felt keenly how true his words were when he said her present life was unworthy of her. And now, when the opportunity was past forever, she felt how blessed and sweet companionship with him would be—how association with such a man would beautify and ennoble her whole life. And for what had she done this? His family was unexceptionable, his fortune large, and himself all that the most fastidious could wish. She had rejected him simply because she had often declared to her gay companions that she would never marry a widower! and was afraid of their ridicule, although she well knew that not one of them but would eagerly accept so rich a prize. Pride with Emily was the prevailing characteristic, and now that the wrong step was taken, the error committed, she determined, with her usual stoicism, to calmly accept the consequences, even if her heart perished in the struggle. She had taken her rôle, and would faithfully act it out. She had told Mr. Alston that she did not care for him, and he should never know how untrue she had spoken. Other persons had conquered love as deep and strong as hers, and she could do the same.

Did Miss Emily Graham really know what a powerful foe she was entering the lists against?

The year succeeding Emily Graham's rejection of Rupert Alston passed away rapidly in the swift whirl of city life, and in all this time she had not seen him. He had gone to a small estate of his in the northwestern part of the State, and was there giving his attention to farming, so his sister said. "It was queer for Rupert to bury himself from society, but he never cared much for that; and besides he wrote that the scenery around his new home was beautiful enough to compensate for everything else." So said Mrs. Anderson, and society laughed, for it knew very well what was the cause of Mr. Alston's retirement.

And how fared it with Emily? To-night is the anniversary of her last interview with the man whom she had so scornfully refused, and again we find her in the handsome, quiet library. The coal fire burns radiantly; the antique lamp sheds a soft mellow light on the well-filled book shelves and luxurious furniture, illuminates the rare old pictures on the walls, and falls caressingly on the fairest picture of all, the queenly girl sitting listlessly by the table. Her black hair is arranged as fashionably and elaborately as ever, her dark eye gleams as bewitchingly, the bright color glows as brightly on the smooth cheek, and dyes as exquisitely the curved, proud lips, but Emily is changed. As she sits lounging back in the rich velvet reading-chair, there is an air of intense weariness and languor about her, a passive listlessness, wonderfully different from the bright, piquant gayety of a year before. The world said she was changed; the girls especially pronouncing her deplorably altered; "Positively she is losing all relish for her old pastime of flirting." But the gentlemen declared Miss Graham perfectly irresistible, compared her to a clouded star, etc.

"You may say what you please, Carrie," her brother John said, one day, when his sister was bewailing Emily's "mopishness," "whatever style she affects, whether it be to carry on a flirtation during one of those slow, heavenly waltzes which Hoffman's band gives us sometimes (by the by, how gloriously she does waltz), or kneel with such saintlike, inimitable grace at Trinity on Sundays, where she looks as Madonna-ish as though she never drove a man to suicide or the bottle in her life, she does it all with an air that not one of you can equal, nor a court belle in all Eugenie's train surpass. If she wants to run all New York mad, however, she had best keep up her present pensive, angelic cast a little longer. I wonder if this melancholy be real or only a charming feint?"

"I don't know," answered Carrie; "but Emily has certainly never been like her old self since Rupert Alston left town so unceremoniously last winter. He was certainly desperately in love with her, and I fancied once that she liked him. Perhaps that time she carried her old game once too far, and Mr. Alston may have found her out, and turned the tables on her."

"Nonsense," scouted John, "she kicked him tremendously—everybody knows that. I could have told him before he put his head into that trap that he couldn't carry the game through. I'd heard her say too often how intensely she disliked his brotherhood."

Mr. John Simpson would not have thought Miss Graham's dislike to widowers so very intense, after all, could he have seen her to-night as she sits in the library reading with such tender, love-brimming eyes, "just the soul's sweetest overflow," the little poem treasured so zealously in her heart since the night twelve months before, when the voice she so longed for now had invested the tender words with such thrilling beauty: "They never love who dream that they loved once." How passionately her heart echoed the passionate words. The fire of this wild, hidden love, which none ever suspected, had burst out, swept away the artificiality and selfishness about her. A true, pure love poured out upon a worthy object will refine and etherealize any character; it was just the thing to arouse all the woman in a girl like Emily. She had tried, battled faithfully, to put this passion down. Her proud nature chafed under it, but the conquering god whom we call Love had entered in and taken possession of her heart. Strive as she might to put him out, he retained his throne and laughed her efforts to scorn. Her haughty pride had at last found its superior, and Emily knew it.

While she sits musing to-night, a servant enters with a letter. She broke the seal, and, glancing over the first few lines, found it to be a Valentine, a sentimental affair from one of her admirers. She read it over, and was about to throw it carelessly aside, when a bright thought seemed to strike her. She had been the erring one, she had acted the false heart, why should she not throw aside conventionality and make a step toward reconciliation? For once pride should bend to love. So, seizing pen and paper, she wrote off the following lines, knowing that Mr. Alston would recognize her hand, and understand the motives with which she wrote. Here it is:—

"Let us be friends again;
Life is so short,
There is so much of pain
Filling the heart.
"Life—it is sad enough,
Love as we may,
And the way dark and rough
Even 'neath its ray.
"Youth—it fades swift away,
Like a bright dream,
Or a bright summer's day
Horne on time's stream.
"Then let us be friends again;
Time will not wait—
Oh! let us be friends again
Ere 'tis too late."

Emily read the simple lines over, hesitated, blushed, got nervous, but finally folded and placed them in an envelope, directing to Rupert Alston, Esq., New York, then pulled the bell rope, and directed John to take the letter to the post.

"Mr. Alston, to see Miss Graham," was the message delivered by Annette, Emily's smiling maid, a few days afterward, as Emily was lounging away an hour in her chamber, starting nervously at every peal of the bell.

Now that he was coming, she felt the awkwardness of her letter. Would he think her unwomanly?

sumed the same air of haughty indifference with which he had told her good-by. She hesitated long at the drawing-room door, but at last turned the knob, and, summoning all the firmness she could, walked into the room. She was extremely embarrassed; the hand she gave him was very tremulous, but he held it fast, and, looking down at the bowed head, said in the same tones that had thrilled her once in the library:—

"Emily, what am I to think? Do you revoke the decision you gave me one year ago? May I hope that after all you do care something for the man you so disdainfully sent from you then? 'Let us be friends again,' you say, but that will not do. I claim a dearer title still. Will you give it me?"

And Emily, with the bright blood flooding all her fair face, and her radiant eyes filled with a tender, happy light that had never lingered in their depths before, placed her hand in his, and said: "Anything you wish." And so the proud belle of New York was won.

"To think," said Carrie Simpson, indignantly, "that Emily Graham should after all marry a widower. I should think she'd be ashamed to look at me. But she was as lovely a creature at her bridal in white satin and lace as I ever beheld, and the groom was as far gone in love as if he had not taken the same vows upon him before. I don't know, ma, what I shall do without Emily. She says after they get back from their tour they are going to that little place of his somewhere in the backwoods, I believe. I asked Emily how she could possibly give up Delmonico's and the Park, but she smiled, and said she thought she could stand the separation. Well, there's one comfort—Harry Esmonds is certainly returning to his old allegiance. And, now that la belle Emily is flown, in spite of dim recollections of crimping-pins, I think he will propose. I shall live among the magnolias of Louisiana yet, ma."

TIME AND MONEY.—Many people take no care of their money till they have come nearly to the end of it, and others do just the same with their time. Their best days they throw away—let them run like sand through the fingers as long as they think they still have an almost countless number of them to spend; but when they find their days flowing rapidly away, so that at last they have very few left, then they will at once make a very wise use of them; but, unluckily, they have by that time no notion how to do it.—Garfield.

A CUP OF RIO COFFEE.

IN 1710 a coffee shrub was sent from the Dutch East Indies to Amsterdam, and planted in the botanical gardens of that city. From this a shoot was sent to Louis XIV. and placed in the Jardin des Plantes. This succeeded beautifully, and from it slips were sent by M. Isambert for the garden at Martinique; but both the slips and Isambert died on the way. In 1720, however, three shrubs, which had been produced in the Royal Botanical Gardens of Paris, were sent to the same destination by Captain Declieux. The voyage was long and tedious, and two of the plants died in transit. The ship's company was put on a small allowance of water, and the captain generously shared his quarte each day with his remaining cafter, and so succeeded in getting it to its destination. From this single plant have resulted all the myriads of coffee plantations of the West Indies and of Central and South America.

In 1754 a Franciscan friar, by the name of Villaso, placed a coffee plant in the garden of the San Antonio Convent at Rio de Janeiro. In 1809 the first cargo of coffee was sent out.

The three great coffee-growing provinces of Brazil are, stated in the order of their production, Minas Geraes, San Paulo, and Rio de Janeiro. And it is our purpose to make a short trip into the interior of this greatest of all coffee-growing regions of the world.

We suppose ourselves already landed at the city of Rio de Janeiro. Being too late to start to-day, we take rooms at the Exchange Hotel, kept by a most respectable Englishman. We can, however, glance at some features of the coffee trade as it appears in Rio. Our hotel fronts to the southward on Rua Direita, the principal business thoroughfare of the city. As we descend to the street we find ourselves amid the bustle of the business centre of this great metropolis of South America. Turning our faces eastward, a few steps bring us to the Praca do Commercio (the Merchant's Exchange), and adjoining this the Alfandega, or Custom House. At both these establishments all business is transacted between nine A. M. and three P. M. No vessel is allowed to discharge or take in cargo before or after. At the Custom House three or four cargoes of coffee are cleared almost every day, having paid a moderate export duty to the government. Negro drays (each a cart with five stalwart Africans pulling, pushing, and shouting at the top of their voices), mule carts, omnibuses, and hacks are all mixed up in apparently inextricable confusion. But above all the confusion of Rua Direita a stentorian chorus of voices is heard "responding in quick measure to the burden of a song."

Casting our eyes in the direction whence comes this measured succession of musical grunts, we see above the heads of the multitude "a line of white sacks rushing around the corner of Rua de Alfandega" (Custom House Street). Elbowing our way through the crowd, we discover that each of these sacks is borne on the head of "a living ebony Hercules." This is a train of Brazilian coffee carriers. They go in companies of a dozen or twenty each, of whom one selected as captain takes the lead. Their only dress is a short pair of pants, reaching from the waist to the middle of the thigh—the limbs and body being left to the fullest and freest play of the muscles. Each has upon his head a bag of coffee weighing five arrabas, or one hundred and sixty pounds; and they move on a measured and rapid trot, keeping step with the double-quick time of some wild Ethiopian ditty. In perfect accord with this we have heard a strange, rattling music, which we now perceive proceeds from an instrument resembling exactly the mouthpiece of an ordinary watering-pot. This is partly filled with gravel, corked up, carried in one hand, and rattled in the time of the ditty, in a style resembling that in which a negro barber plays his whisk, or an auctioneer's boy rings his bell.

The strength of spinal column and the amount of neck muscle that these coffee carriers develop are truly astonishing. We have seen one of them carry on his head a full-sized crate of crockery; and another carry from Rua Direita to the summit of Corcovado (a distance of three miles, and a height of two thousand eight hundred feet), over a rugged mule path, a box containing a ham, a turkey, a leg of mutton, a roast of beef, ten loaves of bread, two dozen of claret, two dozen of ale, two dozen dinner-plates, three large meat dishes, a coffee-pot, coffee cups and saucers, tumblers, knives and forks, napkins, etc., by way of breakfasting and dining a party that made the ascent by moonlight, one fine morning, in order to see the god of day come up from his morning bath in the old Atlantic.

From the time the coffee reaches Rio until it is stowed away in the hold of the vessel, it is all handled and carried by these coffee carriers, and all in sacks of one hundred and sixty pounds each.

After dinner and a turn up Rua do Ouvidor, which is at once the Rue Vivienne, Regent-street, Broadway, Chestnut Street, and Montgomery Street of Rio de Janeiro, though neither very broad nor long, we give orders to be called at five, and retire. We are aroused at the appointed hour, and after our almôço, we walk through the city, passing on our way the City Hall, the Mint, the Assembly Building, the Penitentiary, and other prominent public buildings, reaching the depôt of the famous Dom Pedro Segundo railway, at the southwest corner of the city, just as the numerous church and convent bells are ushering in the new-born day.

The first forty miles of the road is in a north-westerly direction, over a level plain, mostly covered with marsh and a coarse, file-toothed grass—the road having little of interest along it after we leave the Palace San Christovao, which is the Emperor's principal residence. This is but three miles out of the city, bordering the railway on the north. The Emperor has a summer palace at Petropolis, thirty-six miles distant, a little above the head of the most magnificent bay in the world.

We hurry along, with few stoppages, until we reach the foothills of the Serra do Mar, or coast range. Thence, in the next forty miles, we make an ascent of four thousand feet, without a single switch-back, the grade being in places three hundred feet to the mile, while some of the curves on the heaviest part of the grade are made to a radius of two hundred and eighty feet. Slowly but steadily we are dragged up, up, up, our "camel-back" engine seeming at times short of breath, and ready to give in. Within these forty miles we are plunged into and thundered through seventeen tunnels, one of which is a mile and a half in length, and cost a quarter of a million sterling. Between these we skirt along, and sometimes over, immense precipices, where we look down into the dizzy depths of the dark and dense Brazilian forests of the ravines and valleys below. As our iron horse stops for food and drink we hear the monkeys and the parrots chattering to each other in an unknown tongue, and the keel-bill and bell bird put in their ringing reply. The old trees are festooned with mosses and decked with the many-hued flowers of the orchideæ (air plants), while the sons of these fathers of the forest are stayed on all sides with the rope-like ipecacuanha, popularly known as cipo in Brazil. Away across the ravine on an opposite slope a sunlit cascade pours its silvery flood into the insatiable depths beneath. We reach the summit at last, where we find an extemporized village of the railroad's creating.

We now start down the western face of the Serras, with brakes down and engine reversed, but for all that going at a frightful degree of speed. Down, down, down we rush, head-foremost, to the banks of the Parahiba, a river which forms the boundary line between the provinces of Rio de Janeiro and Minas Geraes. This mighty railroad was constructed expressly to develop the resources of the interior coffee regions of Brazil, and to bring the fruits of those broad acres to market. Where this road intersects the Parahiba is a great porto de embarque, or shipping depôt of this caminhos de ferro, or railroad.

The mountain air has been bracing, and we are a little tired and much more hungry; so the moment our box is opened we follow the lead of other ravenous ones to the taverna. Even here they have the fashionable hours of eating, and though well in the afternoon we are much too early for dinner, so we must order a segunda almôço (a second breakfast). We are set down to a grilled roach, some jerked beef, black beans, farina, fried potatoes, and the inevitable but ever welcome cup of coffee. This beverage is almost a syrup, and yet as clear as brandy. Brazilians know how to make coffee as well as to produce it. But we have not yet become accustomed to the strong and almost bitter taste of this condensed extract of the berry whose mysteries we have come to explore, so we take our coffee au lait.

Outside the taverna we confront a thousand or more mules, which we are informed have come in laden with coffee from the neighboring province. We make our way to the Estação, where we find piled in every direction thousands of sacks of coffee.

We take a mule each and cross the Parahiba to see where all this comes from. Immediately upon reaching the western shore of the river we are plunged into immense forests of coffee. The trees resemble somewhat the Rhamnus catharticus, or familiar buckthorn, the color, size, and character of the berries being different, and the coffee plant having far less spines. The trees are planted about six or eight feet apart each way, and grow naturally from twelve to thirty feet high, although, for the sake of convenience in gathering the fruit, they are seldom allowed to attain a height of more than ten or twelve feet. This region of country is very hilly, and the soil is light, dry, and silicious, the prevalent opinion being that coffee will not thrive in moist ground. If, however, you shall have time, on your return to Rio, to visit Bennett's, in the valley of the Tijuca, just go up to the bath in a spur of the valley, and you will find growing close by the water-side a café many times larger and more prolific than any we shall see in Minas Geraes.

The shrubs are transplanted with care from the nursery at one year of age, and in two or three years thereafter become fruitful, and will continue to produce two crops per annum for ten to twenty years. An occasional tree bears well for twenty-five or thirty years, and instead of two there are often three gatherings from the same trees during the year. The tree is an evergreen, while the blossoms are a most delicate white, emitting an exquisite fragrance. We find on the same tree, and, indeed, on the same twig, the blossom, the newly-formed berry, the green and matured fruit. When ripe the berry very closely resembles the cranberry in external appearance, though somewhat larger. Each berry contains two seeds or grains of coffee in the centre of the pulp, with their flat sides or faces opposed to each other. Each grain is covered with a tough integument or membrane, and they are additionally separated from each other by a layer of the pulp interposing.

Each tree produces from one to eight pounds of berries, the average being about three pounds. It is now the gathering season, and we see hundreds of negroes in every direction; some shaking the berries upon gathering-sheets spread on the ground—others picking the fruit directly from the trees. A negro will pick about an aroba (thirty-two pounds) of berries per day. These are dried by being spread upon pavements or level tables of ground prepared for the purpose, which pavement or table is called a terrene. These should be sheltered from the sun. As the fruit dries the pulp forms a sort of shell or pod, as we perceive in examining some that have been longer gathered, and which being perfectly dry are now being passed through a coffee huller, a machine in which a fluted roller is closely opposed to a breast-board, between which roller and breast-board the berries are made to pass. The pulp is washed away, leaving the beans free. These are again dried as before, after which the tough membrane is removed by a somewhat similar process with heavy rollers. The chaff is next separated by winnowing; and the coffee is now ready to be bagged and stored, or taken to market.

Coffee, like some other articles of commerce, is greatly improved by age; and for this reason we find immense quantities of it stored for a time, although the difference in market value between the old and new does not pay the interest on the money. Mocha coffee, it is said, will attain its best savor in three years, while Rio, St. Domingo, Laguayra, Maracaybo, Costa Rica, and all other American coffees require from twelve to fifteen years to perfect their flavor.

STRICKEN.

BY MRS. L. F. S.

They say I'm mad! I am not mad!
I'm wild, 'tis true, but wild from grief;
My heart is very, very sad,
And death to me would be relief.

They say I'm mad! Could they but know
The agony that tears my heart,
Or paint the utter, utter woe,
Or even feel the secret smart!

Could they but know that he, to whom
I pledged my heart and hand, had fled;
That death, cold death, had bid him come,
And now he's numbered with the dead,
They would not wonder that I'm wild,
Or even more, that I am mad!
Could they but know how he beguiled,
They would not wonder that I'm sad!

They say I'm mad! And I am mad!
O God of Heaven, God of love!
Grant that I, when life is fled,
May find sweet peace in heaven above.

And, Father, if it be Thy will,
Oh! take me now, say, "Spirit, come,"
That in the grave I'll know no ill,
That grief may perish in the tomb.

* * * * *

'Twas morning then, but now 'tis even;
Her prayer is answered, her spirit's fled,
Her soul has soared above to Heaven,
Her form lies buried with the loved one—dead.

IN AMBUSH.

BY INO CHURCHILL.

"THERE, girls!" said Cousin Susie, as she looked out of the sitting-room window, "it sprinkles, and I know we are going to have a delightfully rainy afternoon. I am heartily glad of it, for I am surfeited with sunshine, and gay dresses, and beaux, and all that sort of thing. Come, let's get our work and see if we cannot accomplish something. The rose-buds on my sofa-cushion will blossom out before I can finish the pansies."

Rather pleased with a change, though it was the usually distasteful one from indolence to industry, all my cousins tripped away to their rooms, and soon flew back again, strewing chairs and tables with bright-colored worsteds, that were to be worked deftly into the coarse canvas, or formed into comforters for their friends. Witty speeches and gay laughter fell from sweet lips, and gleams of crimson and orange shot from taper fingers, and fell in clustering blossoms, amid the fanciful confusion of scattered rose-leaves and tangled mosses.

I sat apart, half gloomily, that my feelings should be so much in harmony with my surroundings, when I had resolved to devote the very next rainy day to an especial purpose. In all my three weeks' visit to my cousin's, not a cloud had obscured the sky before, and it would not seem that there had been occasion for social murkiness, with the six bright happy faces dispensing smiles like sunshine. But somehow, there had gathered a something at my heart, as intangible as the floating morning vapor, that at times seemed to condense and threaten an overthrow at the most unpropitious moments. And I secretly determined on a good cry on the very first day we should not be likely to have company.

My aunt had invited myself and three cousins who lived in a distant city to spend the summer with her and her two daughters, who of course were cousins to us all; and pen would fail to describe the frolicsome times we had thus far enjoyed, or depict what still lay in undeveloped plans, to be successfully carried out in the future.

"Come, Jessie, where's your work?" said Cousin Susie to me, after they had all settled themselves to their liking.

"I am not going to work," growled I, in a most uncompromising tone.

"Oh, well, you lazy thing, go to the library and get the most bewitching book you can find and read to us."

"Or read either," snapped I, provoked that I really wished so much to contribute my share to the general enjoyment.

All the girls looked up in surprise at my unusual display of temper; but, after a few good-natured attempts at railleury, they left me to my own agreeable musings. If they had only teazed me to the border of desperation, my task would have been much easier, and I would have cried from downright anger; but when I rose to leave the room, they called out for me to come back soon, so naturally and kindly, that I had half a mind not to go at all. But, then, my determination! If I let such an opportunity pass unimproved, I might not soon have another, and I did not dare risk such a general inundation as would occur were there not an occasional outlet through which the waters of suppressed feeling might gently flow and prove a fertilizing rather than a desolating power.

Arrived at my room, I locked the door, drew the curtains sufficiently to produce a gloomy light, arranged my chair satisfactorily, and laid out four embroidered and perfumed handkerchiefs, thinking I might as well do the thing genteelly, if at all. My surroundings were certainly depressing enough; everything had taken on a grayish light from the forlorn disposition of the window drapery; even the brightest flowers in the vases seemed gradually sinking out of life, and the more delicate ones had faded away altogether; and Billy, the pet bird, gave a few twilight twitters and folded his wings carefully down, and drew the opaque film over the saucy brightness of his eyes.

I rocked disconsolately to and fro, my handkerchief spread suggestively over my lap, while my feelings obstinately remained at the altitude of a barometer in a summer drought; no threatening cloud or seeming dampness affecting its fixed exalted state. Once or twice I was exasperated to find my lips parted in a sympathetic smile as the merry laughter of my cousins floated up with the fragrant air. They laughed and chatted on, and there I was neglected and forlorn in my own room. The rain outside had degenerated to a miserable drizzle, and really, everything was so wretched! I drew a deep sigh, that set the vine leaves fluttering, and woke Billy from his sweet dream of happy bird-land.

"Let me see," said I to myself, "what was it I meant to cry for, if I ever got a chance? Well, there was the time when that two hundred-weight of assurance and good-nature, namely, Mrs. Lightfoot, planted her number seven with exasperating emphasis on my most cherished and cotton-wrapped corn; but that was all over, and I was too much of a woman to cry for a physical pain that was already passed. Then what superhuman powers of self-control I was obliged to exert when that great awkward Mr. Tompkins upset a dish of oysters all over the front breadth of my delicate and becoming lavender silk. But then I was not so materialistic as to weep for the destruction of a mere earthly garment, after the first involuntary impulse. Let me see," and I rested my chin despondingly on my hand, "I know I came near bursting into a most humiliating flood of tears that night at Clara Alton's party, when my chosen swain passed obliviously by me, and bent over that sickly-looking Antonia De Laney, with her foolish French accent and affected ways. But then Charley had not much stability of character, and only a few straggling whiskers by way of beauty."

"Heigh-ho! I wish I had some onions; it is said, if rightly applied, they will induce humidity under the eyelids; and it does seem as if something ought to be done, for I certainly had enough to cry for. I have not wept in so long, I fear the fountain of tears has dried up, or the cuticle moisture become arid. Ah, yes! I remember in deserts, sometimes, how terrible the reaction is, when the heat becomes intolerant to itself, as it were, and engenders an antagonism that, like the besom of destruction, sweeps everything before it to an exhausting desolation, that leaves no power or wish for life. What if a simoon as swift and sure were lurking in the overwrought tissues of my brain, to burst forth, at length, in a dry, scathing breath, grown fiery and relentless from its very condensation."

I grew alarmed; my feelings must be relieved from their high pressure, cost what it might. So I deliberately conjured up all the sad fancies that could enter one's head; supposed myself cut off in my happy youth from all its enjoyments and pleasures, laid myself wearily out on my dying bed, and became my own chief mourner at my own untimely end. But even in that sad contemplation, my eye caught glimpses of a brightness that left no space for tears. Then one after another I laid my friends low, with an unsparing hand, minutely inspecting each phase of emotion that glanced across my mind, to see if the seed of genuine grief was in it, and, before I knew it, one solitary tear, the result of all my heart-rending, oozed out from beneath my lashes. I let it roll down my cheek without molestation, and experienced a feeling of intense satisfaction as it came in contact with my lips, and I found it was the genuine article—extremely salt, though not particularly bitter. At any rate, the feeling thus produced was a thing to be cherished, and I went assiduously to work at its cultivation, succeeding beyond my wildest hopes; saturating my handkerchief to the last degree of wetness, and resorting at last to my nicely ironed apron.

Oh, how I felt, and how I cried! The unconscious girls below adding every moment to my distress by their mirth and song. Their buoyant life contrasting so strangely and harshly with the five pallid faces upturned for the last sorrowful look in the cypress-wreathed chamber of my imagination. Oh! oh! how dreadful! How could anybody ever laugh again? And I bowed my head once more in an overwhelming torrent of grief. All at once the bird sang out in full joyous tones, and, on looking up, I found the rain had passed away, and the beams of the setting sun were struggling through the curtains. Then I heard the girls prancing through the hall, with exclamations of joy and surprise, that seemed hardly demanded by the reappearance of his scorching majesty.

But I concluded I had cried enough. Uncle would be home to dinner in an hour, and I must not interfere with the family arrangement, that all should be promptly at the table at the second stroke of the bell. And more than this, I began to feel a vacuum in the region of my stomach; not that I was vulgarly hungry, but the load that had been removed from my heart through the pleasant medium of tears, left an unoccupied space, an aching void. So I stretched my handkerchiefs ostentatiously on the towel-rack to dry, bathed my face, brushed my disordered hair to melancholy smoothness, and went down. The family were already seated, and I crossed the room with a rapid step, and dropped into my seat without looking up.

"What is the matter, Jessie, dear?" inquired auntie. "Have you received bad news?"

"No, aunt, nothing at all is the matter," I replied, with a little spasmodic action of the throat.

"Then may I introduce you to the son of my dearest friend, the gentleman we have been expecting, you know? Mr. Arthur Talbot, my niece, Miss Jessie Seymour."

I glanced across the table, encountering a pair of very black, searching eyes, which seemed almost to contradict the few graceful words that issued from beneath the jetty moustache, gave him a little jerking nod in reply, and plunged desperately into the business before me, believing, with Solomon, "that there is a time for all things," and this was the time to eat. I once or twice caught a quiver of Mr. Talbot's eyelids when there was nothing at all to smile at; to be sure he did not once look at me, although he was directly opposite, yet I am perfectly certain he saw every enormous mouthful I swallowed, and could vouch for the six glasses of ice water that followed in quick succession. Perhaps he thought me amphibious, but I did not care. Poor, ignorant man! how should he know of the hydraulic pressure I had been subjected to, or guess of the dripping cambric that attested to my woe, or how like a squeezed sponge I felt, every pore agasp for the hygienic element?

I was just as angry at him as I could be, and much more angry at myself. There had been a playful rivalry carried on among us girls as to the capture of this gentleman. All my cousins had seen him before, and they agreed that he could not be won except by beauty, and, although they affected to despise his love for anything so fleeting, they every one sat about seeing how irresistible they could make themselves. Poor me! The only pretensions I made to beauty were the exceeding fairness and delicacy of my complexion, that Cousin Susie was wont to say "held beneath its tender bloom a blue tracery that seemed like pensive shadows chasing sunny thoughts." There were no shadows lurking there now, at any rate, nothing but the most vivid glow. My one mark of beauty had betrayed me into positive frightfulness; my delicate, sensitive skin having the rasped look consequent upon a condensed influenza, and no orange-flower water of renowned distillation could restore its smoothness. If my complexion had been a good, thick, leather-looking one, it would have withstood any amount of rubbing without a scarifying effect. I'm tired of beauty that's only skin deep. My eyes were my next best feature; they had been called melting by one of my admirers, and I thought the compliment at least based on truth. I could not help wondering if melting ever meant watery, or if water could be disadvantageously diluted.

It did seem as though that meal would never end; everybody had so many witty things to say that the duty of mastication was of slow accomplishment, except in my own case. I might have devoured the younger brother's fatted calf, and then had ample time for digestion. Oh, dear! they did move back at last, and we all adjourned to the cool, spacious parlors. The girls reclined gracefully on sofas or ottomans; I sat erectly on my chair in calm disdain of all the frivolity around. My cousins kindly sought to make me forget myself, and all the ladies and gentlemen, who came in as privileged visitors, politely ignored my doubtful claims to polished society, and endured a considerable degree of snubbing before they left me to myself.

James, the waiter boy, came in and lighted the gas, tuning it down to conversational dimness, and then there occurred one of those awful pauses, consequent upon such a movement, just as my feelings were welling up for another overflow. I did not understand the matter at all. That water I drank must have resolved itself most speedily to tears, or else my cloudiness rivalled the rainiest April in powers of condensation. I would have given the world if I could have escaped from the room; but I was so far from the hall door, and that exasperating Mr. Talbot sat so near that he could see the workings of my face if he should chance to look that way, which, by the by, he did not seem inclined to do. With a great effort I kept my emotion down, until the brilliant conversation was resumed, and then the choking sobs and blinding tears would come. How should I ever cross that room with so many eyes upon me?

I rose desperately and staggered a few steps, when my hand was gently taken and laid on a broadcloth sleeve (you see my wretchedness had not dulled my perceptions), and I was very tenderly supported to the door.

"Poor child!" I heard aunt say; "she must be homesick."

And Miss De Lancie lisped: "How very interesting."

I could have thrown my arms around my companion, whoever he was, for his delicate kindness; but when he led me through the door of escape, Mr. Talbot's voice in sympathizing cadence said: "Good-night, Miss Seymour! I trust you will soon be comforted," I experienced such a conflicting tide of emotions that I feared the result would be fatal.

After awhile Cousin Susie came to my room with a composing draught "Aunt had sent me at Mr. Talbot's suggestion," Susie said. It seemed with all his other accomplishments he was a bit of a doctor. I swallowed it to please my cousin, and, long before the lively group below had separated for the night, I was sleeping like a wilful child, with now and then a sob to tell that, but for exhausted nature, I would be weeping still.

I woke in the morning refreshed, as is the parched earth after a summer shower; every stain washed away, every infectious breath purified, all hint of sorrow or depression overpowered by the new fresh life infused by the gladdening beams of the gloriously inspiring source of light. I could have danced on the sunbeams, or have floated away on a thistle-down, or have been anything bright and beautiful that was happy too. I could not help feeling, as I descended to the breakfast-room, that I was attractive. There is a power in happiness that lends a grace to its possessor that no mere beauty of form or feature can counterfeit. My cousins all came forward with a kiss, and, though they made no allusion to my last night's folly, I felt assured they were most glad to have me back my own cheerful self again.

"Come, girls," said aunt, "we must do our best to make our meal a pleasant one; your uncle and Arthur breakfasted very early, and went trouting."

"Oh, dear!" said Lizzie Archer, "how provoking. I have spent an hour arranging my hair so carelessly that the dark-eyed gentleman would think Nature had her own way with my ringlets. I have a mind to put them all back in papers till he returns."

I am afraid there were a good many sighs smothered under the dainty morning dresses. To me his absence was a relief, if; indeed, I had thought at all about him. But when he did come, late in the morning, looking so wickedly handsome in his becoming sporting suit, with a string of trout, as evidence of his skill in angling, on one arm, and Antonia De Lancie on the other, I felt as angry and disappointed as any one so happy in one's self, and so indifferent as to him, could possibly be.

He gave us a polite greeting in passing, and Miss De Lancie with us, under the drooping, graceful branches of the old willow, while he went to his room "to make himself presentable," he said.

I don't think I did that French Antonia justice when I said she was "sickly looking." She was not to be read through at a glance, I found. She was peculiar in her composition; half French and half Italian, I judge, as she had the accent and versatility of the one, the magnetic eyes and languid manner of the other. Superficial as to beauty and goodness; powerful, penetrating, and profound in all that was evil and designing. She was always a welcome visitor at my aunt's, having spent many summers with one of the village families. But she and I seemed to repel each other, though I could not explain my dislike for her, or tell why my eye always sought hers with that peculiar fascination that leads us to look at that we wish to avoid.

She had not noticed me, except with one of her languid glances, and she was describing in her musical jargon her delightful walk by the trout stream, when she accidentally stumbled upon Mr. Harcourt and the pleasant stranger she had met at our house the evening before. And how, when uncle had been obliged to leave, he left his fishing apparatus with her, begging her not to angle for anything but trout. "As if," she said, with a deprecating motion, and a meaning gleam from her half-closed eyes, "as if I meant to catch anything less classic." French —! There was another word beginning with "f" that I thought of, but I suppose it will not do to use it.

Mr. Talbot's coming out in his fresh white linen suit put an end to her die-away ecstasies. He shook hands with all the other girls, and gave as his excuse for not meeting them at breakfast uncle's desire for his company. Then he looked doubtfully at me, evidently awaiting an introduction.

"Why, you ungallant knight," exclaimed Lizzie Archer, "have you forgotten, or do you not know, the distressed damsel you befriended last night?"

He stepped forward, with a dash of color in his face that was by no means unbecoming, and said: "I beg Miss Seymour's pardon. I acknowledge I was not prepared for so beautiful a transformation."

I disliked him intensely, but he was certainly very graceful in all his ways, and I could do no less than offer him my hand, as he bent his dark eyes upon me.

"Miss Jessie," lisped that Italian-French girl, "perhaps I ought to tell you how great a champion you have; indeed, he established himself autocrat of the evening, and would allow no music after you had left us, lest mirthful tones should not accord with your feelings, and plaintive ones but render you more sad; as tender of your heartstrings, ma belle, as though they were stretched across the lattice for every chance zephyr to try its skill upon."

I cannot undertake to imitate her manner of saying this; no combination of letters could convey the insinuating suavity, the covert sneer, so like the lurking sting concealed in the rich sweetness of the honeycomb. I felt the quick blood deepen in my cheek and neck, as I tried to offer some suitable apology for marring the pleasure of the evening by a want of control over my own feelings. I am afraid I did not succeed very well in expressing myself, for Mr. Talbot took my hand again in a sort of protecting way, as though he expected another outburst, and said, lightly, though his eyes grew dark:—

"I am sure the ladies will agree with me, that but for your absence, and the cause for it, we had no room for regrets; pleasant converse and interchange of thought are oftentimes more sweet than a song that bears on its melody nothing deeper than imaginary bliss."

I am sure I thanked him for so kindly relieving my embarrassment, and I did place him a little nearer on a level with my friends, but even then I could only see his head above the surface of my heart, and I might as well acknowledge, that, save by a sort of protecting courtesy and a spiritual recognition of my presence, that never seemed to fail him, whether he saw me or not, he did not take any particular pains to elevate himself to any higher position in my favor.

Of course he was not our only bean, there were plenty of young gentlemen always ready to escort us everywhere we went, and Miss De Lancey, to the great annoyance of my cousins, always managed to secure Mr. Talbot to herself, and he seemed nothing loth.

I had not half understood her; she seemed to have unemployed capabilities always at command. She could make herself most dangerously beautiful; the peculiar, ambushed lustre of her eye, glittering and changing in serpentine fascination and beauty. The liquid, languishing sweetness of her persuasive tones, growing at times bewildering as the fatal music issuing from poisonous fangs. And then, the gleam of hatred, so deadly in its meaning, that sometimes darted swift as the lightning's shaft from under her half closed eyelids, if ever she felt she was being thwarted in what she had evidently set her wily heart upon, namely, the capture of Mr. Talbot's hand and fortune.

In the few weeks that followed my introduction to that gentleman, I grew absolutely to dread her lightest glance. It seemed to pursue me everywhere like an envenomed barb, that was secretly searching out the seat of life, with its insinuating, imperceptible feathery point. I scarcely felt that I was myself, with that clinging sense of danger that seemed ever ready to close around me, and that other growingly precious sense of protection counteracting the baleful, malignant power, as pure holy spirits restrain by their presence those that are envious and diabolical. I could not see that the others shrank from her, and I did not like to speak of my antipathy. One day I questioned aunt about her. She replied: "They did not know much concerning her, except that she was an orphan, and resided with a relative in New York. Five years ago, while passing through the village, she had been taken very ill, and stopped at Mr. Slade's house as the most convenient, and she had spent some portion of her summers there ever since. She seemed to have a moderate income of her own, and was well educated and accomplished, so there was really no reason why the girls should not associate with her, although she was in some respects a stranger."

The day after this conversation was the one appointed for our horseback ride along the lovely, romantic river-road to a town some fifteen miles distant. We were to start about nine in the morning, and return so that the pleasantest part of the way might be traversed in the shadowy twilight. Not one of the party had anticipated more real enjoyment than myself. I was so fond of the exhilarating exercise, and so loved the wildwood breeze. I hardly slept during the night, so pleasurable were my thoughts of the coming day. I rose before the other girls, and went out to see what promise the morning gave, and found all I could wish, and more, in the clear, soft atmosphere and the cloudless sky. I sat me down on the rustic seat in the garden and sang with the birds my hymn of praise. A rich, deep voice, almost tremulous with its weight of gratitude, took up and repeated the refrain, and I turned to find Arthur Talbot beside me.

I was not well pleased that he should take me unawares; but it was no time for trifling words, with the fragrance of praise fresh on my lips, and I only spoke of the emotions the scene inspired. He seemed absorbed and somewhat troubled, and after a while I asked him if he were ill.

"No," he said, "he had been out since the dawn, and was on his way through the garden to the house to inquire if I had risen."

I looked surprised, as well I might; but he did not immediately make known his wishes, and I revolved in my mind what he could possibly want.

"This is the day for our ride," he said, at length.

"And a most glorious one," I replied. "I feel I can hardly wait for the hour to come. Will it not be delightful?"

"Yes," he said, abstractedly, with a half dissatisfied look.

"Mr. Talbot," said I, suddenly, "you said you were seeking me, and you look troubled; will you please tell me if I can do anything for you?"

Then he told me that his enjoyment of the pure morning air had led him two miles or more from home, and while passing a small house that he had scarce noticed, so hidden was it among the trees, he had heard a wail of distress that wrung his very heart. While he was pausing, uncertain what to do, a woman with a wild, frightened look ran out of the door, and catching hold of his arm, begged him to go for the doctor, as her daughter was dying. Having some knowledge of medicine, he told the woman he was a doctor, and would see what could be done.

He found the daughter, a fragile girl, writhing in paroxysms of pain, the action of some mental anguish, he thought, upon the overwrought physical frame. A vigorous application of some remedies at hand soon restored her somewhat, and he left her under the influence of a mild anodyne. They had only moved to the place that week, were without neighbors or friends. The girl's father had gone back the day before for some articles they had left, and for a woman to assist them; the girl having grown suddenly worse, and the mother incapable of doing what was necessary, as her hands were rendered nearly useless by the rheumatism.

"And now," said Mr. Talbot, looking into my face, "this girl is too frail to survive the effects of a powerful narcotic, and friction is the only thing that will prevent her relapsing into that fearful state again. Of course a woman's hand must administer this treatment. I have been to a dozen places, and I cannot find a woman able to leave her family on so short notice. One promised she would certainly go at dusk to-night. Your aunt, of course, cannot leave her large household, and I confess I was afraid to ask the other young ladies."

I opened my lips to speak, but he smiled, and said:—

"So I came to you. At my first meeting with you I saw enough to learn that there were depths of feeling in your heart that, once stirred, were not easily quieted, and I came to ask if you would undertake the task, should your aunt not disapprove?"

"Most cheerfully," I replied; "but I fear I am not competent. I never acted as nurse."

"In this case nothing is required that you cannot abundantly give, and, even were it otherwise, I should be near to assist you."

"No, no," said I, hastily, "Miss De Lancia will never forgive me if I deprive her of her escort."

He looked a little annoyed. "I was not to accompany her," he replied; "when I found Mr. Channing had forestalled me with the one I wished to invite, Lizzie Archer kindly consented to console my disappointment."

Ah! then he intended to invite me. I am not at all sure I should have accepted his escort, but I felt my face crimson as I bowed my acknowledgments. Lizzie, she had not told who her attendant was to be. He must go now, at any rate; if he and I were both absent, Antonia would place a construction on the fact that would render her more to be dreaded than before, and I'm sure Mr. Talbot had reason for opening his great eyes a little wider than usual when I in a very excited manner begged him not to fail being with the party.

"Go now, please," said I, "and state the case to auntie, but do not enlighten the girls, perhaps it may detract from their pleasure to know the truth. I wish to remain here a few moments, and then I will come."

He rose and went a few steps, then came back, as if intending to say something more, but his usual command of words seemed to fail him, for he only said, "Miss Jessie," took my hand a moment, as he bent his dark eyes upon me, then turned and walked rapidly toward the house.

Oh, dear! I could not help sighing a little over my disappointment, and a little selfish thought shot guiltily across my mind, "If he had only asked some of the rest." My foolish fit of weeping that miserable night had betrayed me into no end of trouble. Then I thought of the sick girl confined in her room this lovely day, and soon grew to feel that my sacrifice was very light compared with her actual suffering. I took a slip of paper from my pocket, and wrote a short note of apology to Mr. Channing. I did not compassionate him much; he could now devote himself to Lottie Abbot's friend who came yesterday, and won so many of his admiring glances.

At the breakfast-table nothing was talked of but the beauty of the day and the proposed ride. Every possible pleasure and advantage was discussed and enlarged upon. Mr. Talbot did not enter very largely into the conversation. I was conscious he was reading the expression of my countenance, "always too speaking," my friends said. I'm afraid once my lip quivered a little when Susie turned to me, and asked "if the prospect rendered me speechlessly happy."

After the meal was over, they all ran to their rooms, although they had full two hours to make their toilets. Aunt and I talked the matter over a little, while Mr. Talbot went for the carriage. He lifted me in, after me a large basket, which, he said, "held my provisions; everything was in disorder at the house where I was going, and it was important that my strength should not fail." He made me promise to take the cordial his own hands had prepared for me.

To hide my embarrassment, I ventured to ask him "why he had not become a physician, he took such an interest in all who fell under his care?"

"It was for that reason I abandoned the study. I had not the courage to witness so much suffering that I was powerless to relieve."

"But as a lawyer you see suffering, only in a different form, perhaps?"

"True, true, we may see sorrow everywhere, if we but open our eyes, and I do not shrink from doing what I can to alleviate it. But I never can forget the look I saw in a mother's eyes when I accompanied a physician to the bedside of a sick child. Death had put his signet on the infant brow before the doctor was called; but the look of reproach the poor woman gave him, as it breathed its last before our eyes, haunted me for months, and I changed my course of study."

Even now it seemed he could not speak of it without pain, for, as I looked through my tears at him, I saw his eyes were misty. How tender and kind he was! Strange I did not like him better. When we arrived at the house, and I saw the frail being I had come to comfort, my selfish regrets all vanished. "Poor gentle thing! dear, broken lily!" I could not help saying, as I involuntarily kissed the pure brow.

The effects of the anodyne were passing off, and she opened her eyes, so like wet violets in their shadowy depths, and smiled faintly upon me. Mr. Talbot felt her pulse, gave me the necessary directions, said he would come for me at twilight, if I still insisted on his leaving.

I bid him go, and not allow a thought of me to mar his pleasure. I dropped my eyes quickly under his gaze. What was there in his eye that made me tremble so? I must overcome my foolish fear of him. I had no more time to think of myself or him that busy day. All my powers were called in requisition to care for the sick one, while her mother, in her clumsy, almost helpless way, endeavored to make the house seem more home-like.

They did not seem so very poor, only stricken. There seemed abundant provision for their comfort, they only lacked the power to realize it. The woman was grateful in her manner toward me, but very reticent. She only said they had come from New York to the country that Mattie might have change of air and scene.

Mattie herself spoke not at all, except when starting from a half sleep, she would cry out: "Will, dear Will! come back to me." And at other times moan out: "Never, never, never."

Once she clutched at a locket in her bosom, but seemed unable to open it. I touched the spring for her, and caught a glimpse of a noble youthful face with a wealth of dark hair. She gazed at it till I thought, and almost hoped, her spirit would melt away in the loving contemplation.

The day had gone almost before I knew it, with no signs of busy life outside to mark its progress, and naught now but the setting sun and the circling sweep of the ground swallows to tell of its wane. In the very quietude of the surroundings, Mattie must find tranquillity and peace. I think I had done her good, for she had no symptoms of delirium, and Mr. Talbot said, when he brought the woman who was to take my place, that the immediate danger had passed, he hoped, entirely diverted.

Oh! how weary I was when he lifted me into the carriage. I had hardly the power to answer his questions. I think I had imparted all the electricity in my body to the sick girl, for I found that nothing but continued rubbing would keep her quiet. I soon forgot her and everything else, and, when I came to myself again, I was lying on Mr. Talbot's shoulder as quietly as though it had been my mother's arm. I started up with an exclamation of dismay and apology.

"You fell asleep in so uncomfortable a position that I thought you would not mind if I placed your head on my sister's resting-place," he said, gently.

But I did mind. I could feel the brush of his silken beard across my cheek even then, and the scarlet blood crept up in shame.

He seemed to take a brother's right in controlling me, for, as he lifted me from the carriage, he said: "The family are at dinner, but you are too weary to meet them. You must retire immediately, and we will tell you of our ride to-morrow." I was too fatigued to demur, and he supported me through the hall and up the stairs to my room. "Good-night!" he said, raising my fingers to his lips. "You will dream of the angels to-night, for they have been near you all day."

As I entered my room, my cheek flushed again, for I was sure I saw an evidence of his care in the little table spread for me, with a cup of fragrant coffee, evidently just placed there, for it was smoking hot, and a trout most delicately browned; that, and a slice of sweet light bread, were all I was to eat on retiring. What a clever doctor was spoiled by the influence of that woman's eyes upon his tender heart!

The next day they told me all about the charming ride, and consoled with me for my lost pleasure; but somehow I got the impression that there was some drawback to their perfect enjoyment, unacknowledged to themselves, it might be; at least, they did not speak of it to each other or to me. And Antonia shrugged her shoulders significantly, and attempted a new rôle each hour.

When she came back in the afternoon, as was her wont, Mr. Talbot was sitting under the old willow beside me, with his arm thrown carelessly around the back of my seat. I doubt not he seemed very much interested in me, for he had been to see Mattie, and we were talking of her, and his eyes took in the tender light they always assumed when he was in earnest. He did not see Antonia as she passed by to the croquet ground, and took up one of the mallets, but I saw and felt her look, and a shiver ran through every tissue of my organization. For half an hour she played without attracting his attention, though her syren laugh rippled out more than once, as the mermaid's song floateth over the sea. I will not deny but I half-enjoyed, though I feared, her discomfiture, and I was still looking at her when I saw her give a dexterous movement of the mallet that seemed accidental, then she shrieked out as if in pain, fell back gracefully upon the lawn, and apparently fainted quite away.

All was confusion for a moment. Mr. Talbot's instincts were all alive, and with one bound he reached her, lifted her head and laid it on Susie's lap, as he endeavored to ascertain the cause of the swoon, if such it was. I thought there was the slightest possible curl of his nether lip as he put his fingers on her wrist. His touch might have set her pulses quivering, however, for the glowing carnation, too vivid to be altogether feigned, shot over her face, and set in full-blown roses on her cheeks, and her languishing eyes opened slowly and rested on Mr. Talbot's face with an expression bewilderingly beautiful in its intoxicating flattery, its helpless, touching appeal.

He felt the look, I know, for he asked sympathizingly if she were hurt. She indicated her left arm. He loosened the delicate sleeve, and bared the exquisitely-moulded member with a dainty touch, as though it were sacrilegious to handle it. But an examination was necessary, and he soon gave his opinion that no bones were broken; but, when she shivered and closed her eyes when he pressed her wrist, he said it must be badly sprained.

He raised her to her feet, laid her well hand upon his arm, and throwing his other arm about her waist, supported her to the house. We all followed, and as he laid her down on the sofa, she shot from under her velvety lids a look of triumph that made my eyes blaze and my fingers tighten until the nails pressed into the flesh. I turned away with a feeling in my heart that made life seem too altogether sad to be worth the living. How strangely sad and happy days are mingled in together! The laughter and the sigh strung on one golden cord like variegated buds our childish fancy blended.

For two days Antonia did not come to us, and Mr. Talbot called to see her, with Sue and Lizzie. I did not go, nor would I send a word of sympathy, unprompted by my heart. The third day she came, her arm held up by a broad scarlet ribbon, like the one that held back the shining masses of her hair.

"We must excuse her toilet," she said, "her hair would not accommodate itself to Fashion's mandate without helping hands, and she was obliged to let it take its own way."

I know by its peculiar wave, that it had been braided into innumerable tags; but whether she did it or not, I could not tell. No gentleman, though, and so it did not matter, except that it gave to her an added picturesqueness and charm, most effective because so simple. She seemed to invite Mr. Talbot's petting by every graceful movement, so half pitiful of its own helplessness, so prettily dependent on his superior strength. I felt most palpably the development of my own muscles and sinews, especially in my arm, every time I glanced at her as she hung upon him.

But he did escape her long enough to whisper to me, "That if I would not mind a half hour's walk at dawn the next day, he would be most happy to take me to the 'lily pond,' to witness the glorious sunrise."

"I would be most happy," I replied. "Were the other girls going?"

"No, he wished to give me a sail to compensate me in some degree for the loss of my ride."

I had only time for a smile in reply, for Miss De Lancie's bandage had become loosened, and Doctor Talbot, forsooth, must arrange it.

AN HOUR AGO.

BY CORRELLA.

The sunlight was shining an hour ago,
A flood of gold over hill and vale;
Now, through the stillness the night winds blow
Softly through starlight yet faint and pale.

The clouds were brilliant an hour ago—
Gilded, and crimsoned, and purpled o'er;
Over the evening light, now, they throw
Shadows as dark as the "nevermore."

I was so happy an hour ago,
Now, I sit all by myself in tears;
It was but a little thing, I know,
That lifted the veil from "silent years."

A little word, and so lightly said,
Why should I grieve o'er a careless tone—
Oh, but it makes me think of the dead,
And the life they left me, all alone!

I came in out of the sunshine clear,
My soul with beauteous hopes aflow;
I dreamed of finding its sweetness here,
Alas! that was just an hour ago.

I tear my heart on the same sharp thorn
Forevermore, as I have to-day;
Alas! it is a sad thing to be born
Full of sweet thoughts I must hide away.

It is a wearisome lot to pour
On the desert sand the overflow
Of the soul's best feelings, evermore,
Where never one leaf or flower can blow.

It is a wearisome lot to tread—
A life whose pathway is strewn with pain;
Oh, how it makes one miss the dead,
And long to be with them soon again!

WISDOM is the talent of buying virtuous pleasure at the cheapest rate.—Fielding.

NOTHING that is not a real crime makes a man appear so contemptible and little in the eyes of the world as inconstancy.—Adison.

"SO COLD."

BY LEONORA.

THE brilliant light of the chandelier danced upon the gilt bindings of books upon the wall, now and then casting broad, golden shafts upon the glass doors; it glinted upon the glittering frames of portraits hanging upon the panels between the bookcases, and silver-burnished the bronze and marble busts of distinguished literati, scattered here and there. And it touched coldly, it seemed, the marble-like brows of two men who sat glaring upon each other across a table piled with tape-bound packages. How strangely alike they were! One a solid man—a man who wore, it seemed, an iron mask, a living embodiment of bonds and deeds, and "very hard cash." The other, younger by twenty years or more, with the same broad brow, the same steady, piercing eye, but more kindly; the same firm, compressed lips, but fuller and fresher. Yet they were unlike. The younger face wore a purer, more exalted expression, indicative of true nobility of soul; a face one would trust unquestioning. For a moment the two, so wonderfully alike in feature, so different in expression, glared upon each other.

A long and unprofitable argument, in which the son for the first time opposed the iron will of his father, was now about to be closed, and the shrewd banker saw in the undaunted eye of his son no signs of yielding. The elder broke the silence:—

"Herman, like a wise son you have always followed your father's counsel; has anything but good resulted from it? Look around you, and see the young men who, wise in their own conceit, have gone after their own inclinations, slaves to vice and pleasure. Would you exchange places with any one of them?"

"I have always obeyed you," said the son, proudly, "because hitherto you have demanded only possibilities. The affections will not submit to rule."

"Have you an attachment?" asked the banker, quickly, and fixing his keen eyes upon his son.

"I have not."

"Very good!" the ghost of a smile pulled at the granite corners of his mouth. I say ghost, because a smile upon that countenance was a phenomenon, and perhaps it was a spectre of his murdered youth. "You will then find no difficulty in forming one for the beautiful Constance Raine. Her father was the friend of my youth. When you and Constance were children we made a compact to unite our families and fortunes through you. Here it is, written, signed, and sealed."

The young man took the package, broke the seal, and read it through without change of countenance. It had been drawn up by a lawyer, and so wrapped in obscure technicalities as to make the meaning dubious, but for the coupled names, "Herman Halstead and Constance Raine."

"It is useless," resumed his father, "to tell you why I ask an immediate compliance. You are well acquainted with the precarious state of our finances at present."

"And is it altogether honorable to barter ruin for prosperity?" something akin to a sneer curved his youthful lips.

"We are not ruined. It is to save us from that that I have been pleading with you so long. If you refuse to fulfil this compact, and thus mend the broken wall, my son, we'll soon have the bank tumbling about our heads."

The young man arose, straightened himself to his full height, as if to rid himself of some oppressive feeling. Perhaps he imagined the bank was tumbling about their heads. His father eyed him keenly. He feared^a his son was bracing himself for some obstinate purpose, and resolved to hasten a decision.

"Herman, you see me an old man, furrowed by toll and care. It was for your sake that I tolled, that I might leave you what my father left me—a proud and honored name; but misfortune overtook me. It now rests with you whether this care and toll shall all have been in vain. Give me your decision now, Herman." He leaned his head wearily upon his hand and sighed. Perhaps he was weary, perhaps cunning.

"You have been a faithful father to me, sir," he said, hastily, as if fearing to trust himself to longer reflection, "I yield."

The banker arose and grasped his son's hand. "Thank you," he said, "you have lifted a mountain from my shoulders. I'll start to Raine's to-morrow. Will you go with me?"

"Excuse me, sir, you will no doubt transact the business as well without me." He turned abruptly and left the room. The banker looked after him with a thoughtful face, then plunged vigorously into his tape-bound documents.

Herman strode down the hall and out into the street. He felt that he had committed a wrong in yielding to his father's mercenary plan, and he wanted to get away from himself. He came back, however, less agitated, more thoughtful. "A bride!" the thought was new and unwelcome. The cup of youthful pleasure was yet fresh upon his lips. He felt no need of a helpmeet; there was no void within his heart to be filled only by the love of a trusting wife.

The bridal morning dawned dreary and cheerless; the sky was an unbroken gray monotony. Constance sat at her window gazing down the aisle of stately trees which overshadowed the gravelled carriage road. She was a noble-looking girl—fair and stately in her costly bridal dress; her golden-brown hair bound with bands of pearls instead of the myrtle wreath; and her pale but beautiful face overcast with an expression of heavy thought, so deep as to seem like apathy. She held in her hand a miniature of Herman which his father had brought her. She had looked upon the frank, honest face, and thought how easy a task it would be to love him. And yet the future, oh! how uncertain. He had never seen her. Would he, who had looked upon the fairest of women, be pleased with her who knew nothing of the world?"

"Why don't you talk, Constance?" said a bright-faced girl, who fidgeted upon an ottoman at her feet. "One would suppose that you had nothing upon earth to interest you, and that this, of all the days of your life, was the most commonplace. What are you thinking about? I should like to know what one's emotions might be who is so soon to be married to a person they have never seen."

"I cannot tell you, Ada," she replied; "I have no words to express my feelings. This apathy is strange and unnatural. It seems I have lost all capability of thought or emotion."

Mr. Raine's youth had been one of such extravagance and folly as brought early satiety. At the death of his wife he had retired with his two children, who were small, to his present elegant home, provided for them the best of masters, and here they had grown up in almost entire ignorance of the goings on beyond their "loophole of retreat." Pure and innocent they were, but unfitted to grapple with any of life's difficulties and temptations, which come alike to all.

"Only ten minutes," said the volatile and rosy beauty, as she looked at her watch for the fiftieth time in the last half hour.

The time passed in silence. Then the roll of wheels is heard, and a carriage is seen glancing through the green foliage. Constance clasped her hands tightly together, and a deathly pallor overspread her face, "Leave me just a moment, Ada."

With a glance of wonder and sympathy Ada left the room, and she was alone. A convulsive trembling seized her, and she wrung her jewelled hands, but uttered no cry. She heard steps upon the stairs; a moment she bowed her head in prayer, then, calling all her strength and womanly pride to her aid, she awaited their coming, outwardly calm and composed. The door was thrown open by her father, and a gentleman in a gray travelling suit stood before her. With a quiet, searching glance, he fastened his dark eyes upon the noble girl who stood before him with sweeping bridal veil and bands of pearls glistening in her golden hair.

"My daughter Constance, Mr. Halstead."

He stepped forward, took her trembling hand, and said, as he bowed deeply: "Forgive me for intruding before the appointed hour without permission. There are a few words I wish to say to you." He paused abruptly; the door closed, and they were alone.

She sat down upon the sofa from which she had arisen upon his entrance, and Herman took a seat beside her.

"I wish to hear from your own lips, before it is too late," he said, taking her small hand in his, and gazing earnestly into her face, "that this marriage is not distasteful to you."

She raised her eyes, for the first time, to his face. For a moment the two looked into each other's eyes; her's dilated with a wild, vague terror, his calm, steady, and searching. She could read nothing in that grave face, but it calmed her, and, withdrawing her gaze, she said, proudly: "My father, I fancy, would have used no compulsion had my wishes opposed his."

"Thank you!" he replied, pressing her hand gently. He paused a moment in deep thought. "It is my wish that you consider yourself as free after marriage as before. That you can, at present, feel no attachment for a person who is a perfect stranger to you, I know. It shall be my earnest endeavor to make the chain as light as possible to you until you feel it no longer a burden. Your apartments will be separate from mine. Your privacy shall never be intruded upon by me, except by your permission. And remember, I am always subject to your command." Once more he pressed her hand, arose, and looking upon the proud, beautiful face for a moment, left the room. "How cold, how stately, how proud!" he mused, as he followed the servant to his dressing-room.

Constance, left alone, clasped her small hands and held them toward the sombre sky as if imploring aid. "I obey my father," she murmured; "all will be well. We shall love each other some day; oh, I know we shall!" but the cry was not one of hope, but despair. "He seems so cold. Is he marble? Will he never speak to me tenderly? Oh! has he a heart?" Ada was softly entering the room, and Constance turned and smiled sadly upon her. They were about to be separated for the first time in their lives. The tender-hearted, impulsive girl sprang forward, and, regardless of the costly dress, threw her arms about her sister and wept bitterly. But Constance had no tears. Her heart seemed a frozen fountain, into which no warm sun-rays of hope shone.

Three months have passed; months of restlessness and remorse to Herman, and of darkness to Constance. Punctiliously they had performed the requirements of etiquette. In society Constance was much admired for her majestic appearance and splendid toilet. But she was "so cold," said the people; and so it is often said of those who are only sad. She saw her husband gay, and apparently with an unclouded heart, flitting here and there with smiles and bright words for all but her. She did not know—unsophisticated child as she was—that the gay mask was worn over a heavy heart. Their domestic isolation was kept a secret from the world. Not even the servants knew that they met only at the table. There they conversed courteously upon literary and general topics. Herman found his wife learned to an unusual extent, but reticent; only expressing herself independently when forced out, and then in measured, unenthusiastic tones. He thought her a statue without life or fire. Truly, the fire smouldered deep beneath heaps of dead ashes.

The few evenings passed at home were spent in the solitude of their own apartments. Their sitting-rooms adjoined, with a sliding door between, which was never moved, except, perhaps, by servants. In this room Herman read and smoked—and at night making a couch of the sofa—slept. This evening he was bending over a book, striving in vain to fix his wandering thoughts, but in reality thinking of his lonely wife. Indeed, the thought of her was seldom absent from his mind. He saw that grief was wearing her life away. What could he do to make her happier? Would she accept his sympathy?

Her sitting-room door was accidentally ajar, and he resolved to go and speak with her. There was no one in the room, and he looked curiously around. Every article of furniture was familiar to him; but the heliotropes, the lilies of the valley, and the fuchsias upon the window sill, the little beaded slippers upon the ottoman, the embroidery basket, and all those pretty trifles which adorn a lady's private rooms, were new, and objects of interest and curiosity to Herman. As he stood in the centre of the room, thinking of the sad, but beautiful woman who spent her lone hours here, he heard a suppressed sob. With a light step he reached the open door of her dressing-room, but saw no one. A closer scrutiny, however, revealed to him through the lace curtains of a deep bay window Constance kneeling with her head bowed upon her clasped hands. He felt it to be no place for him, and with a noiseless step hastened away. He closed the door softly, and sat down in his own room to deep and earnest reflection. The results were seen in his kinder and less formal manner toward her upon the next day, and which lifted a portion of the shadow upon her face, and made her less stiff and ceremonious.

The evening following they attended a concert. As they were leaving the hall, pressed by the crowd, some one, unconscious of their nearness, said: "How cold and formal is Herman Halstead toward his bride, and she such a splendid woman! I used to fancy he would make a tender, devoted husband."

"Ah!" was the reply, "there are such things as marriages of convenience. I hear that she has an immense fortune." The speakers moved on, and the remainder of their conversation was lost in the crowd.

Herman looked quickly at Constance. He saw that she had heard. Her lips were compressed firmly, but there was such a look of terror-stricken grief, such intensity of agony, as made him tremble with alarm. In silence he conducted her to their carriage, sat down beside her, and taking her two hands pressed them to his lips tenderly. Oh! how he pitied her, but what could he say in self-justification? But she could not endure pity; better coldness, she was so proud. And snatching her hands away haughtily, she said:—

"We will have no acting, if you please. You professed no love for me at our marriage, nor I for you. I had no cause to expect it, and whatever misery I may endure from that fatal step, it is of my own choosing. I do not wish you to alter your treatment of me."

He looked upon the proud face with this thought, "Cold, oh! how cold." But his answer was: "Forgive me, and thank you for reminding me of my promise. It may be some comfort to you—they say misery loves company"—with a scornful laugh, "to know that I too endure torture." Then his voice changed to deep and passionate tenderness. "Constance, it wrings my heart to see your happiness so wrecked. Young, beautiful, and an heiress. What a career of pleasure spread out before you—all crushed. Oh! how I regret that fatal, fatal step."

He heard the quick-drawn breath, saw by the dim light the misty splendor which for a moment filled her hazel eyes. Then the countenance hardened. For one forgetful moment she dreamed of love. Then the suspicion, which had to-night been forced upon her, crushed the new-born hope. Hitherto she had believed Herman, like herself, the victim of parental authority. Now she even doubted the sincerity of his words, she had so recently learned how well emotion may be counterfeited. "Trouble yourself no longer on my account," she said, coldly. "There are thousands who endure more than I, and He who heareth the raven's cry will help me."

"Is there anything I can do to make your life happier?"

"Nothing. I thank you for the kindness you have always shown me."

He bowed his head silently. Her calm resignation in accepting the joyless life spread out before her, and gratitude for the mite of love bestowed upon her by him who owed her a life's devotion, touched him deeply, but her statuesque reserve kept him silent.

A few evenings after we find them at an elegant and select entertainment; Herman the gayest of the gay, Constance, as usual, queenly and solemn. Mr. Channing, a distinguished editor and a handsome man—who evidently was not unconscious of the fact—standing somewhat apart from the crowd, observed the youthful couple with a shrewd, politic eye. Presently he speaks to Herman, who presents him to Mrs. Halstead. What there was in the polite and affable address of Mr. Channing to excite his suspicion, Herman could not say, but he found time in the midst of his mock flirtations to watch them covertly. He saw Constance at first listless and distraite; the next glance revealed her slightly flushed and nervous, so slightly as to be detectable only to an interested observer like Herman, who was now becoming uneasy. Again she cast a swift glance from beneath her lashes upon the handsome and agreeable editor, and such a smile overspread her countenance. "How very lovely she is!" mused Herman, "but she never smiles like that on me."

"Ay, and perhaps you have never said such things as Mr. Channing is saying to make her smile," said the little monster of the emerald eye. Then he looked at the editor more keenly. He observed the clear, pale complexion, the well-developed forehead, the firm but expressive mouth, and the keen gray eye full of thought and power. Once he met the eyes of his beautiful bride fixed upon him critically, just as she would look at any other person to whom her attention had been called, and he knew the editor was talking about him.

It was rather late when Herman notified Constance of his desire to go home, but, with a charming smile toward Mr. Channing, she said, naively: "How this evening has flown."

Herman would have liked to knock that editor over, but contented himself with abusing him as they drove home, which aroused all the native stubbornness of Constance's character, and they reached home in a state of positive alienation.

Their life of formality was broken up. Again and again she met Mr. Channing. The gossips talked as gossips always do, and Herman grew desperate. Not that there was anything in their manner for gossip or desperation; there were not two more courtly and irreproachable personages to be found in fashionable society. This sort of life was becoming unendurable to Constance. In solitude she bound up her heart with fervent prayer, and abroad masked her sorrows in indifference, too proud to let the world know her weakness. But her wretched midnight vigils were telling upon the beautiful face. "I cannot endure this long," she said. "I shall either die or go mad."

A few days after she directed her steps toward Herman's apartments. She had never entered them, and now a nervous timidity seized her. She knocked softly. Herman's voice told her to come in. She opened the door and entered. He made no exhibition of surprise, though he wondered much what had brought her. He saw with pain the marks of suffering upon her countenance.

"If you have no objections," she said, timidly, "I should like to go home for a week or two."

A new remorse seized him, remorse for remembered harsh words and personal wrongs, as he listened to this meek request from the quietly woman. "Constance," he said, reproachfully, "have you so soon forgotten the promise I gave you of perfect freedom?" He arose and walked to the window, striving to clear his brow of the unutterable misery he felt to be settling itself there, then came back and fixing his eyes earnestly upon her, said: "Constance, you are free. If you wish it, you shall have a divorce and be released from your trouble."

She looked upon him with a face of blank, cold terror; the color faded from her cheek, the misty softness vanished from her frightened eyes; only a moment she looked, then covering her face with her hands burst into tears.

"Constance," he said, in a troubled voice, "what do you want? You are not happy; is it in my power to make you so?"

She lifted her eyes at length; there were sorrow and tenderness in them. "Do as you wish," she said.

"Constance, I will have no such answer," with an eager, impatient gesture. "Tell me quickly."

"Then," she replied, slowly, "such a thought had never crossed my mind. I do not wish it on my own account."

How frail she had grown. She leaned her head wearily against the purple velvet cushion of her chair, the long lashes drooped listlessly, and there was a settled gravity about the small mouth which spoke of protracted suffering. He sat down by her, and, taking her slender hand in his, said: "O Constance, if you could only love me a little, just a little—I do not expect a return of half the wild, mad passion of my own ardent temperament, we are so differently constituted—there would yet be happiness for us both."

She looked upon him in amazement, the swift color rising to her cheek. "Herman, are you speaking the truth?"

"Do I really, truly, devotedly, ay, madly love you, do you mean? I do, as God is my witness."

Never before had Herman seen the countenance of his wife so radiant. He clasped both her small hands in his, and bent toward her eagerly. "You do love me a little?"

"Not a little," she replied, shaking her head archly, "but very much, even as you have said."

In a moment a strong arm was around her, and the lips of her husband were pressed to hers in the ecstasy of a lover's first kiss.

How the people wondered over the sudden change in the young married couple; he so tender and devoted, she so charming and gay. But the editor wondered not. He only smiled grimly at the gossips, and was as attentive as ever to his favorite.

ACTING CHARADE.

CHECKMATE.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

Characters.

MR. CORNELIUS HEATH, an elderly gentleman, devoted to chess.
 MRS. CORNELIUS HEATH, an elderly lady, devoted to her son.
 MINNIE HEATH, their daughter, aged ten.
 ISABELLA HARCOURT, MR. HEATH'S ward, a young lady with a will of her own.
 HARRY HARCOURT, ISABELLA'S brother, aged twelve, also a ward of MR. HEATH'S.
 ALBERT AMORY, ISABELLA'S lover, a young sailor.
 JAMES, MR. HEATH'S footman.

SCENE I.—CHECK-

SCENE.—The parlor of MR. HEATH'S house. Curtain rises, discovering MR. HEATH seated before a table, with a chess-board and an open book before him. MRS. HEATH, seated at the other side of the stage, is sewing.

Mrs. Heath. (Sighing.) Oh, dear!

Mr. Heath. (Reading from the book, and moving a piece on the chess-board.) This move puts the queen in check.

Mrs. Heath. (A little louder than before.) Oh, dear!

Mr. Heath. (Moving another piece on the board.) Either way the queen is in check; to the knight if I move the pawn, to the castle if I take away the bishop.

Mrs. Heath. (Quite loudly.) Oh, dear!

Mr. Heath. (Looking up suddenly.) Did you speak, my love?

Mrs. Heath. Speak, indeed! I'm sure nothing less than a blast from a speaking trumpet would rouse you, when you get out that hateful book and chess-board.

Mr. Heath. This is such a beautiful game, my dear.

Mrs. Heath. Nonsense! While you are studying your beautiful games, I have all the torment and worry of the household upon my shoulders. I am nearly worn to death.

Mr. Heath. Why, my dear, I was not aware—

Mrs. Heath. No, of course you were not aware of anything but pawns, and bishops, and castles.

Mr. Heath. But what is tormenting and worrying you?

Mrs. Heath. Isabella Harcourt.

Mr. Heath. My ward?

Mrs. Heath. Yes, your ward; a great hoydenish, romping country girl, who won't wear a dress like anybody else's, lets her hair hang in great long blousy curls like a milkmaid, talks slang like a stable boy; and now, to crown all, coolly informs me that she is engaged to be married to Albert Amory, a common sailor that she met in Maizeville.

Mr. Heath. Engaged to be married! Why, my dear, you surely told me that Reginald—

Mrs. Heath. Now don't drive me crazy at once. Of course I supposed Reginald was secure, if he proposed, and I counted upon her fortune for the dear boy's future support. If she had only come to me in the first place, as soon as her father died.

Mr. Heath. But you know, my dear, her father expressly desired that she should go to Maizeville, to her uncle's for four years, to restore her health.

Mrs. Heath. Well, she is healthy enough now; vulgarly so, I think. Just listen!

Isabella. (Behind the scenes, sings very loudly.)

"I should like to marry,
 If that I could find
 Any little husband
 Just suited to my mind!
 But he must be handsome,
 And he must be good!
 Or I'd send him right about,
 Yes, indeed, I should!"

Mrs. Heath. That's a pretty song for a young lady of eighteen, now, isn't it?

Mr. Heath. I think her lungs are quite sound.

Mrs. Heath. She is a bigger Tomboy than her brother, at this moment. She quite defies me. When I told her she must give up this low sailor fellow, she informed me that her uncle approved of the match, and she would marry him if she had to elope to do it.

Mr. Heath. Elope!

Mrs. Heath. So I have had to watch her constantly. Fortunately, Mr. Amory has gone away now for a few days, so I can feel at ease for a little while.

Enter ISABELLA, in a walking dress. She wears a short sack with pockets in front, into which her hands are thrust. If a young lady can be found for this part who can enter whistling, it will add to the effect.

Isabella. (Aside.) Now what is Mrs. Heath doing here at this time of day? I thought she was safe in her own room.

Mrs. Heath. Pray, may I inquire, Miss Harcourt, what you have on your walking dress for?

Isabella. Certainly you may inquire.

Mrs. Heath. Well?

Isabella. Quite well, I thank you.

Mrs. Heath. I asked you what you had put on your walking dress for.

Isabella. Oh! I put it on to walk in.

Mrs. Heath. Did I not expressly forbid you to leave the house unless I accompanied you?

Isabella. You may accompany me if you like. I am going as far as the post-office. It would be rather an accommodation if you would hurry a little in getting ready.

Mrs. Heath. I never heard such brazen impudence in all my life. You will not go out to-day, Miss Harcourt.

Isabella. (Aside.) Check number one. How can I get this letter in the office?

Mr. Heath. (Abstractedly.) The pawns are very important when the larger pieces are held in check.

Isabella. So they are! I have it! (Throws off her hat and sack.) There are more ways of killing a cat than those imagine who choke her to death with pudding.

Mrs. Heath. I never heard such disgusting vulgarity in my life!

Isabella. Well, if you'll grease your ears and button them back, you can hear some more.

Mrs. Heath. Mr. Heath, how long am I to be insulted in my own house.

Mr. Heath. (Absently.) Certainly, my dear, it is your own; settled on you when we were married.

Mrs. Heath. I asked you if there was no check to be put upon this girl's saucy tongue?

Mr. Heath. (Reading.) The knight thus gives check to the queen.

Mrs. Heath. (Rising.) I declare, between you, you are enough to drive one mad!

[Exit MRS. HEATH.]

Mr. Heath. (Rising.) My dear! my dear! I am sure I did not intend—dear me, she is vexed! I must go and see what is the matter.

[Exit MR. HEATH.]

Isabella. Ha! ha! ha! Poor fellow! He's not henpecked any. Oh, no! And now for my letter. Albert must know how the land lies. Thanks to Mr. Heath's hint, I remember my pawn. Harry is devoted to Albert, so I will take him into my confidence.

Enter MINNIE.

Minnie. (Sobbing.) Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

Isabella. Why, Minnie, what is the matter?

Minnie. O Belle, you know my big wax doll that opens and shuts its eyes, this way. (Standing erect, facing audience, and winking very fast.)

Isabella. Yes, I know.

Minnie. Well, she's all melted on her cheek and nose by the fire. (Sobs again.) They went and built up a rousing big fire in the nursery and never moved her chair away.

Isabella. What a pity! Where's Harry, Minnie?

Minnie. In the nursery, doing a sum.

Isabella. Well, don't cry any more, Minnie, and I will give you another doll twice as big as that one.

Minnie. Truly?

Isabella. Yes, truly. Now won't you do something for me?

Minnie. Yes, indeed I will.

Isabella. Won't you go to the nursery and send Harry to me. Tell him to come quick, and not tell anybody that I want him.

Minnie. I'll tell him. [Exit MINNIE.]

Isabella. (Taking a letter from her pocket) He must mail this for me, and get Albert's. (Rummaging in her pocket.) Where is my post-office check? He can't get my letters without that. (Emptying her pockets.) Here's my handkerchief, and trunk key, and bird whistle, and piece of chocolate, and Jewsharp, and piece of um, and thimble, and comic songbook, and nigger concert tickets—I'll give those to Harry—and pocket comb, and here it is! my post-office check.

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE II.—MATE.

SCENE.—Same as Scene I. Curtain rises, discovering MINNIE seated on a low seat nursing a large wax doll.

Minnie. You beautiful darling! Who would have thought that Belle had had you in that great white box ever since she was a little girl herself. Why, you are most as old as I am, you dear pretty dolly!

Enter HARRY, walking on tiptoe.

Harry. Minnie!

Minnie. Why, what is the matter? You look so funny.

Harry. Funny?

Minnie. Yes, so serious and important.

Harry. Minnie, can you keep a secret?

Minnie. Oh, yes; tell me, quick!

Harry. (Drawing two chairs forward, facing audience.) Well, come sit here by me, then, and put away that great ugly doll. (Sits down.)

Minnie. Ugly! She is perfectly beautiful.

Harry. Is she? Put her down, anyhow.

(MINNIE puts the doll carefully upon the sofa.)

Minnie. (Sitting down beside HARRY.) Now tell me the secret, quick!

Harry. Sister Belle's got a bean.

Minnie. Pshaw! I knew that long ago. It is brother Reginald.

Harry. No it ain't! That's the fun of it! And he is coming to see her to-day, when your mother is gone to the concert. She had a letter from him this morning; I got it out of the post-office, and he is coming at four o'clock, and—and—ain't it fun, Minnie?

Minnie. Fun?

Harry. Why, yes, humbugging old—your mother so! She is going to marry him, you know; and only think, Minnie, he's been appointed mate to one of the biggest ships in New York.

Minnie. What is a mate, Harry?

Harry. I don't know, but it is something very grand, for Belle clapped her hands when she read it, and told me right off.

Isabella. (Behind the scenes.) You can show any one who asks for me into the parlor, James.

Harry. Oh, Belle is coming! O Minnie, let's you and I get under the table and see them make love. It's not listening, you know, because Belle told me all about it, and I told you.

Minnie. But—

Harry. Come, quick, or they'll catch us.

(HARRY drags MINNIE to the table and both hide under it, pulling the cover down to conceal them.)

Enter ISABELLA.

Isabella. All well so far. What a jewel Harry is, to be sure. He will be delighted, too, if we succeed in eluding Mrs. Heath's vigilance. Dear Albert! I wonder if a mate can take his wife to sea with him.

Enter ALBERT.

Albert. Dear Bella!

Isabella. (Rising to embrace him.) Dear, dear Albert!

Albert. You are well, darling?

Isabella. Yes, dearest, and you? You look a little pale, my own love.

Albert. Only fatigue, dear Bella. I travelled all night, you know?

Isabella. Do be careful of your health, for my sake, dear.

Albert. Did you receive my note?

Isabella. I did.

Albert. And will you consent, darling?

Isabella. You know I promised, Albert, if my guardian opposed our marriage, to elope with you. I will keep my word.

Albert. (Kissing her.) My darling!

Isabella. I have now some five hundred dollars in money, and lots of jewelry. This will suffice us until my guardian is reconciled to the match, and pays my allowance.

Albert. Do you suppose I mean to live on your money, pet? Did I not write to you that I am now mate of the Albatross, and she does not sail for six weeks. She is undergoing repairs now, in New York harbor, so we can enjoy a long honeymoon before we sail.

Isabella. Oh, dear! does the mate have to go to sea?

Albert. Well, generally.

Isabella. Then you can't be mate. You must stay at home.

Albert. We will talk about that after we are married. You will be all ready this evening, and I will have a carriage waiting. Steal out when I whistle: "Down the burn, Davy, love," and we will take the midnight train for New York.

Isabella. I will be all ready.

Mrs. Heath. (Behind the scenes.) With a gentleman in the parlor?

Isabella. Oh! there is old mammy Heath. How can you get out?

Albert. (Going to the window.) Here is a grape vine frame, and I am a sailor. Good-bye till evening. (Opens the window and goes out as if upon the grape vine frame.)

Isabella. I haven't time for a row with Mrs. Heath, I must go pack my satchel.

[Exit ISABELLA.]

Harry. (Peeping out from under the table.) Come out, Minnie. (Comes out.)

Minnie. (Creeping out.) O Harry! Oh! when I'm a grown woman I mean to have a beau and run away to New York. Wouldn't it be fun?

Harry. (Very gravely.) Minnie.

Minnie. Well, Harry?

Harry. Let's you and I run away now. What's the use of waiting till we're grown up? I can take care of you now. (Imitating ALBERT.) Dear Minnie.*

Minnie. (Rushing into his arms.) Dear, dear Harry.

Harry. You are well, Minnie, darling?

Minnie. I am well. But you? You look a little pale, my dear love.

Harry. I am only tired, my Minnie. I am going to travel all night, you know.

Minnie. Do be careful of your precious health, for my sake, Harry.

Harry. (Taking out his pocket-book.) Let me see, my pet, how much money I have got. (Counting.) Ten, fifteen, twenty-five, fifty—one dollar and fifteen cents, two postage stamps, and a button.

Minnie. I haven't got any money, but there is my set of corals and the bracelet Reginald gave me last Christmas.

Harry. Splendid! We shall do famously. Shall we elope to-night, Minnie, dearest?

Minnie. Yes. We can follow Belle, you know.

Harry. Oh, yes. They are going in a carriage, and I can catch on behind.

Minnie. But I can't.

Harry. Can't you? Well, I know where the New York depot is, any how, so we can walk.

Minnie. Where can we go when we get to New York, Harry?

Harry. Oh! we'll speak to Belle when we get on the cars, and I'll get Albert to have me made a mate too.

Minnie. But Albert said a mate had to go to sea.

Harry. He said generally; perhaps they'll let us stay at home.

Minnie. But if they won't have you for a mate, Harry, what then?

Harry. Well, then, I must open a store like Uncle William's, and sell dresses, and shawls, and such things. You can have all you want, Minnie, for nothing.

Minnie. I like that best.

Enter MRS. HEATH.

Mrs. Heath. What are you children doing in the parlor?

Harry. (Drawing himself up.) Children! (Aside to MINNIE.) We know what we know, don't we, Minnie?

Minnie. Yes, we do. And heaps more beside.

Mrs. Heath. Go up to the nursery, both of you.

Harry. (Aside.) She'll soon see if we are children. I am an engaged man.

[Exit HARRY.]

Minnie. (Taking up her doll.) I'm going.

* The whole of the conversation following must be as close an imitation as possible of the conversation between Albert and Isabella.

(Aside.) I wonder what she will say when she hears I'm a married woman in New York. Children! (Aloud.) Come, you precious, darling dolly, come. [Exit MINNIE.]

Mrs. Heath. Dear me! I'm sure one's own children are worry enough, without having those of other people to look after. Now there's Reginald going to let Isabella's fortune slip through his fingers, because he won't force her inclinations. And Mr. Heath is no help at all. But to-morrow Miss Hareourt goes with me to Saratoga, and I hope I shall have no more of this sailor lover of hers. She informed me to-day that she had heard he was going to be mate of the Albatross. Now, if I can only keep her contented at Saratoga till he sails upon a good long voyage, she will be sure to forget him before he comes back.

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE III.—CHECKMATE.

SCENE.—Same as Scene I. MR. HEATH seated at a table, with a chess-board and open book before him. MRS. HEATH reading. Curtain rises slowly. After a moment's pause, a clock is heard striking midnight.

Mrs. Heath. Twelve o'clock! (Yawns.) What a long, tiresome evening this has been. But it will be the last for some time. My dear!

Mr. Heath. (Absently.) Yes, dear.

Mrs. Heath. I think, considering that this is my last evening at home for a month or six weeks, that I had a right to expect a little attention from my husband.

Mr. Heath. Yes, dear. True, true, I have been a little absorbed, I believe. So you are really going to-morrow?

Mrs. Heath. Dear me! I have told you fifty times that I must get Isabella away before that low sailor fellow comes back again. He may come home any day, but he will not find her here.

Mr. Heath. But he may follow her to Saratoga.

Mrs. Heath. If he knows she is there. But I will take good care that he does not know.

Mr. Heath. But you cannot stay in Saratoga forever.

Mrs. Heath. Of course not. But we can stay there until his vessel sails. Oh, my plan now is perfect, and Reginald will win the heiress yet!

Enter JAMES, leading HARRY and MINNIE; HARRY kicking and struggling, MINNIE sobbing loudly. HARRY wears his overcoat and hat, and has in his hands a bat, and ball, and a pair of skates; MINNIE carries her waz doll.

James. If you please, ma'am—

Harry. Let me go, you great, hateful fellow! (Twitches away from JAMES.) The next time you want to elope, Miss Minnie, you may go by yourself. If it hadn't been for that great heavy doll, we would have been in time for the train.

Minnie. It ain't a bit heavier than your ugly old bat and skates. The idea of taking skates in summer.

James. If you please, ma'am—

Harry. You be quiet, you old meddling fellow!

Mrs. Heath. I should like to know what all this means?

James. Yes, ma'am. If you please—

Minnie. You don't know anything about it.

Mr. Heath. (Reading and moving a chessman.) This prevents the knight from protecting the queen.

Mrs. Heath. What are you children doing out at this hour?

Minnie and Harry. If that horrid old James—

James. Indeed, ma'am—

Mrs. Heath. (In a loud, angry tone.) Silence, all of you! James, where did you find these children?

James. At the New York depot, ma'am, where I went to see my cousin off.

Mrs. Heath. And, pray, what were you two children doing at the New York depot?

Harry. I was eloping with Minnie, and, if she hadn't dragged along that great hateful doll, we might have been in New York by this time.

Mrs. Heath. Eloping! What on earth does the boy mean?

Minnie. He means running away to get married, mamma.

Mrs. Heath. What is the world coming to? Take them up stairs, James, where they will stay for one week on bread and water.

Harry. I won't go.

Minnie. I will, for (yawning) I'm so sleepy I can scarcely keep my eyes open.

[Exit MINNIE.]

Mrs. Heath. You can go down stairs, James. [Exit JAMES.]

Mr. Heath. (Reading.) This clears the board of all the unimportant pieces, and brings the game to a focus.

Mrs. Heath. (To HARRY.) And, now, I would like to know, sir, what excuse you can give for your conduct?

Harry. I don't see why Minnie and I shouldn't elope as well as sister Belle and Albert Amory.

Mrs. Heath. Your sister and Albert Amory! Eloped! When? Where?

Harry. To-night, to New York.

Mrs. Heath. I shall certainly faint. Do you hear that, Mr. Heath?

Mr. Heath. What is it? Did you speak to me, my dear?

Mrs. Heath. Speak to you! Don't you hear what this awful bad boy says? After all my plans, everything arranged so nicely, here this dreadful child says his sister has eloped to-night with her low sailor lover.

Mr. Heath. So all your schemes fall to the ground.

Mrs. Heath. It is too vexatious. Go to bed, you bad boy.

Harry. (Yawning.) Well, I believe I will.

[Exit HARRY.]

Mr. Heath. The queen is lost now.

Mrs. Heath. I wish you would put by that horrid chess, and tell me what I am to do.

Mr. Heath. Do, my dear? Why, if your fine plans have proved useless, and the game is lost, you must do as I do.

Mrs. Heath. What is that?

Mr. Heath. Submit to a checkmate.

[Curtain falls.]

GODEY'S COURSE OF LESSONS IN DRAWING.

Fig. 38.

LESSON XI.

In a former sketch, we have given a specimen of the mode of delineating the foliage of an oak-tree. We now give another, in which the tree is the principal object (Fig. 38). The further branches are made darker, which brings out the nearer ones. The pupil will see, from this sketch, how the effect of water is given with very little trouble.

In sketching the copy in Fig. 39, the circular part of the bridge should be drawn in first, then the upper part and outline of the whole; thereafter the foliage at the top, taking care not to make it too dark, as it should appear to recede from the eye. It may be taken as a general rule that in distances shadows become lighter, on account of the atmosphere more so than lights, the dark parts being the first to lose their distinctness. The copy here given is treated with a broad effect of light. The few strongly marked weeds give an effect to the whole. The reflections in the water are indistinct, in consequence of its being a running stream.

Having gone thus far in drawing from objects, we now conclude this part of our subject. Having laid before her the rudiments or basis of the art, we leave it to the perseverance of the pupil to make further progress, as pencil-drawing will form a good foundation for the higher branches of art, as oil and water-color painting.

SPANISH BREAD.

THE bread in the South of Spain is delicious ; it is white as snow, close as cake, and yet very light. The flavor is most admirable, for the wheat is good and pure, and the bread well kneaded. The way they make this bread is as follows : From large round panniers filled with wheat they take out a handful at a time, sorting it most carefully and expeditiously, and throwing every defective grain into another basket. This done, the wheat is ground between two circular stones, as it was ground in Egypt 2000 years ago, the requisite rotary motion being given by a blindfolded mule, which paces round and round with untiring patience, a bell being attached to his neck, which, as long as he is in movement, tinkles on ; and when it stops, he is urged to his duty by the shout of "Arre, mula," from some one within hearing. When ground, the wheat is sifted through three sieves, the last of these being so fine that only the pure flour can pass through it ; this is of a pale apricot-color. The bread is made in the evening. It is mixed with only sufficient water, with a little salt in it, to make it into dough ; a very small quantity of leaven, or fermenting mixture, is added. The Scripture says, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." The dough made, it is put into sacks, and carried on the donkeys' backs to the oven in the centre of the village, so as to bake it immediately it is kneaded. On arriving there, the dough is divided into portions weighing three pounds each. Two long narrow wooden tables on trestles are then placed down the room, and now a curious sight may be seen. About twenty men (bakers) come in and range themselves on one side of the table. A lump of dough is handed to the nearest, which he commences kneading and knocking about with all his might for about three or four minutes, and then passes it on to his neighbor, who does the same ; and so on successively until all have kneaded it, when it becomes as soft as new putty, and ready for the oven. Of course, as soon as the first baker has handed the first lump to his neighbor, another is given to him, and so on till the whole quantity of dough is successively kneaded by them all. The bakers' wives and daughters shape the loaves for the oven, and some of them are very small, and they are baked immediately. The ovens are very large, and not heated by fires under them ; but a quantity of twigs of the herbs of sweet marjoram and thyme, which cover the hills in great profusion, are put in the oven and ignited. They heat the oven to any extent required ; and, as the bread gets baked, the oven gets gradually colder, so that the bread is never burned. They knead the bread in Spain with such force, that the palm of the hand and the second joints of the fingers of the bakers are covered with corns, and it so affects the chest that they cannot work more than two hours at a time.

IF we know ourselves, we shall remember the condescension, benignity, and love that is due to inferiors ; the affability, friendship, and kindness we ought to show to equals ; the regard, deference, and honor we owe to superiors ; and the candor, integrity, and benevolence we owe to all.—Mason.

INTELLECT and industry are never incompatible. There is more wisdom, and will be more benefit, in combining them than scholars like to believe, or than the common world imagine. Life has time enough for both, and its happiness will be increased by the union.—Turner.

MY STORY; AND WHY I DID NOT WRITE IT.

BY E. F. H.

A GREAT rambling yellow house, and only two of us in it; none too much money, either; and when I begged for a new Sunday bonnet, and mother declared that the old one must do, I couldn't help crying. All the girls had come out in their new summer bonnets as fresh as roses, and I declared I could not and should not wear that hateful old dud, with its faded green ribbon, streaked in blue-green and yellow-green alternately, where it had displayed itself to the sun, or hidden away in loops; with the old creases and needle holes, that all the water and hot irons in the world could never obliterate and render fresh and smooth again. Had not I already turned and twisted it, first on this side, then on that, for four summers? and I thought it was beyond human endurance if I was compelled to wear it again. And now the city styles had come, tipping the little baby-looking bonnets on the top of the waterfalls, and no coaxing or inducements of mine could persuade my old-fashioned bonnet to assume the right air, and perch itself where it ought in obedience to the dictates of fashion. Hadn't I spent two mortal hours before the glass in my own little chamber, Sunday noon, when mother thought I was learning my Sunday-school lesson, practising on getting my waterfall up on the top of my head, instead of in the low bag in my neck, in which I had been wearing it? And then when I took the old bonnet, with its red trimmings, looking so hot and flaming that lovely June Sabbath, and perched it on the top in true city style, the result was so overpowering that I couldn't help giggling hysterically, chagrined and perplexed as I was. I took a small glass from the next room—Benny's room it used to be—and, standing with my back to the large one, in a way perhaps not altogether new to the human race, I peered in eagerly to see the effect.

Oh, dear! there was my waterfall sure enough, straining each particular hair from its very root up to the proper height; but the bonnet! oh, it looked like nothing on the earth, or in the water under the earth, and I'm sure like nothing in the heavens. There was room enough in the crown of it, where it towered up above my head without touching it, to carry my dinner pail in, and the ears came round behind and nearly met just where they ought not to be, while the front view was entirely martial, and I could think of nothing but a statue of Minerva I had once seen with a helmet on her head; it came down to my eyebrows and towered up in the air to an altitude of, I won't say how many degrees. But I consoled myself with the thought that perhaps I had "done" my hair a little too high, so when I heard mother's voice in the entry telling me to get ready for Sunday school, I scrambled my hair down into its bag again, and putting on the despised bonnet in its ordinary humdrum fashion, I heaved a sigh not altogether of despair—although it was strongly tinged with that ingredient—and beguiled my way to church with calculating just the distance up one's cranium the waterfall must attain in order to accommodate itself to one's head gear, resolving to take notes of the other girls, and improve upon my former attempt.

On Monday morning I commenced the first thing over the wash-tub, as soon as we had finished breakfast, and mother was good-natured again, for she had been a little annoyed because she overslept, and she feared Mrs. Tompkins would get her clothes out before we did. It took considerable manœuvring and much extra smartness on my side, to get mother into her usual pleasant mood, but at last she came round, and when I ran up stairs and got my white brilliant sack, which had seen its third summer, and declared I was going to do it up for next Sunday, she smiled on me approvingly.

"That's right," she said; "it does look a little yellow, though it was folded up in blue paper; but things always do yellow so by laying. I'm glad you've got it, Sallie, for it always looks so cool and pretty."

Now was my chance. "Yes, mother," I said, scrubbing diligently at the washboard, instead of the clothes I was pretending to wash, to hide my nervousness, "and now all I shall have to buy will be a new ribbon. I shall try and alter over the old bonnet, for it isn't a bit the shape they wear now; but I suppose I can't have a new bonnet and ribbon both, though I need it bad enough. I've worn the old thing, summer and winter, for four years, and all the other girls have new ones every year. There's Laura Brainard has two a year. She asked me the other day how much longer I was going to wear this old-fashioned thing, and said she guessed Mrs. Shem wore it into the ark, and she made some of the girls laugh by saying that Mrs. Noah bequeathed her bonnet to you. I can't bear her; but oh, mother, your great big bonnet does look so old-fashioned! I do wish you would have a new one. Why can't you?"

"My daughter," said mother, calmly, but in that tone which carried a swift presentiment of denial to my heart, "we cannot afford to be fashionable so long as we owe so much, and have hardly money enough for the necessities of life. How should we look coming out in gay new bonnets and no flour or potatoes in the house? Where I am to get the money to buy the food for us to eat I don't know, now the fishing vessels don't bring us in anything. And there is that dreadful debt lying on my mind all the time, that must be paid. No, Sallie, you and I can't afford to be proud as long as we are so poor; we shall have to make our old things do a little longer."

After that I moped all the forenoon, dropping tears enough into my wash-tub to "set the colors" in the most uncertain piece of dry goods that could have lain there. But I would not give it up so, and by degrees I came to the conclusion that I must in some way earn the money myself, for a new bonnet I must have. And how to earn it was the question. My education had fitted me for a school-teacher, but there was no vacancy in the village, and mother was unwilling to have me go from home. Suddenly it flashed upon me, why not earn my living with my pen, as so many women were doing, perhaps of no better natural talents than myself. I'll do it, I thought, fired with the idea. I can write as good a story as half those who write for the magazines. I know I can do it, and I've heard that the pay of writers is very liberal, nowadays. I dare say I can support myself handsomely. Accordingly, I lay awake at night several hours, with dim plots and impossible heroes and heroines flitting through my mind, until sleep came and whirled the whole scene, stage and actors, into oblivion, and I knew nothing more until the next morning's sun shone bright into my room.

How I hurried with my work that next day—washing dishes, ironing, and baking, with a celerity that astonished mother, and led her to make the remark to some invisible person, that she "wasn't sure but Sallie would make something yet," for I had never taken kindly to housework.

After the dinner dishes were washed, and the kitchen all tidied up, mother announced her intention of going into a neighbor's to sit awhile, which was exactly what I wanted, and I was soon seated in cosy quietness, pen in hand, ready to make my fortune.

I had quite decided upon the style of my story, and glibly enough my pen dashed over the paper as I portrayed my chief characters in glowing colors. Such faces, and forms, and manners, were never before united in one glorious whole, I imagine. There were to be two embodiments of perfection of the feminine gender, of whom one was dark, proud, haughty, wonderfully beautiful and queenly; the other slight, aerial, graceful, a little fairy, in the perfection of a blonde. She should be bewitchingly childlike, carrying all hearts by storm; while a splendid hero, all arranged with pale face and classic brow, dark hair tossed carelessly back in rippled waves, magnificent from his wondrous eyes to the very curl of his moustache, was to be the bone of contention between them. Having a standard hero in my mind, I could easily describe him as all this in appearance, while he was also to be one of nature's noblemen at heart. Never ruffled, never trifling, but always dignified and grand, he would have but to be obeyed, and yet he should speak in such a winsome manner as should make every one who listened his willing and loyal slaves forever.

So the curtain rose; my actors made their début with most graceful bows, and then came a dead pause. Because I could not manage to make them talk as they do in books. Every sentence that fell from the lips of my lovely Blanche was not only childish, but insipid to the last degree. My queenly Edith, whom I had represented as flashing out sparkling repartees, and astonishing savants by the depth of her lore, chaining to her side all who approached her, seemed to have been struck dumb, for not a witticism could she be forced to utter, except one poor joke, which sounded so supremely silly that I drew my pen across it the moment it had passed her lips; and as for my hero, Mr. Ralph Worcester, I could for the life of me, only force him to lean against a pillar or the corner of the mantel, and "gaze" (Eng. stare) with those wonderful eyes of his. Once or twice he opened his lips to utter some trite aphorism, which made him seem like a stupid, commonplace man, which was far from what I intended, and I stood aghast at the discovery that my hero and heroine were turning out to be everyday-sort-of-people, who sounded just like real life when they talked, and not a bit like books. But I would not give up, and for an hour I persevered in recording conversations (?) in this style:—

"Ralph stood leaning his elbow on the mantel, his dark eyes fixed on Edith, who sat in her magnificent beauty near a work-table with some trifle of elegant embroidery in her hands. The red light from the grate danced over her face and figure, lending a glow to her usually pale countenance, while her eyes caught from it a dangerous brilliancy. She glanced up to meet his eyes fixed upon her with an expression that caused a swift blush to mantle her face.

"Just then the door opened, and Blanche came dancing into the room. She had been out, and the keen frosty air had given an exquisite tinge to her lovely face, surrounded by its wealth of golden ringlets. Her azure velvet hat, with its snowy-floating plumes, was perched jauntily on the side of her head, and the dainty furs encircling her seemed to say she was one of those whom the winds of heaven must not be permitted to handle too roughly. She came straight to the fire, saying, in a tone of childish naïveté—"

Here is where this story ends. I caused my little Blanche to make nine distinct remarks on that particular occasion, not one of which sounded in the least like any heroine of whom I had ever read. Then I turned the tables, erased the last sentence, bade Mr. Worcester, smitten with her childish beauty, utter some remark, but speech came not to his finely-chiselled lips. And the proud Edith sat as resolutely silent.

What could I do? I had described all three of these personages as fascinating in the extreme, but the reader would be obliged to take my word for it, as nothing I could force them to utter would carry out the illusion. Where do authors make their characters just what they represent them to be? Where do they get this conversational talent, so rare in life, so common in books, which makes the whole romance reading world as deeply in love with the hero or heroine as was the legitimate object of affection in the tale?

At last I gave up in despair. It was evident that this style of story-making was not my forte. When I do arrive at distinction as a story writer, I shall be obliged to employ some distinguished novelist to do the conversations while I prepare the parties for the conflict, and arrange details generally. Having decided that this was not my style, my mind naturally began to be exercised as to what sort of writing would be best suited to my capacities.

Something suggested Miss Prescott to me. Now, Miss Prescott is one of my favorites. There are a vigor and originality about her writings that I like. She is abrupt and vague, but her mere suggestions form word-pictures, and the whole scene is before you in a minute. Her conversations are decidedly out of the common way. Pithy and short, they learn one to guess at their full meaning, thus keeping the attention on the alert. True, she is posted on every conceivable subject, but I will ape her, without touching on any subject whatever, and then no one will know how much or how little information is left in reserve. Also, I had concluded to change my patronage from the Philadelphia magazines to the Atlantic Monthly. I had heard they paid their contributors $5 per page. What couldn't I do with the money I would earn? not only everything that mother and myself would need to wear, but several items in the way of furniture, badly enough needed, flitted before my eyes; a nice, soft, gay-colored lounge for mother's weary limbs to rest upon; and I even went so far as to imagine a pianoforte standing demurely on its elephantine legs against the long bare side of the best room.

The vision dazzled my eyes, and again I seized my pen. Now every one is aware that the progeny of the Atlantic Monthly are generally christened with remarkable names, therefore I was obliged to devote another hour to trying to think up a name that should attract attention and excite curiosity. At last, I decided upon one I thought to be the very thing, and here it is:—

WHY SHOULD I NOT?

The talk was of affinities. Flo cast a bewildering glance at me, and said, just under her breath: "You'd like to find yours; come, now, confess."

"That depends!"

"Ah! you're afraid to confess it, lest it shouldn't agree with previous ideas, but I know you would, nevertheless."

I looked at Flo. She was lovely, certainly, and a certain little bewitching recklessness in her air made her the more attractive; for wasn't my Dulcinea (the one who should have been my affinity, but, alas! was not) the least bit in the world prudish and reserved? I grew reckless in looking.

"I confess," I cried, "I should like to find her, but what could it avail me now? Fate has decided events for me."

"Say not Fate, rather say Avarice." The words came out hotly from the scarlet lips, which were wreathed into an expression of satire, not entirely foreign to them.

"What you will," I cried; "still, the matter is decided."

"Let us suppose, then," said Flo, changing her tone abruptly, and tearing slowly petal by petal the tuberoses she had all along been toying with—

That is the end of story second. The epitaph on this story is, "Died for want of breath," or, in other words, its enterprising proprietor became bankrupt of ideas just then. To my astonishment I found I was verging on metaphysics, which was slightly ridiculous, as I had promised myself I would eschew all subjects on which I should have gone beyond my depth at the moment of starting upon them.

Nowise daunted, I concluded to change my tactics altogether, and write a sensation story, thus:—

A RIDING FOR TO GO.

We were on the back seat, Del and I, each clinging frightened to her side of the carriage; she screaming with all her strength, I still as death, determined not to make a sound. Phil acted as driver, if driver he could be called, grasping the reins of those two unmanageable steeds with all his strength, which was as nothing in the balance with theirs, tearing along as they were as though they would never stop. Phil's face grew white as death. I saw him wind the reins again around his hands, and I saw, too, how deep the indentations made on those members already by the terrible strain. I looked at Del. To my amazement she was putting one foot out of the low side of the carriage.

"Del," I screamed, "what are you doing? Surely you're not going to jump?"

Her sole reply was to put out the other foot, clinging with her hands to the side of the carriage, while she found anchorage for her feet.

Phil looked around, and I shall never forget the white agony of his face. "Del," he cried, "don't jump! Don't try to. Sit still; they cannot go at this fearful pace much longer. They must stop before they reach!"

He did not finish his sentence, but it flashed upon me what the ending would have been. The river! it lay not far off, directly in our way. Del remembered it, too, for she burst into renewed screams and groans.

"Oh! what shall I do? The river! the river! O Susan Gray, I am going to jump," and with that, having landed one or both feet on the carriage step, she collected her voluminous skirts in one little trembling hand, and in a moment more was clinging to the outside of the rocking carriage whirling along at such a terrible pace.

"Pull on the left rein, Phil," she screamed. "Pull," and as the mad horses for a moment obeyed the sudden impetus, even though their driver implored her at the same moment not to jump, she took advantage of a momentary widening of the space between the wheels to give a spring, and, as we dashed on, I could only see her stagger a few steps, and fall forward on her face.

A groan burst from Phil's lips. "Sue, Sue, will you stay? Shall we leave her?"—

Now what was I to do? I leave it to any sensation novelist to state what was proper to be done. What I want to know is, what would one naturally do if she were run away with? Never having been run away with myself, I was quite ignorant, and, again, could one jump from a carryall in that way if so disposed? And still again, if one did, would it be likely to kill or injure seriously? And farther, would it be the most like book people to go on, or jump out ourselves in the same perilous manner, allowing the horses to finish their trot alone? And another difficulty, Philip was to have been my hero. I was the legitimate object of his affections, but he had become bewitched with the pretty Del. Must he leave me and rush to her? Another objection, I should not like a hero who was incapable of managing a span of horses, so I drew a big cross over the whole story, and set about getting tea.

Not wholly discouraged either, I found my brain prolific of ideas, which might be sorted, arranged, and made something of at a future day. But an inspiration came to me while I was washing the dishes. Of all living writers, Dickens is my favorite. Who has ever described American peculiarities and characters (ignoring American notes), bringing to light the fallacies in our institutions, making ridiculous the absurd love of money, and showing that it had become such a mania among our people? Why not have an "American Dickens?"

Fancy a brilliant satire that should set the whole literary world agog. Searching out iniquity in high places, daring to hold up to the contempt it deserves the purse-proud aristocracy of the McFlimsey set, and the harassing attempts of those less high in the social scale to step up higher. It should be so close, so true to life, that each should say to his neighbor, "It is thou," never dreaming that it meant himself as well, and all critics, silenced by its wit as well as wisdom, should give its unknown author the name of the "Dickens of America."

And why should not I attempt it? The very thought inspired me, and after tea I began. That is to say, I resumed my pen, but where to begin was the question. In my secluded corner of the world, I did not see very much of life in its grand phases. The petty affairs of village life were not at all what I was about to dissect. But I had read much, and I determined to avail myself of all I knew in that way. So, after a few moments' deliberation, I decided begin with the business portion of the comedy, and thus gradually come to the point. Angly :—

"Hobbin & Dobbs was wide awake at an early hour in the morning. Hobbin & Dobbs was never caught taking off its shutters, like the nightcap of a very lazy child, at eight o'clock in the morning, like too many of the great warehouses of the city. So far from that being the case, the rules and regulations of the store had for their very caption, centre-piece, and finale, 'Early, early, early,' in enormous capitals. 'The early bird catches the worm,' is a time-worn saying, but it caught new force when uttered by Hobbin & Dobbs.

"So from the spare old cashier, who sat at his desk with a pen behind each ear, to the tiny Dick, who opened the door and ran of errands, all were obliged to be astir at an early hour. Perhaps this infringement upon a morning nap came with such crushing effect upon no one of the many clerks and porters as upon one Timothy Kemp, Esq., who always came in rubbing his eyes, and looking as though he had only brought one or two of his senses along with him, and had left the others behind him to finish out their nap. Even Mr. Crane, who sat on the high stool next him, and was up nights with a sick child, had a gloomy collectedness that made him seem like ten times the business man he really was; but his trials were just nothing to those of T. Kemp, Esq., who did a little in the fine gentleman way, and was consequently obliged to be up late at nights calling on his lady friends, whose number, as he privately informed Mr. Crane, was so large that it took him four weeks to get round in calling upon them. Besides, the duties of receiving friends pressed heavily upon him; for how can one receive his gentlemen friends attired in a gorgeous dressing-gown with tassels at the waist, and a still more gorgeous smoking-cap on his head, negligently smoking his meerschaum, and not offer to his friends? And doesn't smoking always make one dry? And really, how could he help sending out to buy the treat that he knew would drain his purse of the money he already owed for his room rent, even though he knew what a stormy scene was in store for him with his landlady if he failed to pay?

"A fellow must dress decent if he expects to go into society, and really the firm ought to pay us enough to meet these little incidentals," muttered the unfortunate youth to a fellow-clerk, after a particularly sleepless and harassing night, which had followed a particularly gay and festive evening, of which T. Kemp, Esq., had been the acknowledged lion. But the unsympathizing clerk did not lend his ears to the grievances of this pet of fashion, and, looking about for some one to whom to confide his grievances, his eye chanced to fall on the little Dick aforesaid, who looked up to him, with a species of veneration amounting to awe, as one who was on familiar terms with nearly every family on Fifth Avenue and Madison Square, which was not precisely the case.

"Indeed, this young gentleman, for want of a better listener, had on several occasions vastly entertained his small friend with various particulars in his private history; such as showing him, in the dead privacy of retiring behind a desk-lid, such an astonishing number of neckties of all the hues of the rainbow and many other colors, which he remarked had been made for him by the fair fingers of his lady friends, carelessly mentioning that these were just nothing at all to what he had at home. He even darkly hinted that a certain young lady, who was 'very fond of him,' threatened to poison herself, because he wore a crimson tie her cousin made for him, instead of the scarlet ones she had herself made. Indeed, he made little Dick's eyes roll up in his head to a fearful extent by adding solemnly that he had no doubt but that she would have been a corpse at that moment, if he hadn't pacified her by assuring her that it was wholly a mistake; he intended to have worn scarlet. Also he showed visiting-cards—real, printed cards—with these words on them:—

(With HOBBIN & DOBBS.)

16 H Block, New York City.

So that whether it was actually Hobbin & Dobbs who were in the employ of T. Kemp, Esq., or T. Kemp, Esq., who condescended to be 'with' Hobbin & Dobbs, his small admirer could not for the life of him decide."

Here endeth the fourth lesson. Not by any means for want of ideas, however, but because the "American Dickens" foresees that this story could not come within the limits of any magazine or paper, but must be carried out into a book.

The "A—— D——" foresees also that it would not be possible to enlarge upon each character, and give a glance at each one's home and business life—hunt up a Tilly Slowboy and a little Neil, a Sally Brass and a faithful Agnes (all different in kinds, of course, but possessing peculiarities as wonderful)—without taking much time and pains, and, perhaps, travelling over half of this continent. It is possible, however, that it may be more profitable if published in book form, particularly if it ran through many editions. Therefore, the remainder of this brilliant satire must be withheld from the impatient and clamorous public until the "Dickens of America" shall be able to complete it. Possibly, it may be published under the title of "Our Common Acquaintance," but it is by no means positive.

Meanwhile, sealed proposals may be sent by the various publishing houses of the United States, who are ambitious for the honor of publishing said wonderful volume or volumes, to "Miss Sallie Browne, care of publisher of Godey's Lady's Book, Philadelphia."

RICHARD SCOTT.

HIS FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES.

BY EDGAR WAYNE.

I.

OUR tale is not of the mighty and the great, the high-born and the proud. If among such only there could be found incidents for a story, this were indeed a weary world; since ninety-nine persons in a hundred have no such pretensions. Our hero, though belonging to the great majority—the common folk—may, however, figure as a merchant prince before we have done with him. In its main incidents this history is true, and Dick Scott and his daughters are possibly to-day among the readers of this magazine.

Richard Scott—in the boy's vernacular, Dick—for who ever heard of a boy at school known by his true name?—puzzled over Pike and Daboll, in arithmetic; and Lindley Murray, in reading and grammar; and Noah Webster, in the mysteries of the spelling-book, in a New England district school. The erudite school committee pronounced the word "deestreek;" and on this trivial circumstance turned Dick's fortunes and misfortunes. He was the son of a widow; and although he had neither brothers nor sisters, he had cousins half a score.

These cousins were the children of parents "well-to-do;" but Dick's mother found it difficult to make both ends meet, and life, indeed, was to her a hard road to travel. Yet, with the earnest perseverance and the loving, and hopeful ambition in which widowed mothers strive for their children, she labored hard that her son should not want any advantage which a mother's effort and self-denial could procure for him. She did not, however, spoil her son; or, like too many injudicious parents, impose upon herself privations, in which he took no share. She set before him the position which she desired for him; and taught him habits of self-reliance, industry, and prudence. By assisting his mother in a thousand ways, he bore no small proportion of the expenses of their little household. His hook and line, plied at odd hours, furnished many a dinner. His little garden was faithfully cultivated, and all the waste vegetation was turned to account in feeding the pig which defrauded the butcher. The raisins in their puddings grew upon the hills on whortleberry bushes, and the sharp barberry furnished pickle and preserve. But we must not be minute in recounting particulars, which our New England readers can supply for themselves, and which all others can imagine. Where there is a will to be frugal, honest, and independent, whether in town or country, there is always a way.

Dick wore, with the courage of a martyr or a devotee, the well-saved and well-patched garments which his poverty imposed; and went without shoes with the stern dignity of a barefooted friar. He would still have gone to school, even if he must have gone wrapped in a meal sack. Before him was the glorious hope of something, he knew not exactly what; and the school annoyances and boy's buffets were to him only as the prelude to high honor at some day. The deestreek school-house was, in his imagination, the vestibule of the Temple of Fame. This idea was, however, hardly to be considered original with him, since it was the subject of the frontispiece to his spelling-book.

Mrs. Scott, his mother, was a woman of good education, and of a grade of intellect superior to that of the family into which she had married. Her husband's relations could not help respecting and loving her; nor could they fail to admire the manner in which she was training her son, nor to appreciate the honest independence with which she avoided being burthensome to her husband's family. She gave to Dick, by her advice and direction, and by the influence of her conversation and example, home opportunities far superior to those enjoyed by his companions. If Dick was the best scholar in the school, he owed his proficiency to his mother.

And if, as years went on, he came to regard his schoolmates with contempt not always concealed, that was, perhaps, only a natural retaliation. They despised his outward poverty, and he looked down on their inward emptiness. If he regarded the schoolmaster himself as no paragon of learning, it must be confessed that his estimate was not far wrong, though prudence would have kept the nature of his sentiments toward the worthy pedagogue a secret. If he considered the school committee to be rather on the order of dolts, it was surely not to be wondered at. They were solid men—so far as their pecuniary means were considered. Dick Scott, who lived under the daily reproach of poverty, could be excused for somewhat severely scanning those whose intellectual acquirements rested upon their wealth. Boyish criticism, pert and flippant, is, however just it may be, intolerable. The parson, who was a member of the committee, ex officio, could not forbear a smile at the boy's vagaries, though he was prudent enough, for his own interest, not to betray his keen enjoyment of the poor scholar's satiric character.

All these things were against Dick. His mother, more judicious, managed, while she well understood and appreciated the calibre of her neighbors, still to retain their esteem and friendship. But Dick was a boy, and until kind Nature contrives some way of introducing the human creature upon the stage of life, fully developed in body and in mind, and, from the hour of birth, full freighted in experience, boys will be boys. And they must submit to all the incidents and consequences of the troublesome condition; inflicting their quack-eries upon their mates and upon their elders, and suffering the penalty in return.

Now, among the Scotts, there was a king of Scotts. He ruled his own household, for he had no wife. He ruled all the Scotts by virtue of his broad acres, his cash, and stocks, and bonds, and mortgages. And, under color of affection for him, all the Scotts, to quote an old joke, loved the very ground he walked upon. He ruled the town, since he held persuaders, in the form of claims, upon a sufficient number of voters to control any election. Of course he was one of the school committee, as his name was stereotyped upon the ballots of the citizens for every office which he could hold. He was as much a lordling, by prescriptive right, as if he had been born to command, and his birthright had been recognized.

Uncle Scott really liked our hero's mother, and, in his consequential way, rendered her a great deal of welcome assistance. He would have patronized her, but she had a graceful mode of so receiving his kindness, as, while she showed her gratitude, to force him, in despite of himself, to feel obliged to her for accepting his courtesy. He might even have attempted to marry her, but she left no opening for such a proposition; and all the other Scotts lived in a constant state of apprehension and of manœuvring against such a consummation.

Uncle Scott had his own ideas of generosity and of public spirit. These ideas, though to himself vast, were not astounding to other people. We are afraid that Uncle Scott was what the Yankees call a "nigh," or a "stingy" man. He could have liked young Dick as well as his mother, for the boy's industry and frugality were after his uncle's own heart. And what Dick did from dire necessity, and the hope of bettering his condition, his uncle regarded—for he could see no other motive—as done for the love of money. In Uncle Scott's mind that love was the root of all good, instead of all evil. All the other Scotts, however, brothers and sisters, and nephews and nieces, took care that Uncle Scott should lose no circumstance of poor Dick's ill report. They certainly extenuated nothing; but the rest of the injunction, to set down naught in malice, was not heeded by them. So poor Dick did not rank, on the whole, very high in the favor of his bachelor uncle.

II.

So stood matters in a certain year, just when the annual school examination was pending. Mr. Scott had increased the public expectation and interest, by announcing that he should present a prize to the boy who should be pronounced the best pupil in the school. It was a great matter to Dick; not indeed to be declared the best by men whose opinion he did not greatly value, but really to be the most proficient. He had diligently applied his hours to study. The parson, sympathizing with his laudable ambition, had given him gratuitous lessons in the branches which the not very extended curriculum of the school did not include. Every disinterested person took it for granted that Richard Scott would win his uncle's magnificent prize without a contest, whatever that prize might prove to be. But the schoolmaster was inwardly resolved that Dick should do no such thing, if he could prevent it. And Uncle came to witness the ordeal, of which he was to be one of the arbiters, heartily hoping that Dick would fail. For, on the evening before, the graceless lad had been only restrained by his mother's eye, from openly scoffing, in his uncle's presence, at teacher, committee, and the whole thing.

When the trial took place the contestants were soon narrowed down to two, Dick and another. All that could be done by the teacher, who conducted the examination, was done to favor Dick's rival. And Uncle Scott interrupted with cross questions—cross in a double sense—which put him on exhibition, rather than the scholars. The obedient committee, seeing which way King Scott leaned, were too loyal not to favor their master, though in so doing they also exhibited themselves. The parson was on pins, and in mortal terror for his favorite; for Dick managed to make the ignorance of his examiners awfully ridiculous. The parson, the doctor, the lawyer, the pedagogue, the boy himself, and his mother, were the only persons who could appreciate the points of the ludicrous exhibition. The schoolmaster could not indeed take in all; but he could not fail to perceive that he himself was in no small degree shown up before the lawyer, the doctor, and the parson, and he vowed in his heart that he would throw the young tartar if he could. What the judges desired to do was palpable enough; but, awed by the village professionals, they did not quite dare to do it, and the sympathy of the audience was entirely with our hero. As a way out of the dilemma, King Scott proposed that the decision should be left with the minister, trusting that, at the very worst, the reverend gentleman would pronounce the issue undecided, and the honors equal.

But the parson, abetted by the unspoken though evident support of the doctors of medicine and of law, though one-fourth of his salary came from Uncle Scott, and though he knew exactly what he was expected to say, had the unparalleled audacity to decide in Dick's favor. There were dark looks in the faces of the committee, but pleased countenances over all the rest of the house. For the boy had fought a good fight and won it.

And now Uncle Scott was forced to redeem his word and present the prize. He had intended a speech, but was not equal to the occasion; and with a few, and those not very hearty words, he arose, and, calling Dick, presented the lad with a SILVER HALF DOLLAR! He paused for a reply, if, indeed, the successful contestant, overpowered by the great man's munificence, could find words to make one.

Dick solemnly bowed. And holding up the coin, so that all might take in its vastness, he modestly expressed his doubts whether he were entitled to so magnificent a premium, particularly as so much undue favor had been extended to him in the contest, and the judges had evidently been with him all along. And he concluded by saying, "I therefore return to you the ample token of your liberal heart, with the understanding that the princely sum shall be invested in good securities, and the annual interest be applied to the purchase of a medal, to be called the Scott Medal, and presented to the most deserving pupil in the de-ees-treeck school!"

Mrs. Scott nearly fainted. The parson was seized with such a fit of coughing as would have justified a modern congregation in sending him abroad for his health. The audience, joining the scholars, with no fear of King Scott before their eyes, broke out into laughter loud and long. The examination was over, and it is hardly necessary to say that Richard Scott went no longer to the "dees-treeck school."

And now Dick had time on his hands, but more care than time. The time he did and could employ, in assisting his mother and in improving himself. He dared to hope that there might be some town in America where there was no uncles and cousins to put him down; and in which, after a year or two had given him the approach to manly appearance, he might even aspire to the dignity of a teacher himself. And he hoped, beyond that, to become lawyer, or doctor, or even minister; for he was familiar with the history of the men who, under adverse circumstances, have fought their way up.

But he was filled with care and anxiety by the perplexity of his mother. She, good woman, was daily badgered by people anxious to know what she would do with "that boy." She had no fear that Dick would not do well enough for himself and herself too. But the pearls of their twilight thought, and the prophecies they read together in the evening ashes; the dreams of fame and competence and honor which comforted the mother and child in their poverty, she could not bring forth to be trodden under unfeeling feet. So when asked, she answered nothing. And the question was still put, half in reproach, "What will you do?" Death, the great demonstator, solved the riddle, so far as the mother was concerned. Mrs. Scott died—and her doing was done.

III.

SHARP lads turn sharp corners. There is an old proverb which says of the clever lad, "He will either make a spoon or spoil a horn." Quite as many horns are spoiled as spoons made, we fancy, by those who exhibit undue precocity, except when they are blessed with very judicious parents. If they have the misfortune either to keep indiscreet guardians, or to lose good ones, there is great fear for them.

Richard Scott, when he entered upon manhood, was neither doctor, nor lawyer, nor clergyman. He was a journeyman shoemaker; as good a trade as any for one who has a liking for it, and who holds to the maxim, that whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well. Dick had no liking for his business, and did not care whether his work was done well or not.

At the time when his mother passed away, all hearts were softened to the dying widow and her orphan child. Uncle Scott, who was not, when left to himself, a bad or an unkind man, consoled her last moments with the promise that he would care for her child, and see that he was suitably provided for. The world and the flesh are subdued among decent people by sickness and death, and everybody meant well by poor Dick for at least a month after his mother died. But the personage who is usually named in connection with the flesh and the world, and who is called, in derision, the "gentleman in black," is apt to work his way in as the mourners lay aside their weeds. He comes even before, if there is any condition of dollars and cents in the way. "What will you do with the boy?" was the question which interested parties now began to ask his uncle, since his mother had ceased to have any voice upon earth. Uncle had less difficulty in answering than mother had found. The question was chiefly put by Dick's aunts and cousins, at and by the instigation of the third member of the firm World, Flesh, & Co., well known in all old legal indictments. The same spirit of the adversary prompted the answer. Uncle Scott, who had been duly appointed Richard's guardian, bound him apprentice to a shoemaker.

Richard's objections to the business selected for him were thought ridiculous by everybody, his friend the parson alone excepted; and the parson knew that the secret hopes of Richard were better kept secret, and buried with his mother. And the more Richard rebelled against the provision made for him, the more exasperated grew that protean creature—the public. The village was unanimous against a beggar who would be a chooser; against an ingrate who despised the kindness of his friends, and who objected to an arrangement which insured him a good home and a good trade. But those twilight conferences of the boy and his mother, those radiant hopes which had cheered them in their poverty, how could he give them up?

And if his mother could look down upon him—an idea he dreaded now much as he once had cherished it—if she could look down upon him, must she see her statesman a shoemaker? And in his boyish inexperience, he could not keep the secret of his mother's aspirations and his own.

"All right," said his uncle. "You can go to college on the interest of the money your mother left you."

This was a cruel thrust. But, then, had not Uncle Scott, when his mother's affairs were settled, advanced a dollar and a half cash to pay the balance of the last debt she owed? And had not Dick's aunts and uncles jointly contributed to give him a "bran new" suit, to say nothing of the plenishing of his scanty wardrobe from those of his cousins? And had not he boarded and visited around six weeks among them, doing nothing, except all the work which a hired farm boy would have done? College, indeed! Well, it was wonderful what a modest choice beggars could make!

Poor Dick! He had nothing but to submit. The good minister comforted him with the hint that he ought to follow his studies, even over the lapstone, and promised to continue his assistance to him. So for a while the boy strove to be content, though the jeers of his shopmates somewhat annoyed him. But the weight of his cruel disappointments fell on him at last, when one cousin saluted him in the street with "Good-morning, Doctor Awl!" Another addressed him, "Esquire Lapstone." And one graceless varlet called after him, "How does your reverence like the care of soles?" It was awful. But then Mrs. Scott, his mother, had been dead three whole months, and how could it be expected that boys should respect the orphan's grief longer than that, especially when they overheard all that their parents said upon the subject of poor Dick's daring, unconscionable, and presumptuous conduct? It was a rough experience. But Richard was not quite a fool, and so resigned himself to his fate, and tried to make the best of the misfortune he could not help. Had his mother been alive to guide him, he would have found solace in his books, and availed himself of the good clergyman's assistance. But he had a greedy ear for flattery, and soon began to regard himself as already "somebody." He was reader, orator, counsellor, and judge of appeals in all questions which came up over the "waxed ends," whether the points in dispute were history, biography, geography, religion, or politics. He sank, at last, upon his laurels, and settled into a contented "good fellow," great in the shop, if he could not shine in Congress. But all his shopmates declared that he might have risen to that and more, if he had only had fair play. Dick grew fat on such food, was satisfied with his lot, and even became almost civil to his uncle.

Sharp boys, as we have said, turn sharp corners. Richard Scott had turned his, and was on a rapid descent. The child's ambition had been broken; and for the golden dreams of his boyhood, he was now content to accept the wretched alternative of going below himself for the admiration which he coveted. You must have seen many such wrecks, if you have used your eyes, in pot-house oracles and tap-room umpires.

Dick's uncle died. The man was buried, and his will was read. Dick was among the legatees, and his legacy was—that same half-dollar! The young man was almost stunned with anger and mortification. He moved not, said nothing, heard nothing more. The legal verbiage of the remainder of the document sounded in his ears, but made no impression on his senses. He was shut up within himself, and his mother seemed to come and comfort and encourage him. The bustle at the conclusion of the reading awakened him from his reverie. He walked out of the house, no one presuming to speak to him, and from that hour his mind was settled, and his heart resolved. He would not be conquered by the mean and miserable arts of those who had supplanted him. His own conscience told him that he had given them in his conduct but too good a base for their envious operations, and all the man in him was stirred up to defeat their unfriendly expectations.

The half-dollar was tendered to the legatee, forthwith, though no legacy is due under a year, at least. The executor maliciously said that he thought he might take the risk in a case like this, as the means of the estate were ample for this disbursement. If the man expected either a surly, a witty, or a complaining reply, he was disappointed. Dick accepted the half-dollar, punched a hole in it, and nailed it to his bench. "While I keep this," said he to his shopmates, "I shall not be out of money. And we won't mention Uncle Scott again, if you please."

His companions thought that Richard was paying more respect to his uncle's memory than it deserved, by keeping himself aloof from all his old haunts. As time wore on, they saw a deeper purpose. Some thought he was "growing serious," as they discovered that he was at the minister's house once or twice a week. Others thought that he was studying law, as he had been seen several times to go to the squire's. We may anticipate a secret, which in due time was proclaimed upon the rooftops. The squire, like all country lawyers, was a conveyancer, and agent for procuring money. The first small mortgage (these things always begin in small sums, as small leaks sink great ships), which was executed on the Scott property in the hands of his cousins, was drawn in favor of Richard Scott, Squire Lapstone, Doctor Awl. We need not follow all the steps by which the young man retrieved himself.

But the half-dollar marked the second sharp corner round which Richard turned; this time up hill instead of down, and, wonderful to say, but true, the up hill was the easier. Try it, young man, and you will find it so.

Richard's legacy proved more valuable to the legatee than any other named in the will of Thomas Scott, yeoman, deceased, testate, and paid over by the executor with will annexed. It was the foundation of the fortune of Richard Scott, Esq., whose name is good for tens of thousands; and whose fine literary and artistic taste, and whose elegantly yet chastely furnished mansion, show that, because a man can make a shoe, it does not follow that he knows nothing beyond his last. The minister, his lifelong friend, rejoices in him pecuniarily as one of the most liberal and public-spirited men in his parish, and morally and religiously edifying the church. And all men honor his generous and discriminating philanthropy.

The half-dollar is still in existence. Richard Scott had a mind once to adopt it as a trademark. But just then he happened to read Dickens's "Hard Times," in which is portrayed the folly of Mr. Bonnderly. He avoided the disgusting egotism of boasting of the difficulties which beset his early path, and never speaks of his childhood and youth, except to honor the mother, to whom he declares he owes everything that he is or has. He is a living illustration of what mind cultivated may do in ennobling a man, and what true strength piety may give to character. Without pretence, he walks his way honored in a community which does not trouble itself about his origin.

The only boasting we hear concerning Richard Scott is from a set of broken-down cousins, who are as proud of his reputation as if they had made it for him. So they did, indeed, but no special thanks are due to them. If they pay his interest, well for them; and if not, he does not press them. The whole combined estates bid fair to fall of their own weight into his possession some day; but the property will not all stay in his family, if he can find any poor Dicks among his cousins' children, or any deserving daughters.

I LOVE HER.

(Inscribed to Miss BETTIE K., of Violet Dale.)

BY B—.

I LOVE her! Yes, the warm life-blood
That in these veins of mine doth stir,
Should in one red unbroken flood
Gush from my heart for her.

I love her—love the very air
That fans her cheek or waves her tress,
The glove her little hands doth wear,
The earth her little feet doth press.

The rose that decorates her head,
And every shrub and every flower
That's bruised by her gentle tread,
Is sweeter from that very hour.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

CARDINAL CAPE (TRICOT).

Materials.—Eight ounces of violet, two ounces of black, and one and a half of white 4-thread fleecy wool, a few small skeins of black wool twisted with white silk, eighteen medium-sized black beads, two or three wooden tricot hooks No. 8 (Bell gauge), of the same length.

THE violet foundation of this pelerine is worked in tricot. The under border is worked separately, and sewn on afterwards.

Begin at the under part of the foundation with 279 stitches for the width, and work the first 11 rows plain; in the 12th row commence the requisite decrease, by which the pelerine gradually becomes narrower over the shoulders, and fits close at the throat. For this the 5th and 6th stitches on each side in the 12th row must be worked up together; then always after 13 stitches the two following must be worked up together. Upon this always after every 4 rows the 5th and 6th stitches are worked up together, and again decrease, as in the 12th row. By this means the spaces between are gradually reduced to 1 stitch, and from the 2d decreasing line care must be taken that the stitches knitted together from the middle of the back (with regard to the right and left front part) go in opposite directions. Therefore, in the first half, as far as the middle of the back, work always the stitch standing after, and in the last half the stitch standing before, with the stitches rising in straight lines from the under decreasing stitches. Continue this until 43 rows are worked, and in the 44th row leave the 10 end stitches untouched. In working off leave the 10 front stitches on the hook.

45th row. Work up and off the worked-off stitches of the preceding row.

46th. Besides the 10 end stitches previously left leave 3 more, and retain also 3 more at the beginning upon the hook. Work these 2 last rows alternately as far as the 52d row, and in the 48th row continue the decrease as far as possible.

53d. With this row work up and off all the end stitches as far as the end of the 44th row. Draw a violet wool cord of chain stitch, one and a half yard long, through the front perpendicular stitch threads of this row, and to the ends of this cord fasten woollen tassels of the same color 6 inches long, and twice bound round at the upper part with black wool twisted with white silk.

For the under border begin with 19 stitches for the breadth. For this crochet 20 single with black wool, and now work so that the under scallops represented in the design go towards the right hand obliquely, as before mentioned.

1st row. In tricot work the first 6 stitches with black wool, then, take a white reel and work up the following 6 stitches with white, then take a second black reel and work up the 6 following stitches with black, and take a second white reel and work the remaining stitches with white. All four reels remain on the work, and the stitches are always worked up and off with the same reel.

2d. Like the 1st, that is, the loop remaining upon the hook from the last stitch of the preceding row forms the first stitch of the new row; then work through the 2d perpendicular stitch thread lying in front, and so on.

3d to the 7th. In these five rows the scallop advances outwardly 1 stitch downwards; therefore, always at the beginning of this row, instead of working through the second, work through the front stitch thread standing outwards. There remain, however, as shown in the design, 6 stitches of each color, and the scallop gradually widens at the end from 1 to 6 white stitches.

8th and 9th. Plain, namely, working through the 2d stitch thread, and always 6 stitches of each color.

10th to the 14th. As the scallop must be again worked back in this row, work through the third instead of the second perpendicular stitch thread. For this the end stitch must be reversed at the first 3 times, 6 stitches always upon the first stitch of the other colors; and the white stitches at the end are reduced to 1 stitch.

15th and 16th rows like the 1st and 2d, and so on for the whole width of the bottom of the pelerine, which contains 18 scallops; then crochet on the scallop side of this a row of double stitches with violet, and over these little scallops with white wool * 1; double in the nearest 3 chain, passing over one under stitch; repeat from *; into the top of the white work little scallops with black wool twisted with white silk; * draw 1 loop through in front of the nearest double, and work off both by putting the thread round a fresh 3 chain, and repeat from the last *.

In the middle white scallops work according to the design a running pattern in feather stitch with black wool twisted with white silk; with the latter work also the little feather sprigs with a black bead in the middle in the upper white scallop; sew the border to the pelerine, and then crochet up the front 5 rows of double stitch—the 1st violet, 2d white, 3d black, 4th white, 5th violet. In working these double, inclose both the horizontal stitch threads upon the hook. The trimming for the throat is also worked separately, and sewn on. For this make a chain of 80 stitches with white wool and tricot, 1 plain row over it. In the next row work up with white wool, and work off with black twisted with white silk. In working off these stitches draw 3 loops always through the front before the following stitch of the hook is worked off with it. Work a similar pattern on the under side; for this turn the work, and crochet again through the front perpendicular stitch threads of the 1st row with white wool, and work off as before with black twisted with white.

GAITER FOR LITTLE GIRL.

Materials.—One ounce and a quarter of white Bertha wool, one skein of rose-colored flosselle, crochet hook No. 13, bell gauge.

WORK in rows forwards and backwards. The upper part is ornamented with little shells, increasing in number towards the front of the gaiter.

Commence with fifty stitches. The chain should be loose. Work the first row plain in double stitch, increasing one stitch in the last, sticking always in the back thread. The first pattern is worked at the end of the second row. For this lay the thread round the needle, stick over the first row into the last stitch but three—the forty-sixth stitch of the first row—and draw a loop through. When there are four of these double loops formed by sticking in the same stitch upon the needle, take them from the needle all together with one chain, then crochet another chain, and conclude the row with three plain stitches. The upper edge is in straight lines. At the under edge as far as the middle, increase one stitch at the conclusion of each row.

At the end of the fourth row, work two shell patterns in reversed order, and afterwards the remainder in the same manner. The first of these two patterns commences in the sixth stitch, reckoning backwards from the edge; the latter must meet the last edge stitch but one.

6th row contains three shell patterns separated by three double.

8th. Work six double to form the beginning of the gore, work back upon these six stitches, and at the end make thirteen chain to begin the front of the foot; upon this chain work thirteen double, then six double upon the six stitches of the gore, and six stitches further on to lengthen it. Work back again to the end of the foot.

From here work as far as the front middle of the gaiter three entire rows forward and two back: In the first of these three rows forward, work five shell patterns, six in the second, and eight in the third; then continue the work in the same manner in the opposite direction until you have reached the row with one shell.

The back of the gaiter requires twenty-two rows with the patterns arranged in two little scallops. Each scallop begins like the front with one shell. The longest pattern row contains five patterns. All the rows are worked in straight lines except the eleventh and twelfth. In order to widen the upper part, turn the work in the eleventh row after thirty-eight stitches; and in working back upon these, crochet a shell pattern in the last stitch but one.

When these rows are finished, sew the gaiter up lengthwise on the wrong side. Then work one row of double round the upper and under edge. For the under conclusion, crochet picots containing five chain with one double in the first chain. At the upper edge work an interrupted treble row. Make a chain with two little tassels at the ends to run into this row. Above the interrupted treble work a line of picots as before described. Then crochet two narrow straps, consisting of four rows of double, and fasten them under the foot. Each shell pattern has a cross stitch of floselle in the middle, and a line of cross stitch round the edge of the foot (see design.)

WRITING-CASE.—EMBROIDERY.

Materials.—Brown woollen reps, silk flat braid in two corresponding shades of brown, silk cordon, also in suitable colors; card-board, black silk cord, brown ribbon, etc.

are arranged in the same manner, the outer square of which is five inches and a half high, four inches and a half broad. It will be easy to work the scallop ornamented with light silk braid. A large flower fills the middle space (Fig. 1) like the corner flower, or initials may be worked in raised embroidery, surrounded with a kind of foliage in fish-bone stitch, worked with shaded brown silk.

Fig. 2.—Writing-Case—Open.

Our model is embroidered with maize silk, with black stalk stitch and black knots; the fish-bone stitch is of brown silk. Between the two sides of the cover a space is left for two lines of stitching, which forms the back of the book; but these lines must not be stitched until the entire cover is lined with the same material, and a piece of card-board pushed in, which is fastened at the same time.

The inner arrangement of the case shown in Fig. 2 is also of brown reps, and is sixteen and a half inches long and six and a quarter inches broad. A flat piece of card-board, ten inches

Fig. 1.—Writing-Case—Closed.

BOTH the outer cover sides are worked upon brown reps, measuring sixteen inches in length and eleven inches and a half in breadth.

The pattern is braided in black, while stitches of maize silk, three together, ornament the outer edge of the dark braid, and light brown buttonhole stitch the inner edge. The corner flower consists of leaves of raised embroidery, between which are fish-bone stitches of brown shaded silk; the veins and calix knots are maize color. The colors for the middle pattern and a half long and six inches broad, is gummed underneath exactly in the middle.

The narrow stuff part that turns over is fastened with fish-bone stitch in maize color, and, with the piece of the material that turns over at the sides, forms a pocket for sheets of paper, envelopes, etc. The outer edge of the case is ornamented with silk cord; a narrow ribbon is placed in the middle of the case. For holding the blotting-paper, white moire paper is put in as a cover for the blotting-paper. Little elastic straps are placed for the pens, etc. The nibs of the pens are put in a little pocket of cloth and pasteboard, which forms the pen-wiper also, see design. At the other end is a pocket for steel pens.

TOILET CUSHION.

(See Plate Printed in Colors in front of Book.)

Materials.—A piece of very fine white Swiss muslin nine inches square, a little rose-colored Shetland wool, a very fine rug needle, a half yard of narrow white braid, and one yard of white silk fringe.

The design (which consists of sprays of leaves in the centre, surrounded by Vandykes, having a single leaf in each), must first be drawn on paper thus:—

Draw a circle 5 inches in diameter, in which draw four sprays of three leaves, each spray occupying the space of one-quarter of the circle. Let the stems incline towards the centre, as seen in the engraving. Now draw eight Vandykes round the circle, in each of which draw a single leaf to correspond with those in the sprays—the leaf running to the point of the Vandyke, which should be about two inches deep.

The design being thus prepared, place it under the muslin, on which trace it with a fine black lead-pencil or a brush, and indigo mixed with thin gum-water.

Now remove the paper, and with the Shetland wool chain stitch the sprays and single leaves in the Vandykes very finely. Take a piece of white braid sufficient to go round the circle, and with the wool slightly and loosely work a row of open buttonhole stitches on one edge of it, and run it neatly round the circle, taking the two ends through the muslin, as it is difficult to fasten braid invisibly. Cut away the muslin between the Vandykes, leaving sufficient outside each to form a narrow turning which must be made on the right side of the cushion. On this turning lay the white silk fringe, and run it neatly round each Vandyke, making the edge exactly cover the mark forming the outline of the Vandykes. Now make a cushion of strong white linen, sufficiently high to allow the fringed points to touch the table; the bottom of it may be covered with rose-colored silk, and the top and sides with white silk or satin. Fill it tightly, but not too hard, and tack the circle round which the braid is sewn to the top of the cushion, allowing the points to fall over. Make a pretty knot of rose-colored and white ribbon mixed, tack in the centre, and the cushion is complete.

It is impossible to describe the chaste and elegant appearance of this simple cushion when made; and we feel sure our fair young friends will acknowledge it to be a pretty specimen of the many ornamental and useful articles which may be made at very trifling expense both of money and time.

The cushion may, of course, be made to suit the drapery of any room by substituting any other colored wool, ribbon, etc.

WORK-BASKET.

Materials.—Silver glazed perforated card-board (canvas à la jardinière), green chenille, green satin ribbon, four-fifths of an inch wide, green sewing silk, thin card-board; white calico, narrow green ribbon.

THIS work-basket, in the shape of a star, is covered with silver glazed perforated cardboard, which is embroidered with green chenille in the manner seen in the illustration. Cut first the bottom and the cover of the basket of both plain and of perforated card-board; and the border, which must be four inches deep, and long enough to correspond to the outer edge of the star parts, which forms the cover. All the different pieces of card-board must then be covered with calico. Then join the border with overcast stitches on to the bottom of the basket, and ornament the pieces of perforated card-board with embroidery, as seen in illustration. When the different parts are completed, fasten them on to the pieces of card-board with overcast stitches, bind the upper edge of the basket with green silk ribbon, and join the seam by a ruche of green satin ribbon; a similar ruche is sewn on the edge of the cover. The basket fastens with a crystal button and a loop of white elastic. Lastly, sew on the handles, which consist of strips of perforated card-board, trimmed with ruches of green ribbon.

SHIRT-BOX.

Materials.--Leather or cashmere, either green or brown, silk cordon to match, curled cord, gold cord. If the case be made at home, card-board, white glazed paper, and stiff linen must be added.

Fig. 1.—Shirt-Box (Closed).

THE box should be just large enough to hold the number of dress shirts required for packing.

It may be made by a lady, but is better purchased of a portmanteau-maker.

It may then be covered with cashmere, leather, or velvet, embroidered. The initials of the owner should be in the middle of the box cover.

ORIENTAL TABLE-COVER.

(See Plate Printed in Colors in front of Book.)

Materials.--Knitting cotton No. 4, three meshes, two fist, one-half an inch wide, the other an inch and a half, and one round mesh No. 14, twenty-seven skeins of Berlin wool, three of each of the following colors: peach, green, plum, yellow, claret, dark blue, pink, light blue, and scarlet, a large rug needle, and a netting

ON a round foundation of 23 stitches with the half inch mesh, net 2 plain rounds.

3d round. Round mesh, plain netting.

4th, 5th, and 6th. The same.

7th. Half-inch mesh, 2 stitches in each.

8th. Same mesh, 1 stitch in each, missing the first, netting the next stitch, and returning to the missed one all round.

9th. Round mesh, 1 stitch in each.

10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th. The same.

14th. Half-inch mesh, 3 stitches in each.

15th and 21 succeeding rounds. Round mesh, 1 stitch in each.

37th. Wide flat mesh, 3 stitches in each.

38th. Round mesh. Net 3 stitches together missing the first 3, netting the 3 next, and returning to the missed 3, continue all round.

39th. Round mesh, 1 stitch in each.

40th and 4 succeeding rounds. The same.

The top part of the cover is now netted, and there remain but the points to net.

With round mesh net 13 stitches, and instead of continuing the round, return on the 13 stitches, missing the last. Continue backwards and forwards on these, always missing the last till you have but one stitch left on the mesh. Cut the cotton and fasten the end; take up the next 13 stitches, and make another point, and continue the same all round the cover.

Now commence the darning. Thread the rug needle with green wool, and insert it in the 5th mesh from the centre (which is where the two knots are visible in one mesh), and darn 3 meshes upwards to the right, filling the meshes closely with wool; then in a line with the first of these 3 and upwards to the left darn 2 meshes, each separately, in order that all the darning may lean to the right.

Having done this there will be one mesh left in the middle of the green Vandyke, which darn in plum color. Darn 6 of these round the centre of the cover. Between the lower points of each Vandyke there will be three diamonds, darn the middle one in dark blue.

Now in the 12th mesh (where the 3 knots are seen in one mesh), with scarlet darn a diamond of 4 meshes to the right; do the same in every 5th mesh all round.

As before, there will be 3 vacant meshes between the lower points of each scarlet diamond, the centre one of which fill with dark blue, and above the dark blue spot darn a Vandyke of 4 meshes in claret.

In the 36th round of netting darn close diamonds of 9 meshes (leaving a space of 3 meshes between the lower points of each), of different colors, in the following order: peach, green, plum, yellow, claret, dark blue, pink, light blue. There are 33 diamonds required in the round; it will therefore be necessary to work these 8 colors 4 times, which will leave one still vacant; this one may be darned in scarlet.

Miss 3 meshes upwards from one of these closely-darned diamonds, and darn 6 meshes to the right, then 4 meshes in an opposite direction from each point of the 6 already darned, thus three sides of a diamond are formed; complete the 4th side by darning 6 meshes.

There will be 17 diamonds, which may be darned thus: yellow, dark blue, scarlet, green, peach, claret, light blue, pink. Repeat these colors twice, which will leave one to do; this may be done in plum-color.

This will leave an open diamond of 16 meshes (4 each way), the centre 4 of which darn in 2 colors, the two opposite each other in one, and the other two in a good contrasting color.

There is always a slight irregularity in round netting, which will cause the first diamond to appear scarcely even with the last. This, however, cannot be avoided, and is not discernible except on very close examination, and does not at all affect its appearance when on the table. It will also be found necessary to lessen the space between the open diamonds, one mesh in two instances, as if there were two more meshes it would cause an irregularity in the close diamonds.

The top part of the cover is now finished, and the points only remain to be darned.

Between each point darn a close diamond of 9 meshes, the lower point of which will hide the fastening of cotton at the commencement of the netted point.

At the end of every point darn an open diamond of 4 meshes, and knot a tassel in the last mesh of each point composed of 4 strands of each color used in darning.

This cover is quickly done, and has a very foreign and elegant appearance.

NEEDLE CASE WITH EMERY CUSHION.

THIS pretty little case is very practical; it can be carried in the pocket. It is made of card-board of a square shape, about two inches and two-fifths high, with a well-fitting cover, and ornamented with point russe embroidery on glacé silk. The top of the case is cut out on the four sides, as seen in Fig. 1, which shows the case without the cover. Inside the case place a smaller card-board box filled with emery; the top of this box is covered with glacé silk. Between the box filled with emery and the needle case, place four papers filled with needles, as can be seen in Fig. 1. On the

Fig. 1.—Needle Case with Emery Cushion—Open. Outside the case is covered with colored glacé silk, embroidered with point russe, see Fig. 2.

Fig. 2.—Needle Case with Emery Cushion—Closed.

The pieces of silk are joined together at the corners of the case with fine buttonhole stitch.

LETTER FOR MARKING.

SKIPPING-ROPE OF GRAY COTTON, COVERED WITH RED WOOL.

Materials.—Spanish bamboo or cord, red fleecy wool, gray cotton.

FIG. 2 shows one end of the skipping-rope. It consists of a piece of Spanish bamboo or cord, one yard and thirty-two inches long. The ends must be covered with cotton, so as to form the handle, which are then covered with thick gray cotton, drawn on very tight, and fastened underneath the knob. Then begin to darn the handles, from Fig. 1, with gray cotton, beginning in the middle of the top, and then work on with red wool. When the handle is completed, cover the bamboo or cord with buttonhole stitch of red wool, working over one double gray thread, always working two buttonhole stitches in every other button stitch; loop; these two stitches must be alternated in every round, as can be seen on Fig. 1. Loops of red wool finish off each handle at the bottom.

Fig. 2.

KNITTED OVERSHOE.

THIS is intended to be drawn over a boot or slipper for evening parties. A pattern should first be cut of the boot worn, and the shoe knitted from that, in double rip of any plain color. A cork sole is sewn in at the bottom. The border around the top is of open crochet, in scarlet wool, and a rosette of scarlet on the toe.

INFANT'S BIB.

MADE of quilted piqué; the edge finished with narrow points, made of the piqué.

AN ARTICLE ON FOOD.

(Concluded from last month.)

Existence upon vegetable food alone is much more common than that upon animal food alone, and, indeed, is the rule with many nations and people, who unquestionably maintain high strength and vigor upon it; it is, in fact, only requisite to look at the grass-eating bull to feel convinced of the possibility of the fact, and, did space permit, it would be easy to cite abundant confirmatory examples; but if man lives on vegetables he must, like the vegetable-eating animal, consume a comparatively large bulk to obtain sufficient nutriment; and so it is, the Irishman and the Hindoo must eat seven or eight pounds of potatoes, or of rice, at a meal. These, however, are extreme instances, for potatoes and rice are comparatively inannutritious, containing much starch and—especially the latter, when cooked—much water; the cereal grains and pulses, on the other hand, possess albuminous principles largely—the gluten of the former corresponding to the animal fibrine, and the caseine of the latter to the curd of milk. Those persons, therefore, whose vegetable food is composed chiefly of the above, require, of course, to consume less, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that man may lead a most active and healthy life upon a grain diet alone, and especially if it be combined with milk. But what is possible may not always be expedient, nor suited to man's circumstances, and on this hinges the argument respecting the nature of food on which man ought to live. No physiologist would dispute, with those who maintain that man ought to live on vegetables alone, the possibility of his doing so, or that many might not be as well or better under such a system than any other; but no physician acquainted with the requirements and constitutions of men generally, who live according to the usages—certainly it may be allowed too artificial—of this and other civilized countries, will allow that a vegetable diet could become the rule to the majority without serious injury. The healthy active countryman constantly exercised in the open air will do well on a vegetable diet, under which the city artisan or man of business, the delicate woman, the pale, perhaps scrofulous, child would become diseased, or sink and die. Their organs of digestion and assimilation cannot extract from the vegetable mass sufficient blood-nourishment, neither do they receive sufficient stimulation from it. It may be contended that the evil is an artificial one, engendered by artificial life; that may or may not be the case, but so the question stands at present, and as man generally is circumstanced at the present day, he will best consult his own comfort, convenience, and usefulness, by using a mixed diet, the power to use which has been bestowed upon him by his Creator. He will, if possible, consume albuminous material, animal food in quantity sufficient to supply the waste of his bodily, especially muscular, tissues; but will mingle it with such respiratory food, that is, saccharine, or starchy, and oleaginous substances, as will supply the carbon and hydrogen requisite for animal temperature, without his being compelled to undergo the muscular exertion of the half savage hunter.

In the consideration of the principles which ought to regulate man's food, and which do regulate the nourishment of his material animal body, there has been omitted—for the sake of avoiding confusion—all notice of an important and generally distributed component of the animal frame, the gelatinous, or Jelly principle. This, which enters mainly into the composition of the skin and tendons, and which forms the animal constituent of the bones, belongs to none of the principles already enumerated; and although it contains nitrogen, is much simpler in composition than albumen. In the form of isinglass, gelatine, or glue, it is familiar to all. As gelatine enters largely into the constitution of the animal body, it must, of course, be a valuable, if it is not an essential, addition to its means of nutriment, when taken in the food, and especially as a substitute for albuminous nourishment, which must, in its absence, be used up in supplying nutriment to the azotized gelatinous tissues. The only other constituents of food it remains to notice are the mineral elements—salts of iron, potash, soda, lime, magnesia, etc., and with them, sulphur and phosphorus; these must be, and they generally are, afforded to the system, along with nutriment generally.

To review the principles which regulate food and nourishment: We have vegetables as the first agents for taking up the elementary forms of matter, and combining and transforming them into such components as are suited to the digestive organs of the vegetable subsisting animal which consumes them, and in which they are built up into the blood-filled animal frame, of muscle, nerve, and bone, ready for the consumption of the carnivora, or flesh-eaters, and to yield sustenance suited to the wants of man. We have these nutrient principles, consisting of albuminous compounds, fitted to nourish albuminous tissues, gelatinous to nourish gelatinous, and saccharine and farinaceous to supply the matter of fuel, and to take part in all the other operations of the system, or to be stored up as fat. Lastly, we have water, the aqueous principle, as the necessary medium without which these varied operations could not be carried out.

To apply these principles to man, we find him so constituted as to be able to maintain health and life on animal food alone, or on vegetable food alone, but we also find him fitted by organization to subsist on a mixed diet, such as is most in accordance with the habits and usages of civilized communities.

In the selection of food, however, it is not sufficient that it contains the principles necessary for the nutriment of the body, but these principles must be reducible by the digestive powers; it matters not that wood fibre nearly approaches starch or gum in composition, or that horn contains albumen largely, if the firm texture is not soluble in the stomach; and the same argument modified applies to food generally—forms, indeed, that consideration with respect to it which comes under the designation—DIET—that is, the facility or the reverse with which certain articles used as food are digested. To the strong and healthy, this is within certain limits a matter of comparative indifference; to those who suffer from weakened digestion—and they are very many—it becomes a matter of paramount importance, as one on which comfort and even life depend. The subject has engaged a large share of the attention of medical men, and is too extensive to be fully treated here; the aim of the author, therefore, is rather to point out the principles on which diet should be regulated, than to descend to special minutiae; and these he is more willing to omit, from the fact that these minutiae are greatly matters of individual peculiarity, which vary in each one; and which must and ought to be matters of well ascertained personal experience.

Thus, we find that some stomachs are perfectly unable to cope with fatty matters, but do well with the acid or saccharine; a certain class, again, seem quite at ease with milk, which throws others into a fee-ment; even mutton, the most digestible of all meats, has, in a case within the author's knowledge, invariably produced vomiting when eaten, however disguised.

As a general rule, food is digested with more difficulty in proportion to the tenaciousness of its structure, whether owing to natural conformation, or insufficient mastication, or faulty preparation or cooking. Vegetables require more digesting than animal substances, but they remain a shorter time in the stomach itself, undergoing a great portion of the process after they have passed from that organ, whereas animal food leaves it perfectly digested. This is partly the reason why a meal of animal food satisfies hunger longer than one composed of vegetables, but something is also due to the position which the stomach holds with respect to the system generally. If the desire for food is sympathetic with the wants of the body at large, the animal food which better supplies those wants, must do so for a longer period than the other.

Variety in diet is requisite for health. A single article of nutriment, even though it contain all the requisite elements, can scarcely be long used exclusively as food, without injury to the digestive organs, or even danger to life. Brown bread with water is perhaps an exception.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Spiced Beef.—Procure a piece of thin flank of beef, about ten pounds in weight, which salt for about a week. When ready, split it open with a knife, and lay it out flat upon a dresser, having previously prepared six onions chopped very fine, with about ten sprigs of parsley, and the leaves of ten sprigs of thyme, the same of marjoram, two ounces of mixed spice (without cinnamon), and half an ounce of black pepper. Mix all together, spread half upon the beef as it lies before you, then fold it over to its original shape, lay on the remainder of the preparation, roll it up tightly in a cloth, and boil. When done, take it up, remove the string, tie the cloth at each end, and put it upon a dish, with another dish over, upon which place a half hundred-weight, leaving it until quite cold; then take the meat from the cloth, trim and glaze it lightly, and serve garnished with a few sprigs of fresh parsley.

Roman Pie.—Boil a rabbit; cut all the meat as thin as possible. Boil two ounces of macaroni very tender, two ounces of Parmesan or common cheese, grated, a little onion, chopped fine, pepper and salt to taste, not quite half a pint of cream. Line a mould, sprinkled with vermicelli, with a good paste. Bake an hour, and serve it with or without brown sauce. Cold chicken or cold game may be used for this pie instead of a rabbit.

Sauce for Wild Duck.—A teaspoonful of made mustard, a teaspoonful of essence of anchovies, a pinch of Cayenne pepper, a tablespoonful of good mushroom catsup, and a glass of ordinary claret. Mix the mustard and anchovy essence thoroughly in a saucepan, add the Cayenne, then the catsup, a few drops at a time, the claret last; warm up, and pour very hot over the duck, having previously sliced the breast.

Scotch Broth.—Set on the fire four ounces of pearl barley, with six quarts of salt water; when it boils skim it, and add what quantity of salt beef or fresh brisket you choose, and a marrow-bone or a fowl, with two pounds of either lean beef or mutton, and a good quantity of leeks or cabbages, or you may use turnips, onions, and grated carrots. Keep it boiling for at least four or five hours; but if a fowl be used, it need not be put in till just time enough to bring it to table when well done, for it must be served up separately.

Economical Veal Soup.—Boil a bit of veal that will make a fricassee, pie, or hash; when tender, take out the meat and slip out the bones, put them back in the kettle, and boil gently two hours; then strain the liquor, and let it remain until the next day; when wanted, take off the fat, put the soup into a clean pot, add pepper, salt, an onion, half a teacupful of rice, a tablespoonful of flour mixed in water, dry bread, and potatoes.

A Beef Cutlet.—Take a rib of beef, beat it a little to make it tender, lay it in vinegar for six hours, then take it out, and have prepared bread-crumbs, parsley, pepper, salt, and a little onion; rub yolk of egg over the cutlet, and strew the above ingredients well over it; put it in a tin tray before the fire for an hour and a half, turning it occasionally. Serve it with rich gravy.

Breast of Mutton may be stewed in gravy until tender; bone it, score it, season well with Cayenne, black pepper, and salt; boil it, and while cooking skim the fat from the gravy in which it had been stewed; slice a few gherkins, and add with a dessert-spoonful of mushroom catsup; boil it, and pour over the mutton when dished.

Venison Steaks.—Cut them from the neck; season them with pepper and salt. When the gridiron has been well heated over a bed of bright coals, grease the bars, and lay the steaks upon it. Broil them well, turning them once, and taking care to save as much of the gravy as possible. Serve them up with some currant jelly laid on each steak.

Gelatin of Veal.—Bone a medium-sized breast of veal, take off the scrap, and trim; lay on it two large slices of lean ham, make a forcemeat of one pound of pork sausage, sweet herbs and parsley, the juice and rind of a lemon chopped very fine, a little Cayenne, pounded mace, and the whites of three hard-boiled eggs cut quite small; mix the whole well together, spread it over the ham, and lay the hard-boiled yolks of the eggs along the centre; roll the veal up, and bind it with a tape; sew it up in a cloth, stew gently for four hours, and place it under a weight till cold.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Sweet Biscuit.—One pound of flour, half a pound of sugar, two eggs beaten, a teaspoonful of caraway seeds, and a quarter of a pound of butter. Mix all well together, roll the paste thin, and cut it into round biscuits; pick them, and bake them upon tins.

Quaking Pudding.—Scald a quart of cream; when almost cold, put to it four eggs well beaten, one spoonful and a half of flour, some nutmeg, and sugar; tie it close in a buttered cloth, boil it an hour, and turn it out with care, lest it should crack. Serve with wine sauce.

Almond Cakes.—Rub two ounces of butter into five ounces of flour and five ounces of powdered lump-sugar. Beat an egg with half the sugar, then put in the other ingredients. Add one ounce of blanched almonds and a little almond flavor. Roll them in your hand the size of a nutmeg, and sprinkle with fine lump-sugar. They should be lightly baked.

Lemon Honeycomb.—This is a very simple dish, and makes a pleasant variety on a supper-table. Sweeten the juice of a lemon to taste, and put it into the dish in which it will be sent to table. The white of an egg must be beaten into a pint of rich cream and whisked; as the froth rises it is to be placed on the lemon-juice, and has a light and pretty appearance. It is desirable to prepare this dish the day before it is required, and a few of the very small ratafia biscuits, strewed over it just before it is sent up, are an improvement.

Puffs.—One ounce of sweet almonds, blanched and pounded, with a dessertspoonful of orange-flower water. Then add two tablespoonfuls of flour, four eggs (but the whites of only two) beaten separately, one pint of cream sweetened to taste with white sugar, and beat all very well. Bake this quantity in six large teacups, and serve very hot with butter and sugar sauce.

Lemon Honey.—Half a pound of sugar, two ounces of butter, one egg, two lemons; grate the rind and extract the juice from both. Put all into a brass pan, and let it simmer from fifteen to twenty minutes.

Very Nice Cakes.—One pound of flour, half a pound of butter, half a pound of sifted sugar, half a pound of currants, four eggs, one blade of mace. Mix the sugar and flour together; rub the butter well into the mixture, add the currants, pound the mace, beat the eggs for twenty minutes, form into small flat cakes, place on a well-buttered tin, and bake half an hour in a quick oven.

Apple Cream.—Boil twelve apples in water till soft; take off the peel, and press off the pulp through a hair-sieve upon half a pound of sugar, whip the whites of two eggs, add them to the apples, and beat all together till it becomes very stiff and looks quite white. Serve it heaped up on a dish.

Dutch Cake.—Six ounces of butter and lard mixed, four eggs, half a pound of flour, half a pound of sugar. Beat the butter and lard to a cream, mix it with the eggs well beaten; then add the flour and sugar, both warmed, and a little nutmeg and cinnamon; when well beaten, add a spoonful of brandy, and bake a full hour in a buttered mould in a quick oven.

Wee Puddings.—Quarter of a pound of flour, quarter of a pound of butter, quarter of a pound of sugar, two eggs, rind of a lemon; beat for twenty minutes, half fill teacups, and bake for twenty minutes.

Short Cakes.—Dissolve half a pound of fresh butter in as much milk as will make one pound and a half of flour into a paste; roll it out about a quarter of an inch thick, and cut it into large round cakes. Cook them in a frying-pan, and serve them hot. They are eaten with butter.

CONTRIBUTED.

Cheesecake Pie.—To one bowl of cheese, take four eggs, add sugar to make them quite sweet; beat the cheese, sugar, and yolks of the eggs together, adding a small piece of butter; beat the whites of the eggs to a froth and add them last; sprinkle cinnamon on the top; if not quite soft enough, add a little milk or cream.

Lemon Pie.—The juice and grated rind of three lemons, three cups of water, three tablespoonfuls of corn-starch, three cups of sugar, three eggs, and a cup of butter; boil the water, and mix the corn-starch with a little cold water, and stir it in when it boils up; pour it over the sugar and butter, and after it cools add the eggs and lemon. Bake with two crusts.

French Cream.—One quart of boiled milk, mix one cup of sugar and yolks of four eggs together; stir them into the milk with one tablespoonful of corn-starch, flavored to taste; drop the whites of the eggs in a pan; stir a little sugar in the eggs, brown them in the oven, and put them in the custard.

White Mountain Cake.—One pound of flour, one of sugar, six eggs, half a pound of butter, one teaspoonful of soda, two of cream of tartar, and one cup of milk.

Indian Cake.—Two cups of Indian meal, one of flour, one pint of milk, two eggs, two spoonfuls of cream of tartar, one of soda, and one tablespoonful of butter.

K. M.

Muffins.—One quart of milk, three eggs, one cup of yeast, a lump of butter the size of an egg, and flour enough to make a batter.

S. H. E.

Silver Cake.—Whites of eight eggs, two and a half cups of flour, two of white sugar, one of sweet milk, half a cup of butter, and a heaping teaspoonful of baking powder.

Gold Cake.—Yolks of eight eggs, two cups of flour, one and a half of brown sugar, one of sweet milk, half a cup of butter, and a heaping teaspoonful of baking powder.

Icing Cake.—Half a pound of crushed sugar, three tablespoonfuls of boiling water, whites of two eggs; let the water and sugar boil until almost like candy; then drop in the eggs, when beaten stiff, continue to beat while dropping. This is to spread between the cake.

Mrs. J. W. B.

Washing Zephyr Goods.—An item of general interest to ladies is, that all zephyr articles—hoods, breakfast capes, etc.—may be washed without shrinking or fulling, by simply using cold water and Castile soap, instead of hot water, as is generally used. No steaming is necessary afterwards.

Mrs. J. B. C.

Jelly Cake.—One cup of sugar, three teaspoonfuls of melted butter, three eggs, one cup of flour and one teaspoonful of cream of tartar beaten together; add two teaspoonfuls of milk, with half a teaspoonful of soda, just before baking. Bake in thin sheets; spread jelly on, and roll it up while warm.

E. F. K.

MISCELLANEOUS.

To Remove Stains from Ivory.—Take a piece of common white chalk, and scrape or pulverize it in order to obtain a powder. Add as much water as is required to produce a paste; apply the paste to the surface of the ivory. If the stains are very bad, two or three, or perhaps more, applications may be required. The result will be a pure white ivory without injury to the polish, or the necessity of scraping.

Bran Tea.—A very cheap and useful drink in colds, fevers, and restlessness from pain. Put a handful of bran in a pint and a half of cold water, let it boil rather more than half an hour, then strain it, and, if desired, flavor with sugar and lemon-juice; but it is a pleasant drink without any addition.

Flaxseed Jelly for a Cough.—A coffee-cup of flaxseed, two quarts of water; boil several hours until reduced to a jelly; strain through a thin cloth, squeeze in the pulp and juice of a large lemon; roll a quarter of a pound of the best raisins, mix them in the jelly, simmer without boiling one hour; strain again, add half a teacup of the best loaf-sugar. Take a tablespoonful every hour.

To Soften the Hands.—Half a pound of mutton tallow, one ounce of camphor gum, and one ounce of glycerine; melt, and when thoroughly mixed, set away to cool. Rub the hands with this at night. It will render them white, smooth, and soft.

To Get Rid of Fleas.—Pennyroyal scattered under the carpet, between the bedding during the day, and worn in small packages about the person or persons where fleas abound, will completely relieve the sufferers.

QUESTIONS OF IMPORTANCE.

Two questions are now stirring public thought. That men are not women, and women are not men, will, we think, be admitted by the warmest advocates of extremes on either side. Then, however equal in ability and worth the sexes may be, there must be some difference in their offices and their daily employments.

To ascertain the limits of woman's scope, we must ask what she ought to do, and what she ought not to do. What is for her only to perform in the world's progress, and what is to be left wholly for man? What offices and employments can man and woman advantageously perform together? The first of these questions may perhaps be made clear to many minds, if we consider the instincts given by the Creator to women. That they are more religious than men is proven by their preponderance in all churches; that they are more pitiful, more gentle, more attached to family life, and better fitted to train children, who will deny?

Do not these considerations show woman's place to be in the schools and the hospitals, in the supervision of charities, and especially in the medical profession? Let man "ride the whirlwind and direct the storm;" woman comes after the battle, and heals the wounds his passion or his patriotism has inflicted.

Our positions have been so fully set forth in a letter we have lately received, that we shall take the liberty to make an extract. Our correspondent is a professional and scientific man, whose contributions to philological science are well known.

AN ILLUSTRATION.

"I hold that a nation is, or is intended to be, one great household, and that in the work of the national household, each sex has its own appropriate part. To find out what this appropriate part is, we have only to observe what duty falls naturally to each sex in a private household. The man is expected (1) to provide the income, (2) to protect the family, (3) to do the hard out-door work. The woman has for her duties: (1) to train the children, (2) to attend to the sick, (3) to do the light in-door work. Now, each of these departments of duty has its corresponding department in the national household. Let me put it in a tabular form, and you will see my whole theory at a glance:—

WORK OF THE NATIONAL HOUSEHOLD.

Man's Department.	Women's Department.
Revenue.	Schools.
War, Police, Judiciary,	Hospitals, Charities,
Public Works.	Economic Supervision.

"By economic supervision, I mean a department which has been too much neglected by the State, just because women have not done their proper duty. It is only of late years that any attention has been paid to sanitary and moral requirements in building houses (especially for the poor), in the regulations of emigrant vessels, in prisons, etc. Since women like Mrs. Fry, Miss Nightingale, Miss Rye, and others, have taken up these subjects, something has been done, but a vast deal more remains to do."

The views of our correspondent as to the means of achieving the results differ from our own. We may return to the subject another time. At present we would only add a few words. When to woman's household and religious duties are added those of schoolmistress and doctress, with a share in the supervision of all public charities, in education, and in all associations, for promoting intellectual and moral good, and for suppressing or ameliorating the evils of humanity, will she not have a field of action wide as her nature requires for its best development? If so, would it not be for the honor and happiness of both man and woman that the former should take up the task of righting "woman's wrongs," and giving her the educational advantages she requires for her own improvement, than that she should rush into the arena of politics, and strive to win her way to them through the rough machinery of suffrage?

BOOKS FOR HOME READING.

WE are often asked to lay down a course of reading for families and for young people. We have already done so, and we refer our readers to our book, "MANNERS," published last year by Messrs. Tilton & Co., for a thorough list of the standard writers in each department. Something more than this, however, may be needed. So many books are every month published and read, and contemporary literature has naturally so many attractions, that a running commentary, continued month by month in the pages of the LADY'S BOOK, in which volumes worthy of family perusal are selected from the mass and briefly described, has been often asked for. It is our intention to give such a summary every month for awhile under the title at the head of this article. It must of necessity be very condensed. If our readers wish a more detailed account, we refer them to publications like the Publisher's Circular of Mr. Childs. Here they can find the names of all the new books, literary announcements for the coming season, and a notice of French and English books such as they could nowhere else obtain.

We will begin with a volume which combines natural history, travels, and adventures. The author's name is a German one. The most prominent feature of German knowledge is thoroughness. A German savant is not satisfied if anything remains to be said on the subject, and he often chooses a narrow and precise topic that nothing may escape him. Where the scope of his work is larger, he thinks a lifetime well spent over his treatise. The book we have before us is a striking example. Doctor Hartwig's "Polar World" is a book which must have cost its author years of labor. It is "a popular description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic regions of the globe." The natural features of those desolate regions, where man is the only animal of great interest or importance, are graphically described. The inhabitants are sketched, from the Lapps and Samoyedes of the Eastern Hemisphere to the Esquimaux and Indians of Arctic America, and finally there is a detailed and interesting account of the discoverers and explorers by land and sea of the Polar World. Those best known to us, such as Franklin and Kane, have their place and tribute; but still more interesting, because to most of us new, are the stories of Castren, the Finn philologist, and of the Cossack conquest of Siberia by the robber Yermak. To a naturalist, an explorer, or to a general reader, the book is alike interesting and valuable. To families, for whom we are now catering, the stories of adventure and hairbreadth escapes, with which it abounds, will make it a pleasant companion for the long winter evenings, while it has this great advantage over many exciting volumes, that in every particular it may be depended on. What our boys and girls especially want is more fact and less fiction. Here they receive knowledge as useful as it is pleasant. The book is published by Harper & Brothers.

OUR MOTHER IS NOT GROWING OLD.

BY MRS. MARY CRAM.

Our mother is not growing old,
The garment that she wears
May have a wrinkle in some fold
And here and there some tears.
For flesh and blood are worse for wear
When worn for fifty years;
They show the marks of time and care,
And oft are stained with tears.

Our mother is not growing old,
Her nature keeps its charm;
Her loving heart is not more cold,
As fondling is her arm
As when we clustered by her side
In years long, long gone by,
And looked upon her with such pride,
And only looked that high.

For we were only little ones,
But we are older now;
The grown-up daughters and the sons
Still see the mother's brow;
But we can now look higher up
For pleasant paths we've trod,
And so much sweetness in our cup
Has made us look to God.

We are a happy household band,
With one we loved the best,
Gone first unto the spirit land
To wait there for the rest;
The one loved best, for two were one,
The husband and the wife,
The knot can never be undone
Of such a married life.

And when that blissful day shall come,
When life for each is o'er;
When each one has arrived at home
To separate no more;
The dear face that has long been hid
Beneath the churchyard sod,
Shut from us by the coffin-lid
Will welcome us to God.

But flesh and blood can enter not
That sacred, hallowed sphere,
Oh, most blest is their blessed lot
Who to that rest are near!
Then as our fleshy garments wear
We'll bless each wrinkled fold,
Look kindly on each stain and tear
And smilingly grow old.

For age can only last a while,
God's promise is all truth;
His promise to souls free from guile
Is an eternal youth;
Then let a hymn, a sacred song
To holy age be sung,
For growing old will not last long,
The sainted are all young.

AN EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG LADIES.

THE Art School of Mr. Van der Wielen, in the Artists' Fund Building, on Chestnut Street opposite the U. S. Mint, is well worthy of a visit on the part of any who take an interest in the progress of true art in this country. Beginning with first principles, it aims to conduct the pupil through all the legitimate and essential steps of study and practice to the higher branches of finished culture. It is no "Painting in Twelve Easy Lessons" affair, but an honest working school, where all who are willing to apply themselves and go through a certain amount of patient work, may attain the highest degree of excellence that their native abilities fit them for. The rooms are large, well-ventilated, and admirably lighted; the supply of objects and models full and carefully chosen, and the supervision of the master constant and severely critical. The majority of his pupils are young ladies, many of whom, of course, have simply entered upon the study as amateurs, while quite a number intend making art their profession and means of livelihood.

An experiment in this direction is being most successfully prosecuted in an adjoining apartment, where three ladies, Misses Wyman, Lee, and Beeson occupy conjointly a very desirable studio, which the results of their labors in different departments of art, displayed upon its walls, render also very attractive to the visitor. The first mentioned artist devotes herself more especially to portrait painting, and a striking likeness of her late instructor, Mr. Van der Wielen, sufficiently attests the fact that she has not mistaken her vocation. Miss Lee has given her attention more especially to landscape painting, and shows a number of highly successful studies from nature and color sketches. It is, however, in the cognate art of illumination that she has come more prominently before the public. Several of her works in this line have already been published, and this season one of the choicest of the gift-books is her "Illuminated Christian Year," just brought out by Duffield Ashmead. Miss Beeson is at work on a subject of some difficulty, which, however, she is treating with the hand of a master. It is an effort to represent Margaret listening to the suggestions of the tempter. With a considerable insight into human nature, the artist has chosen the time when the poor girl would be most likely to be off her guard, being engaged at her devotions in church. The public will ere long have an opportunity of judging for themselves of the merits of the finished picture. Meanwhile we can but assure any of our amateur readers that they can rarely spend a few spare moments more pleasantly or profitably than in the studio of this trio of pioneers. Should any reader of the LADY'S BOOK chance to visit Philadelphia during the season, she will find the Art Studio a place of interest, pleasure, and improvement.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

NEW WORK FOR WOMEN: The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—The quarterly meeting of the Women's Branch of the above society was held yesterday at No. 1320 Chestnut Street. Mrs. Caroline E. White presided, and Miss Elizabeth Morris acted as Secretary.

The report of the president, which was read, set forth that through the assistance the society had received, it had been enabled to perform a great part of its work, and to employ an additional agent, who was very active. The society numbers 500 members, many of them young ladies. The board of managers is not yet full, though several have been added to it, nor is the roll of country vice-presidents complete.

The society has published 2500 little books entitled "Early Lessons in Kindness," 2000 copies of "The Horse's Petition" and "Take Not The Life You Cannot Give," and 1000 picture cards containing the photograph and story of "Gray Friar's Bobby," a Scotch terrier, who slept upon his master's grave for seven years and a half. It is proposed to distribute them gratuitously among schools of all denominations, and permission had been asked of the Board of School Controllers to distribute them in the private schools, which was referred to a committee, and will probably be acted upon at an early date.

We are much gratified to hear of the progress of the society, especially of the Women's Branch. Women are naturally kind-hearted, and the sex ought to be active helpers in the hard task of enforcing the laws against brutality and cruelty to the creatures committed to our care. We shall refer to the society in another number.

ALL who wish to see women take an honorable place in one of the highest of human professions—a profession to which, in special departments, she is peculiarly adapted—will rejoice in one of the latest decisions of the Edinburgh University:—

"The question of admission of women to the study of medicine in Edinburgh University was lately discussed at great length at the half-yearly meeting, Oct. 29th, of the general council. Professor Mason stated that in the examination which had just taken place women had come better through than the men. On a vote the amendment was carried by a large majority, and women are to be admitted."

FEMININE EDUCATION.—The Ladies' Educational Association of London last year gave two courses of lectures to women. On the course of English literature 102 students attended, and on Physics 58. This year courses of 36 lectures each will be given on Latin, Geometry, French Literature, English Literature, Physics, and Chemistry.

MISS GARRETT has founded two scholarships for women who wish to study medicine in London.

MRS. HENTZ'S NOVELS.—T. B. Peterson & Co. are now republishing, in a beautiful binding and in clear, handsome type, the works of this popular American novelist. Mrs. Hentz's books were public favorites at the time of their issue, and this edition has been loudly called for. Four volumes have been issued, and the remainder are being published at the rate of two each month. We congratulate the many admirers of Mrs. Hentz upon the near prospect of possessing a handsome edition of her writings. There is not a line in their pages that can offend the taste or unsettle the principles of a young girl, while yet there is incident and variety enough to keep up her interest in the story and her sympathy with the characters.

"GREAT MYSTERIES AND LITTLE PLAGUES."—This curious book about children (see Literary Notices, page 291) has novelty and variety that will teach parents some new ideas. We give a few "pickings:—

"A little boy, whose father was bald-headed, was sent to have his hair cut. 'How would you like to have it cut, my little man?' said the artist. 'Like papa's, with a hole in the top,' said he.

"A little nephew of ours went with his sister to school for the first time. They kept him there five mortal hours. On being asked how he enjoyed the school, he answered: 'Petty well, I thank you, but I dot awfully rested.'

"A little girl, having been told by her mother that she was always surrounded by guardian angels, grew very thoughtful, and, after drawing a long breath, looked up and said: 'Mamma, do you mean really that all the whole time they are with me?' On receiving a solemn assurance in the affirmative, she exclaimed, with an impatient frown: 'Well, really, I should like to be alone a little while, sometimes.'"

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted, and will appear when we have room: "Ruth's Aspirations"—"Only Hope"—"Just Now"—"Under the Snow"—and "Not Love."

The following we shall not need: "On the Wings of the Wind"—"A Day of Rest"—"Noontide"—"Spring is Here"—"Song"—"My Only Trust has Fled"—"The End" (The MSS. are returned)—and "C

"A Present Ill may be a Future Blessing" is declined. If the author wishes it returned, will please send twelve cents in stamps.

"The Lost Receipt." No stamps to return MS.

"An Angel Unawares." No letter and no stamps.

"Pictures." No letter and no stamps.

"Ellie's Lover." No letter and no stamps.

"My Grandfather's Story." No letter, no stamps.

"A Matter of Rejoicing." No letter, no stamps.

NOTICE.—Manuscripts must in all cases be accompanied with the name and address of the authors, and stamps for their return, if not accepted. The utmost care will be taken and all possible expedition used with regard to them; but it must be understood that the Editor is not responsible should a MS. be mislaid or lost.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

CORNS.

BY DR. CHAS. P. UHLE.

WITHOUT being ambitious of the office or honors of a "Corn Doctor," allow us a word respecting them—not the "doctor," for undoubtedly the generality of people see and hear quite enough of this transitory genius—but of the corns themselves, certainly as great a nuisance.

It is an anatomical fact, very generally understood, that corns are nothing less than indurated and thickened cuticle, and are invariably produced by the skin being pressed and rubbed by hard and irritating substances, as in the case of the integument of the foot by the shoe, and particularly when the part itself is unable to yield sufficiently, in consequence of its seat over a bone, to escape the pressure or friction.

Dr. Coale thus clearly and intelligently illustrates: "If, when unaccustomed to using it, we employ our hands with any mechanical tool, we find that where it exerts a pressure against the skin, a blister is raised; that is, the sensitive skin, and more particularly its papillary layer is stimulated to pour out a fluid which separates the scarfskin from it. If the blister so made be left alone, in a few days it becomes dry, and in time the raised scarfskin peels off, leaving beneath it a new one somewhat thicker and harder than the first. If now we go on using the tool, the spot becomes harder and larger, and, in fact, forms a thick pad for the protection of the sensitive skin. So far it is an admirable and kind provision of Nature to meet her necessities. But Nature, as kind as she is, will not be imposed upon, will not permit herself to be overtasked. If the tool is used too constantly this hardness or callosity which she put there to protect the more tender tissues beneath, will become inflamed and painful, and any pressure upon them will cause great suffering. If, in spite of this warning, it is still further and constantly excited, all the unpleasant symptoms will be aggravated to a great degree, and a permanently diseased condition of the parts result."

Now, just what Dr. Coale has been describing, is substantially the history of every corn; the shoe binds or chafes (for chafing, as we have said, will cause a corn as well as pressure, a loose shoe as well as a tight one), and a callosity is created on the irritated part. If the warning is taken, the corn may be prevented and the part will return to its natural condition. But unfortunately at this stage it excites little attention. Even when the pain commences it is generally felt at first only during the daytime, when some extra demand has been made upon the feet; but at night it is easier, and the prospective sufferer is sleepy, the thing is forgotten or disregarded, and so time passes until a thorough-bred corn is established. If examined at this time a little translucent spot will be observed in the centre. This is termed the core, and upon removing the layers of epidermis which cover it a little cavity is seen, in which it is not an uncommon thing to find a quantity of fluid—like the blister upon the hand above described—sometimes extravasated blood. When these fluids are removed the surface of the under layer of the skin, congested and tender, is seen to be exposed.

The art of the chiropodist consists in dislodging the core or root, as they sometimes term it. They attach much importance to this operation, for, they say, "unless it be removed the corn will return again."

Sometimes corns give rise to serious consequences; when seated upon joints they often induce inflammation of the structure entering into the formation of the articulation. Prof. Wilson, renowned the world over for his superior knowledge upon all diseases of the skin, "once dissected a corn which had made its way into the joint, and had produced absorption of the articulating end of both bones."

Now, as to the treatment of corns, and, first of all, wear a proper fitting shoe, one that is not so tight as to bind the foot, nor, on the opposite, so loose as to chafe it. The importance of this step must be obvious to all when it is taken into consideration that from these causes originates the primitive trouble. It is useless to attempt to get entirely rid of a corn without attention to these precautionary measures, for whatever may be gained by well-directed remedies towards a cure, the corn, if exposed again to exciting causes, will start in its growth as luxuriant and as uncomfortable as ever. There are, however, certain limited measures that are available at all times, and which afford comparative relief. The very best is to proceed as follows: Whenever the corn becomes congested and painful, soak the feet well in warm water at night, and with a sharp knife—a razor is best, and we would advise every one afflicted with corns to keep one for this purpose—pare down all the indurated skin as close as possible without drawing blood, then wet a cotton rag with a solution of cream of tartar—one teaspoonful of cream of tartar to one teacup of water—and bind it around the corn till morning. A piece of oiled silk bound over the whole would be a good addition, if it is at hand. Now apply what is generally known as a "corn plaster" (they may be obtained at any druggist's), and nothing more will you hear from your "cause of all evil" until the plaster becomes hardened and pressed down so as no longer to keep off the irritation and pressure of the shoe. It will now become necessary to apply a new one—perhaps to soak the feet and pare down the corn again—and thus these palliative procedures may be continued indefinitely with entire relief from pain or inconvenience.

Close adherence to this plan of treatment for a reasonable length of time would undoubtedly effect a radical cure of the corn; but in most cases the moment relief is obtained, or the moment the corn is freed from inflammation, corn plasters and their appurtenances are the last things thought of.

As regards the "corn salves," and "cures," and "solvents" which are daily thrust in our faces, we would say, "put them far from you, they are no good; and are gotten up by a class of individuals who have more of an eye to the proceeds than the quality or merits of their medicine." So says Mrs. Grundy.

Literary Notices.

From LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

PUCK: his Viciissitudes, Observations, Adventures, Conclusions, Friendships, and Philosophies. Related by himself, and edited by "Ouida," author of "Strathmore," "Idalia," "Tricotin," etc. Terribly uncharitable towards women, ridiculously lenient towards men, and with the most distorted views of morality in general, Ouida is undoubtedly a brilliant and original, though somewhat extravagant writer; and we can only regret that so much ability is perverted to ends that we cannot but regard as destructive to the well-being of the social and domestic virtues.

COMPENSATION; or, Always a Future. By Anne M. H. Brewster. Second edition. In this volume, a very gracefully told story is made the thread upon which to hang its author's views in regard to the theory, practice, and sentimental aspects of music. It will be read with interest by those whom nature has gifted with those peculiar sensibilities of temperament which are necessary to a full and feeling appreciation of musical aesthetics.

THE PROFESSOR'S WIFE; or, It Might Have Been. By Annie L. Macgregor, author of "John Ward's Governess."

HELEN ERSKINE. By Mrs. M. Harrison Robinson. A novel written, we are led to infer, by an American authoress, the scene of which is laid in England. The conversation between the titled characters is lively and interesting. If this is a first effort, and we understand it is, it is a good one.

RUSSET LEAVES. By James Pummill. This is a very acceptable collection of pieces in prose and verse, simple and unpretending in style, yet always graceful and charming, and well worthy of the superior typography and handsome binding in which they appear. The book contains many fine illustrations, which add greatly to its attractiveness.

From CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAPPELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

WESTBROOK PARSONAGE. By Harriet B. McKeever, author of "Silver Threads," "Children with the Poets," etc. This is in some sort a controversial novel, the antagonistic elements being Low-Churchism and Ritualism, of the former of which the author is especially the advocate.

NANNY'S CHRISTMAS.

VELVET-COAT, THE OAT. After the French of Madame Melanie Dumont. By Lois Harnard.

Two very pretty stories for children. The last mentioned, however, is marred by the introduction of quite a number of French words, not to be understood by the common run of children, and which could have been given in English by the exercise of a little ingenuity on the part of the translator.

SLOAN'S ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW AND BUILDERS' JOURNAL. No. 7 of the second volume of this periodical has been received. The Swiss designs for cottages are pretty, and well adapted to certain portions of our country. The article on bridges deserves attention. Altogether the information imparted in the pages of this periodical is calculated to produce a better style of architecture throughout the United States.

From J. P. SKELLY & Co., Philadelphia:—

THROUGH PATIENCE. By Faye Huntington, author of "In Earnest; or, Edith Palmer's Motto," etc. A book for young women, quite attractive in its narrative, and inculcating the beautiful truth that it is only through patience that we rise to the heights upon which is built the celestial City of God.

From THE AMERICAN OPERA PUBLISHING COMPANY, 19 N. Sixth Street, Philadelphia:—

GEMS OF THE LYRIC DRAMA. Volume I. No. 1. Fra Diavolo. Romantic opera in three acts. Composed by D. F. E. Auber. Containing text, overture, and principal music, vocal and instrumental, as performed by English grand opera companies. Edited by Geo. W. Tryon, Jr. This is the first number of a new periodical, to be published once every two months, and devoted to the pictorial, typographical, and musical illustration of the most popular operas as produced by the English opera companies. Every number will contain the libretto of the opera complete, together with a sketch of the plot, and notice of the composer and his works, to which are added sixty-four pages of engraved music, embracing the overture and all the principal airs for voice and piano, and for piano alone.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

NEW RECEIPTS FOR COOKING. By Miss Leslie. Comprising all the new and approved methods for preparing all kinds of soups, fish, meats, poultry, cakes, confectionery, etc. etc., with much useful information on all subjects whatever connected with general housewifery.

From PETER E. ABEL, Philadelphia:—

THE AUTOGRAPH OF WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE, with Fac-Similes of his Signature as appended to various Legal Documents; together with 4000 ways of Spelling the name according to English Orthography. By George Wise. A very curious pamphlet, which will no doubt obtain, as it deserves, a wide circulation.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., and PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By Lord Lytton. With Latin text from the editions of Orelli, Maclean, and Yonge. These translations of the Roman poet will, perhaps, prove more acceptable to the classic scholar than to the general mass of the readers of poetry. Exact, finished, and elegant, as they undoubtedly are, they scarcely meet the requirements necessary for popularity among those who read English only.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, the Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With illustrations. A story of India life, full of stirring adventure, and deeply interesting.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, author of "Jesus of Nazareth: His Life and Teachings," etc. With designs by Doré, Delacroix, Durham, and Parsons. A series of spiritedly-written dissertations, bringing into prominence certain portions of the narrative of the Old Testament which may be considered as bearing upon the plan of redemption as manifested in the life of Christ. The book is handsomely printed, and contains numerous illustrations of the finest character.

A GERMAN COURSE; adapted to Use in Colleges, High Schools, and Academies. By Geo. F. Comfort, A. M., Professor of Modern Languages and Aesthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa. In the preparation of this volume, its author has aimed to incorporate the most judicious views and principles of linguistic instruction as held by the best writ-ters upon philology, and the best practical educators in Europe and America. The course consists of practical lessons for learning to read, write, and speak the German language, familiar conversations in German and English, models of letters, business forms, selections from German literature, a compend of German grammar, tables of German moneys, weights, measures, a brief survey of the history, characteristics, and dialects of the language, and, in short, all that would seem necessary to thoroughly ground the student in the language.

KITTY. A pleasant and finely-written novel, by M. Betham Edwards, author of "Doctor Jacob," etc.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ALFRED TENNYSON, Poet Laureate. With numerous illustrations. A truly handsome yet cheap edition of the great poet's works, complete, containing "The Holy Grail," and all his latest productions.

MEDORA LEIGH; a History and an Autobiography. Edited by Charles Mackay. With an introduction, and a commentary on the charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. Another addition to the Byron scandal literature, which will no doubt attract considerable attention.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. We have received the monthly part, No. 9, for December, of this excellent illustrated journal.

THE BOOK OF SNOBS. By W. M. Thackeray. Cheap edition, in paper.

TITANIA'S BANQUET, PICTURES OF WOMAN, and Other Poems. By George Hill. Third edition, revised and enlarged. We have to thank the author for a copy of this little volume of poems. The fact that a third edition of it has been called for would seem to be a sufficient guarantee that it possesses the elements of popularity. It certainly contains much true poetry, and there is a richness of fancy in "Titania's Banquet" that strongly reminds us of the poets of the Elizabethan era. Mr. Hill, too, is a lover of nature, sympathizing kindly with it in all its aspects, which he depicts with a delicate and a feeling hand.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE WONDERS OF POMPEII. By Marc Monnier. Translated from the original French. This forms one of the "Illustrated Library of Wonders," now in course of publication, and which has already attained so great a popularity.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—

BUTTERFLY'S FLIGHTS. By the author of the "Win and Wear Series." In a neat case, with clean print and handsome binding, Messrs. Carter have issued a series of books for children, which will, we think, amuse and interest them greatly. "Butterfly," a little girl, went to Mount Mansfield, Saratoga, Niagara, Montreal, the seaside, and Philadelphia. We will not deprive our little readers of their pleasure by telling them what she did there; but will merely say that in addition to the amusement they will take in the books, they will learn also all that children care of the places to which Butterfly went, and will hope some day to follow the route of her journey.

WORDS OF COMFORT FOR PARENTS BE-REAVED OF LITTLE CHILDREN. Edited by William Logan. Of this book, Dean Alford says: "This charming book originally sprang out of a bereavement, which has indeed brought forth choice fruit. * * * It is one which would form a precious gift to bereaved friends, and will be admitted into counsel with the wounded heart at a time when almost all words, written and spoken, are worthless."

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

MIRTHFULNESS AND ITS EXCITERS; or, Rational Laughter and its Promoters. By B. F. Clark, Pastor of the Congregational Church, North Chelmsford, Mass. This is a tolerably fair collection of anecdotes of clergymen, lawyers, doctors, literary men, and others, with specimens of Irish wit, extracts from the writings of Nasby, Josh Billings, and many miscellaneous pleasantries.

THE "B. O. W. O." A Book for Boys. By the author of the "Dodge Club," etc. Illustrated. A lively, spirited, and entertaining book, which cannot fail to please the class of readers for whom it was designed.

SABBATH SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S WORSHIP. A New Book of Hymns and Tunes for Sabbath Schools. By Leonard Marshall, Director of Music at the Tremont Temple Church, Boston, assisted by J. C. Proctor and Samuel Burnham. With suggestive exercise for Sabbath School concerts.

From ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston:—

THE PRIMEVAL WORLD OF HEBREW TRADITION. By Frederick Henry Hedge. Doctor Hedge is well known as a New England clergyman of cultivation and ability. In this volume he has taken up the Biblical narrative of the first ages of the world, and attempted to show what truth it contains, and how we should understand it. The book is beautifully bound and printed, with the side line so popular in England.

GREAT MYSTERIES AND LITTLE PLAGUES. By John Neal. Mr. Neal's book, as the title suggests, is about children. It is made up of an article called, "Children—what are they good for," a story of a little girl, and a collection of anecdotes concerning the clever and striking speeches of children. These last make up the bulk of the volume, which is adapted expressly for children, and will, no doubt, be popular among them. (See Editor's Table, page 288.)

From NICHOLS & NOYES, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

PATER MUNDI; or, Modern Science Testifying to the Heavenly Father. Being, in substance, lectures delivered to senior classes in Amherst College. By Rev. E. F. Burr, D. D., author of "Ecce Cælum." In two volumes. Vol. I. The thousands who have been fascinated by the "brilliant pen photographs of the wonders of the heavens," as presented in "Ecce Cælum," will eagerly welcome a new and equally attractive work from the same source. In it he proposes to defend and illustrate both Theism and Christianity from the side of modern science.

From LORING, Boston:—

THE TRUE STORY OF MRS. SHAKSPEARE'S LIFE. An amusing trifle, taking off Mrs. Stowe's Byron mystery article.

From W. J. HOLLAND, Springfield, Mass.:—

PERSONAL BEAUTY: How to Cultivate and Preserve it, in accordance with the Laws of Health. By D. G. Brinton, M. D., Editor of the Medical and Surgical Reporter and of the Half-Yearly Compendium of Medical Science, late Surgeon U. S. V., and Medical Director of the Eleventh Army Corps, Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, etc.; and Geo. H. Napheys, M. D., Chief of Medical Clinics of the Jefferson Medical College, Member of the Philadelphia County Medical Society, author of the "Compendium of Modern Therapeutics," etc. etc. This, perhaps, is the completest work of its class that has yet been presented to the public; certainly none so full and so reliable has been published on this side of the Atlantic. "We have endeavored," say the authors, "to furnish such an abundance of simple and harmless, yet efficient aids for the toilet, that the dependence on secret and injurious nostrums may be dispensed with, and the beauty of the body cultivated more in accordance with the principles of correct taste and sound health than is now the case."

From BROWN & GROSS, Hartford, Conn.:—

WIDOW GOLDSMITH'S DAUGHTER. By Julia P. Smith. Mrs. Smith has written a novel of American society. She does not name the State to which her characters belong, but from their conversations and various other hints, we suppose it to be either in New England or the West. The heroine is a shy, awkward, dreamy girl, the daughter of a grasping and covetous woman, but learning from her mother rather to avoid than to imitate her example. The book is made up of scenes and descriptions of life in a new country, where the want of polish and high education is compensated by straightforwardness, manliness, and simplicity. We congratulate Mrs. Smith upon the natural and lifelike portraiture, and predict for her book a warm reception.

From the Author, Hanover, N. H., and LEE & SHEPARD, Boston:—

ECCE FEMINA: an Attempt to Solve the Woman Question. Being an examination of arguments in favor of female suffrage, by John Stuart Mill and others, and a presentation of arguments against the proposed change in the constitution of society. By Carlos White.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

MARCH, 1870.

THE March number is up to the highest standard; no falling off. The engravings, both steel and wood-cut, cannot be approached. We are determined that no one of our brethren shall outstrip us. A steel plate, a six-figure fashion-plate, a colored plate of fancy work, a fine wood engraving of a stormy March day, a plate of children's dresses, and the incomparable extension sheet of the latest styles make up the ornamental part of this number. With all these, we give a variety of useful designs in the work department.

Two ladies in Brentfield, Vt., paid subscriptions to LADY'S BOOK to a person calling himself Henry W. Wood. We have no soliciting agents, and have not had for twenty-five years.

THERE has been little, in the way of steel engravings, ever published by us that has given so much satisfaction to our subscribers and the press as that portrait in the January number. We have been tempted to record this fact from reading so many kind letters from our subscribers, and also notices of the press, warmly commending it. Appreciating fully their kind feelings, we tender them our sincere thanks.

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVING.—We have received from Messrs. T. S. ARTHUR & SONS a copy of their premium engraving for 1870. It is called "Bed-Time," and will by many be regarded as more beautiful and artistic than "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," their picture for last year, which proved so great a favorite. "Bed-Time" represents a mother with her sleeping babe in her arms, carrying it lovingly to its nightly resting-place; and the artist has given it a tender interest that wins the heart of every lover of children. It is large and richly engraved, and when framed will make an ornament fit to grace any parlor in the land. This picture is given as a premium to all who make up clubs for Arthur's Home Magazine (the best two dollar ladies' magazine in America), The Children's Hour, or Once a Month. Every subscriber to these magazines has the privilege of buying this elegant picture for $1—the regular selling price is $2 50. By special arrangement with T. S. Arthur & Sons, we have secured for all who subscribe to, or purchase the LADY'S BOOK, the privilege of procuring this excellent picture for the low price of $1.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—It is very appropriate that the fortieth year of this favorite old companion should be signalized by the publication of a portrait of the worthy founder. Mr. Godey's genial figure, with all its merry embonpoint and its wise head-shake, is planted on the frontispiece, and seems to welcome the throng of tried friends and true who have stood by him so long. The picture is a steel-plate, and does justice to Mr. Godey's person by presenting nearly the whole of it. The gay old littérateur is represented sitting at his editor's table, examining manuscripts, and appearing capable of accepting everything before him out of pure good nature. This plate, to most subscribers, will be a cherished memento. Another steel engraving, representing five tableaux of winter all in a group, is very artistic and beautiful. And the magazine is filled with a wonderful Christmas-stockingful of fashions, work-table models, recipes, and all the specialties which have earned its two-score years' success. A story by Marion Harland will be found among the literary contents.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

CAPITOL BUILDING AT WASHINGTON.—We have been presented by Gutekunst with a copy of this picture, which we have no hesitation in pronouncing the most beautiful photograph ever taken in this country. It is even better than that of the Ledger Building by the same artist. It is of good size for framing, and a copy of it everybody should have. Apply at 712 Arch Street.

WHAT A WASTE!—"Eugenie spent $12,000 a day on her eastern trip." Who pays? The people.

"It costs Napoleon $5000 for a State dinner." Is it any wonder that the people of France complain of the taxes?

MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR SIR: The LADY'S BOOK is a positive necessity to me, and I watch for its arrival with the greatest eagerness. It has been a welcome visitor at my Southern home from my earliest remembrance, and through it I feel that I know you, and claim you for a friend. S. M.

SEA MOSS FARINE, made from pure Irish Moss, is decidedly a most delicious food, and one that has long been wanted for invalids and children, and those requiring a light and delicate food. It is being used extensively as a table dessert in blanc mange, puddings, cream, etc., and over one hundred palatable dishes may be made from it. Its great convenience and extraordinary cheapness will make it the most popular food sauce in the world. Office of the Company, 53 Park Street, New York.

THE PUBLIC LEDGER ALMANAC, for 1870.—The Public Ledger is one of the "institutions" of Philadelphia. The reliability and conciseness of its news items, the high-toned character of its editorials, and the general excellence of its management, have secured for it the entire confidence of its numerous readers, as well as an outside reputation fully equal to that of its more ambitious competitors. The name of its present publisher is a synonym for intelligent enterprise and noble well-doing. With regard to the little pamphlet before us, we will only say that, prepared at an outlay of several thousand dollars, and presenting a vast amount of useful information to Pennsylvanians and Philadelphians in particular, it has been distributed among the subscribers of the Ledger free of cost, and is to be continued yearly.

We give the conclusion of a very pleasant letter:—

"The cheerful, benevolent-looking countenance that beamed upon me as I opened the January number, seemed to be really wishing me a Happy New Year. I most heartily return the compliment, and wish you a long and prosperous life." R. W.

A GENTLEMAN recently bought three sandwiches of the sort commonly to be had at railway station restaurants, and had one of them weighed and examined. It was found to consist of beef and bread—two and a half drachms of the former, and three drachms of the latter—in all weighing less than three-quarters of an ounce. A man who cannot cut ham in slices thin enough to cover an acre of ground is never employed in these establishments.

THANKS, MANY THANKS for the glorious list of subscribers we have received this year. It gives goodly token that we shall as usual publish the largest edition of any magazine in the world. The fortieth year of GODEY! Think of that, forty years old! And always ahead in the magazine literature of the day. Where can be found a work so well suited to the ladies of this country? Ahead also in fashions, receipts, architecture, drawing, and editorials, and only $3 a year, or will be clubbed with the following magazines for $3 50:—

Godey's Lady's Book	-	-	-	$3 00
Arthur's Home Magazine	-	-	-	2 00
Once a Month	-	-	-	2 00
Children's Hour	-	-	-	1 50

LETTER FROM AN EDITOR:—

DEAR SIR: We received the January number, 1870, day before yesterday, and our wife says it is decidedly the best number yet issued, and far ahead of any similar work of the season. We think she is right in her estimation of the BOOK, and shall tell our readers so in our Monday's paper. My wife desires me to thank you for your great kindness to us in sending the BOOK. We hope to receive it regularly during 1870.

We called attention on page 99 of the January number to the publications of Kimmel & Forster, New York: "The Flags of the World," held by figures dressed in the costumes of the nations the flags represent. "Dissecting Puzzle of Animals," very interesting to children. "The American Boy and American Girl," figures with a variety of clothing. "The Realm of the Queen of Flowers," an excellent play for children, who can show their taste by making up the prettiest bouquet. "Autograph Annual," prepared for the purpose of inserting the autograph of your friends; a space with a pretty border is allotted to each signature. Address Kimmel & Forster, 254 Canal Street, New York.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY.—The March number is now ready, with the following array of contents, all printed on the finest white music paper of the full sheet music size. A brilliant and beautiful Galop, arranged as a duet for the Piano and Violin, or Flute; a capital new song and chorus for the times, Push Things, composed expressly for us by Geo. W. Krauss; Do Not Forget Me, popular song by the author of At the Gate; Magdalena, brilliant and showy fantasia, for good players, by the composer of the celebrated Maiden's Prayer; and an easy arrangement, for beginners, of the ever popular Soldier's Joy. Here is a list of music which, bought in the regular way, would cost between $2 and $3. Subscribers to the Monthly get it for less than 34 cents, or, for nothing, as will be seen by the following:—

Terms and Premiums.—Single subscriptions $4 per annum. Single numbers 40 cents. The January, February, and March numbers (three of the best numbers ever issued) will be sent as samples on receipt of $1 and three 3 cent stamps for postage. As a premium we send to single subscribers one dollar's worth of new music free. For two subscriptions five dollars' worth of new music from our catalogues free. Catalogues, to select from, by return mail. Any one, with a few musical friends to call upon, can easily make up a club or two, and secure a splendid list of new and fashionable music. The Monthly and GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, one year, without the premium, for $6. Agents wanted in every town and village. Send as above for specimens, with prospectus and terms.

One entire year free.—We continue, for another month, the following liberal and popular offer. Any one ordering direct from us six dollars' worth of sheet music, whether from our own catalogues or not, will receive as a premium the Monthly for 1870 free. A fine opportunity to get the best musical periodical published for nothing. Address orders only to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

THE "ALEXANDRA LIMP."—From The London Queen:—

"While, as regards other follies of Fashion, we have not yet seen the last of the Grecian Bend before there is developed another form of torture, under the mysterious inscrutable title of the Alexandra Limp! The Limp is produced (and we do not speak without authority upon this important question) by the removal of the heel from one boot, and the adoption on the other boot of a very high heel—an invention that probably had its origin in the distressing lameness of the Princess who bears the name that has been given to this new folly."

The Princess Alexandra is the wife of the Prince of Wales.

I PURCHASED a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine about ten years ago, and, while learning to use it without instruction, broke one needle; after that for more than nine years, I had the Machine in almost daily use, doing all my family sewing and very much for friends and others, and instructed seven persons in the use of the Machine, without breaking a needle. My Machine has never cost one penny for repairs. I have sewed hours with a workmate babe in my lap, working upon fabrics of the most delicate texture, as well as upon men's and boys' clothes of the heaviest material. I have made garments for the cradle, the bridal, the hospital, and the funeral. Entering into every vicissitude of life, my Machine has become, as it were, a part of my being.

A GOOD WEEKLY PAPER.—An article every one wants. Many persons are misled by the various high-sounding advertisements announcing that so and so will contribute, and the paper will be embellished by splendid engravings. The money is sent, and the dupe is in for it for one year, at least. When he receives his paper, he finds that the stories are often immoral, or of the blood and thirsty order, such as: "The Bloody Pirate of the Enslanguined Sea," "The Woman with Six Husbands," "The Juvenile Highwayman," and others of that sort. After three or four numbers have been received, the subscriber, if he is a man with a family, refuses to take the paper to his house, not wishing to fill his children's minds with such trash. It is as well to take the advice of an older hand when you want to select a good paper for family use, and we unhesitatingly pronounce the Germantown Telegraph, published by P. R. Freas, of Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., as an unexceptionably good paper. To a farmer it is invaluable, as Mr. Freas is a practical farmer himself; to the family it is most acceptable, as it contains the best selection of stories that can be found anywhere; and the general reader will find news, editorials of the day, and a synopsis of everything that can make a paper valuable. Mr. Freas has published the Telegraph for over forty years, editing it the whole time himself. It would be strange if he had not by this time found out what suits the public taste. Send $2 50 to P. R. Freas, Germantown, Philadelphia, Penn'a.

An English friend had a pair of pheasants sent him from home a few days since. The family were all commenting upon the fresh appearance of the birds after their long voyage, when the domestic (need her nationality be mentioned?) exclaimed:—"Faith, it's no wonder they're fresh. They was sint by the cable, I know!"

EVERY one thinking of purchasing a CABINET ORGAN should send for the circulars of the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO., which contain as much matter as a good-sized volume, yet are sent without charge, and postage paid, to all who desire them. They contain not only full descriptions, with correct drawings of the various styles of organs manufactured by this Company, but many interesting explanations of the construction and differences of instruments of this class, showing what are excellences, what defects, etc., so that they are valuable to every one having any thought of purchasing an instrument of this class.

This Company, whose organs have a European as well as American reputation, have recently reduced their prices, and are now selling their Double-Reed Organs with Five Stops, having Tremulant, Knee-Swell, Double Bellows, Centre Pressure Valves, in elegant Solid Walnut Cases, Carved and Panelled, for one hundred and twenty-five dollars. These, it must be remembered, are organs of the best quality, for this Company will not make the cheap instruments which are hawked about the country, but are dear at any price. It is claimed by other makers that instruments of this quality cannot be afforded at this price, but the M. & H. ORGAN CO. declare they are enabled to fix the price so low by their unequalled facilities for manufacture. The great demand for their organs has enabled them to construct ingenious machinery, and to perfect a division of labor, by which they secure not only more perfect work than would be otherwise possible, but this at a reduction in cost. But, be this as it may, this is an illustration of the prices at which they are selling their famous work. If any body loses by it, it will not be the public.

IS THIS CHRISTIANITY!—From the "Woman's Department" of the Sunday Dispatch we extract the following. Perhaps if a little of the cost of putting up the splendid white marble front had been spared, they would have been enabled to pay a larger salary:—

"A week or so ago an advertisement appeared in one of our papers to the effect that 'a cashier, with the best of references,' was wanted in a certain bookstore on Chestnut Street. I answered it, and was told to call at a certain hour on a certain day. Of course I went, and found eight or ten other ladies sitting around on the stools, each one looking as though she was wondering what sort of a chance she stood among so many. I was the fifth who was told to walk back. I went, and was asked all sorts of questions as to my ability, references, etc. At last I asked a few questions in my turn. They said: 'The position was a very responsible one, as from fifty to five hundred dollars passed through the cashier's hands daily,' that she 'must be able to detect counterfeits, and was responsible for all money passed to her.' She must be there from eight and a half o'clock in the morning till six in the evening, and 'for several weeks of and through the holidays, she would be detained till very late at night.' They preferred a gentleman, but 'could not get one to take the position, as it was too confining a situation.' I asked the amount of salary given, and was told that for these ten hours of constant attendance and responsibility they were willing to give the favored lady the enormous amount of eighty-three and two-sixths of a cent per day, or five dollars per week. I said I supposed they expected the lady to make a genteel appearance. 'Yes, of course.' Did they know that a lady could not get more than the plainest board for less than four dollars per week? And then if it should storm, and she had to ride to and fro from her home, how much did they think she would have left of her five dollars to keep up this genteel appearance? This bookstore, which is so liberal and magnanimous in giving such a high salary to one holding such a responsible position, is a fine white marble building, and is the representative store of a wealthy Christian organization and church of our city. I turned from my interrogators in disgust, and with pity in my heart for the lady who was forced to encourage them in their parsimoniousness by taking the position on their terms."

"Be able to detect counterfeits." It is very difficult for a man accustomed to handle money to detect counterfeits, let alone a woman at $5 per week, who sees but little money, and "was responsible for all money passed to her." That is, if she took a $10 counterfeit note, she would lose two weeks' wages. We do not know what particular Christian organization this establishment represents, nor do we care. We simply ask, Is this Christianity?

A GOODLY array of prominent writers have contributed to our columns this month. Where will you find such a list as Marion Harland, Ino Churchill, S. Annie Frost, Florence Hartland, and many others?

A FAT French lady despairingly says: "I am so fat that I pray for a disappointment to make me thin. No sooner does the disappointment come than the mere expectation of growing thinner gives me such joy that I become fatter than ever."

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.—Apply to your postmaster for a postal money order. No more losses by mail.

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge shall be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

PASSING THE TIME.—Going by a clock.

NEW SHEET MUSIC.—Songs and Ballads, published by J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia. Nellie's Dream, beautiful new song by Wallworth. Little Maggie May, very popular. Skating on the Pond, new and sparkling song and chorus. Fairy Voices. Still True to Thee, beautiful song. Mary, My Beautiful Angel. Why I Love Thee, Mack. Say, My Heart, new song by Abt, with German and English words. Price of each 30 cents.

Easy pieces for beginners.—Golden Wedding March. Robin Adair Rondo. Pulling Against the Stream. Walking Up Chestnut Street Polka. Flying Trapeze Redowa. For Ever and For Ever, easy arrangement of this beautiful melody by Converse. Each 20 cents, or six for $1.

Advanced pieces.—Snowflakes, by Brinley Richards, new edition, elegantly illustrated, 50. The Fairy Sprite, by E. Mack, brilliant and beautiful parlor piece for a good player, 60. Forget Me Not, Fantaisie by Ohm, illustrated, 60. Holiday Hours, bagatelle, handsome title-page, 40. Entrainante, grand Valse de Concert, by Ascher, 50. Cousin et Cousine, Schottische Elegante, by Egghard, 40. Ignis Fatuus (Irrlicht) fantasie by Jungmann, 35. The First Violet, by same, 30. Fantaisie from L'Elisire d'Amere, not difficult, 35.

Any person ordering $2 worth from the above, will receive the March number of Holloway's Musical Monthly free. Or the Monthly will be sent the entire year free on orders of sheet music amounting to $6, at one time. Catalogues free. Address only to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

MARION HARLAND's story of "The Vanes," concluded in this number, will take rank with her best stories. We trust that the lesson she has taught in this story will not be without its fruits.

A FARMER in the neighborhood of Paris noticed that all the hair had been carefully trimmed from off his cows' tails. He was not conscious of having made an enemy; he was at a loss to conceive who could have disfigured the useful animals in this barbarous manner, until his wife discovered on the dairymaid's dressing-table a chignon manufactured out of the hair of the cows' tails. Further concealment being useless, the culprit confessed that not only had she furnished herself with this adornment at the expense of the cows, but that she had supplied a select number of her friends with materials from the same source, for the purpose of manufacturing headdresses of a similar nature, in anticipation of a reunion to take place at the commencement of the new year.

A WRITER in the Overland Monthly, describing a celebration at St. Peter's in Rome, says:—

"Unless in full black and in swallow-tailed coat, one cannot pass beyond the nave of the basilica. He is counted but as common and unclean, and doomed to the outer court. On this particular Sunday, as I was pressing my way up to the line of soldiers that guarded the sacred precincts of the choir, I passed one of the best known of American littérateurs. He was in simple walking costume. 'What, doctor,' said I, 'where is the coat that you bought in London?' 'In the bottom of my trunk, and it will stay there,' he answered. 'I am too old to turn snob, and shall leave the city to-morrow.'"

Good for the doctor! We may add that if you receive an invitation to a dinner party, with a little note at the bottom, "Full dress," you may certainly infer that the writer made his money suddenly, and is a snob. The old families of this city have no such ridiculous regulation.

In Boston it is said that the color of a certain clergyman's eyes has never been determined; when he prays he shuts his own, and when he preaches he shuts other people's.

We copy the following excellent article upon Wedding Presents from the New York Ledger. We are happy to see that our crusade against the custom has produced some effects. It is not uncommon now to see on wedding cards "No presents received."—

WEDDING BAZAARS.

BY HENRY WARD BEECHER.

How beautiful is the beginning of wedded life! Not the first bloom of snowdrops and crocus in spring; not the budding and blossom of honeysuckle or magnolia; not the earliest songs of birds, and their sports among the tender leaves but half opened, is so charming to the imagination! If the young hearts are simple, loving, and sincere, there rises before their imagination a series of joys which fills the whole horizon. They know that there is care and labor for every one, but love can gild the one and lighten the other.

It is a world of sorrow; sickness and death befall every one. But what are these spectral thoughts to young hearts that mean to go triumphant over every ill by the irresistible power of love! Even those who have seen their visions melt away, and who have been disenchanted, love to go back for the hour to the old fond delight. They look with pleasure upon two souls leaving the shore for the wide sea, fondly believing that there will never be a wave upon the water, nor a gale in the air. Those even who have had stormy days and a dreary voyage, are glad that the beginning of it should be bright.

There is one point of universal sympathy, the wedding hour of two ingenuous youths. Every one rises out of his dull and drowsing life into his best moods. Every one's eyes look benignly upon the happy pair. Every one would fain throw a flower upon their path, and, if he could, a flower without thorns.

It is under this generous impulse that the custom arose of making presents to the bride. Probably it began in simpler ages than ours, when men were shepherds and husbandmen. The young people must be set up in housekeeping. One, therefore, would give a garment, another a cow, another a piece of furniture. In some villages in Europe, to this day, the young pair walk from the church to their new home by the side of a loaded cart whereon their neighbors have piled all the miscellaneous stuff of a rustic household. So that, when they are settled down at home, almost every article speaks to them a language of kindness from some village friend. In this simple way a rural community set up each new household.

But as wealth increases, and new manners prevail in refined society, it is no longer an aim to furnish the lodgings of love's young pilgrims. The custom of giving presents remains, but the motive changes; and unless great caution be used, such custom degenerates, and becomes offensive. To those who are rich, and "who can repay again," presents abound. While to the less favored, to whom some help would be most timely, little is given. The daughter of a rich man marries a rich man's only son. Every one would fain stand well with them all. Diamond rings, bracelets of great price, silverware of every kind, with and without a use, books, pictures, curiosities of every hue abound, and the long table groans with the needless profusion. There is no thought of setting up in life this joyous pair, for they are full rich already, and able to furnish their costly dwelling munificently. If the motive be worthy of the gifts, how much must these two people be beloved!

But if it be done in a truly charitable spirit, it will not be an ungracious thing to trace these gifts and to unveil the motives which have brought hither such rare and costly things.

The parents, the brothers and sisters, the near relatives, of course fitly bestow these offerings. The near neighbor recalls, when his daughter was married, that the bride's father gave her a silver urn, and surely it would not do for him to be less generous. Under the form of affection, he settles a debt, and says, when all is over, "There, that score is cleared. No one can say that he outdid me." A less favored suitor, of tolerable means, thinks within himself, "He has supplanted me. She more than half favored my addresses. But no one shall suspect by my manner that I care for either of them. Besides, it never does harm to stand well with such people of influence." And so a shining gift goes from his hand.

The lawyer who did the father's business, and expects the son's, says, "It will never do for me to be stingy on such an occasion. Money given away to such people is money planted." Correspondents and bankers, political friends and partners, must send or suffer. The young cousin who is clerking at a small salary, dare not withhold his gift, and is ashamed to send such an one as comports with his means. He dreads to see his meagre offering outdone by blazing rivals, and so, taking counsel of fear and vanity, he goes against his conscience, and pinching himself for months, he pays for a gift beyond his means. He might be strengthened against a second temptation, if he could hear the bride's father saying, "What! Jacob sent this! The young dog is extravagant. Wonder if he thinks he's rich!"

I seldom take pleasure in looking at the wedding treasure chamber. The gold and silver have no beauty in my eyes. If I am sure that love gave them, and was able to give, the presents cannot be too profuse. But I think of the humble cousins, the poor young men wishing to stand well in society, the outside friends that dare not come without gifts when all are expected to give, and this takes away all pleasure. Each man's gift is marked with his name, that every one may know how well each has done his duty. "Have you been up to see the presents?" is the familiar question.

It is said to think that such presents should be made a matter of calculation, but they are. The very bride does not shrink from calculating the probable gifts. And after the wedding bazaar is closed, an account of stock is taken. For the moment, they are the best friends who have given the most choice and flattering gifts. The meanness of some, the stinginess and neglect of others is severely noted. The fiend has overleaped the wall of paradise, and soiled the brightness and innocence of the early hours of a new life.

There will be many to whom these words will seem severe and unmerciful. But it is in no spirit of censorious criticism that they are written. There is need that men should beware lest pride and vanity eat out the value of those gifts which should come only from love—which should be unconstrained—which should be valued not for what they are, but for what they express.

A PARIS correspondent writes: Let me tell you of a catastrophe which happened recently in the Bois. One of our best "internationals" gentlemen riders was taking his pleasure there—such pleasure, that is to say, as may be had in a Victoria at 2*f*. 75*c*. the hour. Calmly reflecting on good things in general, and his next good thing in particular, he went mooning up and down the shore of the great lake. Suddenly his conveyance halted and roused him from his reverie. Looking up, he saw his steed—a proud animal—consuming something. What do you think it was? Why, only the straw-colored chignon of the lady in the Victoria in front of him. Picture the face of the victim and the look of detestation which she bestowed. After all, he was not to blame; not, indeed, was the horse. If ladies will have straw-colored tresses, they really must be prepared to be eaten up alive by ignorant horses which have, perhaps, been kept a little short, and see the tempting bait dangling before their eyes.

REMARKABLE WORKS OF HUMAN LABOR.—Nineveh was 14 miles long, 8 miles wide, and 46 miles round, with a wall 100 feet high, and thick enough for three chariots abreast. Babylon was 50 miles within the walls, which were 75 feet thick and 100 feet high, with 100 brazen gates. The Temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was 420 feet to the support of the roof; it was 100 years in building. The largest of the pyramids was 491 feet in height, and 963 on the sides; the base covers 11 acres; the stones are about 60 feet in length, and the layers are 208; it employed 320,000 men in building. The labyrinth in Egypt contained 300 chambers and 12 halls. Thebes, in Egypt, presents ruins 27 miles round, and 100 gates. Carthage was 29 miles round. Athens was 25 miles round, and contained 350,000 citizens and 400,000 slaves. The Temple of Delphos was so rich in donations that it was plundered of $60,000,000, and Nero carried away from it 200 statues. The walls of Rome were 13 miles round.

The wife of a New York millionaire has gone to Europe to get the portraits of her three homely daughters painted by the "old masters," of whom she has heard so much.

REMARKABLE MEMORIES.—Magliabecchi, the founder of the great library at Florence, had so wonderful a memory, that Gibbon styled him "memory personified." At one period of his life, Seneca could repeat two thousand words precisely as they had been pronounced. Gassendi had acquired by heart six thousand Latin verses, and in order to give his memory exercise, he was in the habit of daily reciting six hundred verses from different languages. Saunderson, another mathematician, was able to repeat all Horace's odes and a great part of other Latin authors. La Croze, after listening to twelve verses in as many languages, could not only repeat them in the order in which he heard them, but could also transpose them. Pope had an excellent memory, and many persons have amused themselves by looking through his writings, and pointing out how often he had brought it into play. He was able to turn with readiness to the precise place in a book where he had seen any passage that had struck him. John Lynden had a very peculiar faculty for getting things by rote, and he could repeat correctly any long, dry document after having heard it read; but if he wanted any single paragraph, he was obliged to begin at the commencement, and proceed with his recital until he came to what he required. There was a French novelist who, being a printer, composed a volume in type, and thus the book was printed without having been written. Bishop Warburton had prodigious memory, which he taxed to an extraordinary degree. His "Divine Legation" would lead one to suppose that he had indefatigably collected and noted down the innumerable facts and quotations there introduced; but the fact is, that his only note book was an old almanac, in which he occasionally jotted down a thought. Scaliger obtained so perfect an acquaintance with one Latin book, that he offered to repeat any passage with a dagger at his breast, to be used against him in case of a failure of memory.

The following obituary notice recently appeared in a newspaper in Spain: "This morning our Saviour summoned away the jeweller, Siebald Illmagn, from his shop to another and a better world. The undersigned, his widow, will weep upon his tomb, as will also his two daughters, Hilda and Emma, the former of whom is married, and the latter is open to an offer. The funeral will take place to-morrow. His disconsolate widow, Veronique Illmagn, P. S.—This bereavement will not interrupt our business, which will be carried on as usual, only our place of business will be removed from No. 3 Tessa de Teinturiers to No. 4 Rue de Missionnaire, as our grasping landlord has raised our rent."

A WONDERFUL CLOCK.—Many years ago there was a clock made by one Droz, a mechanic of Geneva, renowned for its ingenious construction. It was so made as to be capable of performing the following movements: There was on it a negro, a shepherd, and a dog. When the clock struck, the shepherd played six tunes on his flute, and the dog approached and fawned upon him. The clock was exhibited to the King of Spain, who was greatly delighted with it. "The gentleness of my dog," says Droz, "is his least merit. If your majesty will touch one of the apples which you see in the shepherd's basket, you will admire the fidelity of this animal." The king took an apple, and the dog flew at his hand and barked so loudly, that the king's dog, which was in the same room during the exhibition, began to bark also, at which the superstitious courtiers, not doubting that it was an affair of witchcraft, hastily left the room, crossing themselves.

Having desired the Minister of Marine, who was the only one who dared to stay behind, to ask the negro what o'clock it was, the minister asked, but received no reply. Droz then observed that the negro had not yet learned the Spanish, upon which the minister repeated the question in French, and the black immediately answered him. At this new prodigy, the firmness of the minister also forsook him, and he retreated precipitately, declaring that it must be the work of a supernatural being. It is probable that in the performance of these tricks, Droz touched certain springs in the mechanism, although that is not mentioned in any of the accounts of his clock.

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

THE GERANIUM. New and Select Varieties. Among the many popular plants which are now freely cultivated and sought by our tasteful and enterprising amateurs and lady florists, we know of no section which has as yet superseded the favorite geranium.

From time immemorial, one variety or other of this household plant has been the care of the owner of the south side window; while more recently and since floriculture has become an extensive business, varieties without number have been raised and introduced for bedding purposes, that is to plant the neat beds laid out on the lawn around our city villas and more extensive country mansions. Should there be among the readers of the LADY'S BOOK any young amateurs not familiar with the treatment of the new varieties, which we name below, for bedding out, it might be well to say that moderately-sized holes should be prepared and filled with such fresh loam as is obtained by chopping up sods from an old pasture, mixed with about one-fourth of its bulk with well rotted manure. This preparation will be found useful for nearly all plants, especially verbenas and roses. A partially shaded situation is preferable to full exposure to the sun; too much shade is to be avoided. An easterly exposure is perhaps the best. They may be kept in a luxuriant condition in the hottest season by "mulching," or covering the soil with such litter as dry grass, short hay, or spent hops; this keeps the soil cool and moist; a thorough drenching occasionally may be desirable. Of the varieties we think most worthy of note among so many of every shade, we would name the following as distinct and of marked characteristics: NEW DOUBLE VARIETIES.—Madame Lemoine, of a delicate rose color, very large and double; Emile Lemoine, with immense trusses of double crimson flowers, very double, price one dollar each. Madame Rose Chermuz, double scarlet, Tom Thumb, price fifty cents. Of the new Zonale, or horse-shoe varieties, are Transparent, with very large crimson flowers; Rival, flowers large, of a velvety dazzling scarlet; Statesman, beautiful violet crimson; price fifty cents each. Several new and beautiful varieties of the Juy-leaved Section have been introduced recently, which are very desirable for vases, trellises, or baskets. Of these we would name The Duke of Edinburgh, beautifully variegated, white and green foliage; Elegans, with mauve-colored flowers; each fifty cents. Another feature was recently added to the Zonale varieties by the production of foliage, in which golden and bronze tints accompany the horse-shoe markings, giving the leaf a very attractive appearance. Of these the Beauty of Caldudale and Arab are of very distinct character in the Tricolor section. There is none after all to surpass the favorite, Mrs. Pollock, with bright, bronzed-red zone, belted with crimson, and edged with golden-yellow. The price of each of the above is fifty cents. By our arrangements for the immediate propagation of these novel and expensive varieties, their price is rapidly reduced soon after importation, and placed within the reach of our ardent fanciers. An additional advantage is that of being enabled to send the above by mail, post-paid, at the prices designated. For a full list of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, New Plants, Roses, Dahlias, Verbenas, Gladiolus, etc., refer to Dreer's Garden Calendar for 1870, mailed to all applicants on receipt of a postage stamp.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

COMBINATIONS OF GEOMETRICAL FORMS.

THIS system of education, invented by Frederick Fröbel, cannot be too highly recommended, on account of its great value and importance. It is the most simple means of awakening and satisfying the natural longing for active exertion, so as to promote in children of tender years the development of their bodily and mental faculties by most progressive occupations.

Fig. 5.

To mothers and others interested in the education of children, we should recommend them to cut out a number of squares in card-board, and afterwards

Fig. 7.

Fig. 8.

paint them in various colors, and the practice is to make as many different forms as possible; and the eye will soon become accustomed to the most agreeable combinations of colors as well as forms. The above figures will serve as examples, but a variety of others can also be made out of the same shapes. The square, cut one way in two, makes two angular forms (Fig. 6); the double square, cut in two, makes two angular forms (Fig. 7) different from the preceding; Fig. 8 is another form. These enable the pupil to make a varied arrangement of forms, and to give a more striking effect to the figures or designs. The scholar learns that four triangles, properly placed, form another triangle (Fig. 9); these can again be composed into a great variety of shapes; Figs. 10 and 11 are only a sample of many that may be produced by combination. The plan is an excellent one, as exercising the ingenuity in making figures, but it also gives the first notion of counting and calculating. It will be seen by the glance which we have now taken at this subject that by they are able to draw firm lines either with pen or pencil. The value of this must be apparent, for the hand soon follows the eye, and the pupil, by observing natural objects with the geometrical forms with which she is acquainted, will soon be able to delineate an interesting and pleasing variety of designs.

It is very true that precepts are useful, but practice and imitation go far beyond them; hence the importance of watching early habits, that they may be free from what is objectionable.

ORNAMENTAL COTTAGE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 436 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

THE above was designed for Mr. E. S. Mayes, of Lebanon, Ky. The plan is arranged for comfort and convenience, and its form produces a beautiful variety in the outlines of the building; it will also be noticed, by examining the plan, that no waste room occurs. The three principal rooms—sitting, dining-room, and parlor—open directly into the front hall, which, being of large dimensions and of a room-like shape, denotes a liberal supply of room on entering; there is also a beautiful staircase on one side of it. Attached to the kitchen there is a large storeroom, also a pantry. The second story contains four large chambers, each having a fireplace and clothes-press in them; they are all free and private. The house being of a compact and convenient form, great economy of construction is obtained—as few doors, less plastering, and no vacant space to clean and furnish. No back stairs were desired by the party ordering these drawings, but one can easily be placed between the dining-room and the kitchen, if required.

The cottage is being constructed of bricks laid with flush joints, and painted as the red color of the bricks. For such a house in the country or a village, surrounded by shrubbery and backed by large trees, is the most inharmonious of colors that could possibly be used. All the brick and wood work, which it is usual to paint, must have the one color, and lean to nature—by the force of shade, sunshine, and reflection—to gild, darken, and playfully to light up and tint the various parts, which she does with far more and a higher grade of beauty than the patchy red, blues, and other striped colors we so often see disfiguring otherwise good and beautiful designs.

It should always be borne in mind that good architecture is the so arranging of the parts—their projections, heights, and quantities—that they produce the effect of fitness, propriety, and elegance; not in having a handsome cornice, an exquisite bracket or corbel; but a certain modesty should pervade the whole, and nothing stand forward so ostentatiously as to rob the rest of their just powers of attraction. These principles should govern all who call themselves architects, yet how often do we find a house all brackets or all perch, the whole being unworthy of admiration.

The above design, if built in the spirit of this drawing, will be beautiful, and a gem in any village, town, city, or by-road; but it must be perspectively adjusted to suit different places and surroundings.

We have of late years adopted the plan—to secure beauty in our works—of making all the details their full or natural size in the drawings, and of getting up the drawing, specifications, and the bills of quantities so full and distinct that it is very rarely, not once in three months, that we receive letters asking explanations of drawings after they receive them.

The above building, finished inside in the same spirit as treated in the exterior, will cost between four and five thousand dollars, with bath, tank, hot and cold water, and heater.

We charge for all full drawings two and a half per cent. This we would charge on $4500, which will amount to $112 50, and perhaps save the owner a thousand dollars, securing a handsome house and avoiding, by an ample specification, lawsuits or other disagreeable consequences.

Nettie, Eulalie, and Flora.—We frequently receive very foolish inquiries, but those received from you are a little more stupid than usual. Here is a sample: "What may be considered a good test of the sincerity of a gentleman's proposal of marriage!—in other words: How often should he be refused before being accepted!"

J. E. W.—You will have to be content with what nature has done for you. Do not use any of the advertised nostrums, they will be sure to do you harm.

Mrs. J. M.—She has.
Agnes, Belleville, O.—Answer too long for this department. Send stamp and your address for reply.
L. E. M.—Clarence is a boy's name.

Agnes.—India-rubber gloves are worn while doing housework to keep the hands soft and white. $3 50 and $3 50 per pair, the latter have gauntlets.

Mrs. W. H. N.—Thanks for the leaves from the pepper tree.

Marietta.—Do not believe her. A tale-bearer or slanderer will tell nothing out of good will.

Emily.—It would not be considered wrong for you to send a Valentine. But let it be one you would not be ashamed to claim the ownership of.

Thomas D.—The lady was right. You were wrong in placing your hands upon the polished mahogany, as their warmth and moisture would tarnish it.

R. H. C. writes a lady-like hand, and her punctuation is correct.

Bertha.—We regret our inability to assist you.

Adeline.—In making a morning call a lady may take a friend with her.

Jenny.—Doves should not be fed on peas at all, and only a little hemp daily should be given them. The breaking of their eggs may very likely be accounted for by their not having any chalk in their oage to peck at. The oage in which they are should never be moved while they are sitting, and they should not be much handled, nor their eggs. They never will sit on more than two eggs at once, and often only one will hatch. When they hatch, the parents will feed them with milk in their crops, for which the young ones insert their heads down the parents' throats. The proper food for them is wheat and canary seed, and of hemp only a little, as it is injurious.

Maggie.—We cannot agree with you that long engagements are best; on the contrary, if possible, they are to be avoided. They are universally embarrassing and dangerous. Lovers are so apt to find out each other's imperfections, to grow exacting, jealous, and morose.

"Alas! how slight a cause can move Discussion between hearts that love."

Mary L.—It entirely depends on the size and form of the face.

Allen.—The ground upon which the office of the LADY'S BOOK now stands was occupied previously by the residence of Peter S. Duponceau, Esq. That on which the Ledger building was erected was occupied by the apothecary store of Elias Durand.

Matilda.—The only way in which you can ascertain whether or not your visits are agreeable is to carefully note the manner in which you are received; it is requisite also to note whether your visits are returned.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The Publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF EXTENSION SHEET.

FIRST SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Walking suit of heavy black gros grain, made with one skirt, trimmed with a box-plaited ruffle, bound with bias black velvet. The casaque is trimmed with a ruffle to correspond. Pointed tabs at the sides, bound with velvet and velvet bows. Sash of same. Black velvet hat, trimmed with green velvet flowers.

Fig. 2.—House dress of purple silk, trimmed to simulate two skirts; the trimming consists of a ruffle of the same, which extends down the sides and across the bottom of skirt in back, and forms an apron in front; the ruffle is headed with velvet leaves. Velvet rosettes at the sides, and velvet sash. Plain corsage, trimmed with a square bertha of velvet.

Fig. 3.—Walking dress of black cashmere, trimmed with one ruffle, headed with a band of black Astrakhan. Black velvet cloth coat, trimmed with the same. Black silk bonnet, trimmed with black velvet flowers.

Fig. 4.—Evening dress of pink and white striped silk, with a bias ruffle on edge of skirt. Overdress of white spotted lace; the front breadth is trimmed with rows of Valenciennes lace, and looped at the sides with pink flowers. Low corsage, trimmed with white lace and pink satin, with small basques and sash of satin. Hair arranged in puffs and curls, with pink flowers twined in.

Fig. 5.—Walking dress, with tunic skirt. This walking dress consists of a skirt, tunic, and bodice of black and violet shot woollen poplin. The under-skirt is trimmed round the bottom with a gathered flounce about ten inches deep, headed with two puffs of the material. The tunic is trimmed to correspond, as is also the sash ends and bodice.

Fig. 6.—This pretty Catalan cap is made of muslin, ornamented with muslin flutings, narrow lace, and bows of colored ribbon.

Fig. 7.—This Fanchonnette cap is made of Nainsook, ornamented with narrow strips of insertion, Valenciennes lace, and blue satin ribbon. The strip of insertion is two-fifths of an inch wide, the lace an inch and a fifth. The lappets are arranged in two plaits, after which the colored ribbon rosettes are sewn on.

Fig. 8.—This cap is made of fine muslin, ornamented with flutings and cross strips of muslin. The crown is in the shape of a net, and gathered. The flutings of the border are edged with lace; two cross strips of muslin are likewise stitched on the border. The lappets are also ornamented with flutings and lace.

Fig. 9.—This cap is very becoming to an elderly lady. The crown is formed of bouillons of white tulle over a net foundation. The border is of rich white blonde. The trimming of blue satin ribbon is arranged into a bow at the top, and comes down on either side, and forms the strings.

Figs. 10 and 11 show the prevailing forms of vells. They are made of plain net, with dots embroidered on the foundation, and are fastened to the back of the chignon with a pin made expressly for the purpose.

Fig. 12.—Bow of blue ribbon, with tabs of embroidered muslin, edged with lace.

Fig. 13.—Bow of pink satin ribbon and point lace tabs.

Fig. 14.—Bow of Valenciennes lace and green ribbon rosette.

Fig. 15.—Dress improver, made of horse-hair, with steel springs running down to keep it in shape.

SECOND SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Morning robe of pink cashmere, plaited into a yoke, and allowed to hang loose except where it is drawn up in a pannier puff by a ribbon tied in a bow. The edge of cape is trimmed with a quilling. A small round cape covers the yoke. Coat sleeve.

Fig. 2.—Sacque of brown velvet cloth, bound with satin and trimmed with satin ruches. Brown felt hat, trimmed with velvet, feather, and gauze veil.

Fig. 3.—Opera cloak of white cashmere. The arrangement of this opera cloak is like that of a burous in the back; it is very suitable for young ladies. It is made of white cashmere, lined with white silk, and ornamented with a plaited cross-strip and Vandykes of cashmere. Bows of similar material ornament it in the back. The circular fastens with white silk buttons and loops. The Vandykes are made separately, and can easily be plaited from illustration. The bows are made of strips of cashmere one inch wide, piped with white satin and tassels.

Fig. 4.—Cloak without sleeves, of black velvet, trimmed with guipure lace headed by silk embroidery.

Figs. 5 and 6.—Close fitting house jacket. This jacket may be made either of velvet, silk, or cashmere; opens heart-shaped in front, and is trimmed with velvet revers. It is cut out in six square basques below the waist. The front basques measure six inches, and the back and side basques four inches in depth. They are cut out so as to leave space for a two-inch plaiting of velvet, to be sewn at the edge.

Figs. 7 and 8.—Silk sashes. Fig. 7 is a sash of black glacé silk. This sash is formed of a piece of silk lined with stiff net, forming three deep points—two long ones for the under part, plaited at the top, and the third shorter, turned down over the two others, the whole edged with a pretty knotted silk fringe. This sort of basque is fastened to a waistband, with a butterfly bow of black satin. Fig. 8 is formed of two wide strips of black satin, each plaited in the shape of a wing; both are fastened together by a loop to a round waistband. Both the loop and waistband are of black silk, arranged in cross-folds and lined with stiff net.

Fig. 9.—The Belgrave shoe, composed of fine kid, open on the top of foot, with bands of silk galoon crossed over the foot.

Fig. 10.—Boot of fine French kid, with patent leather on the toe, up the front of boot, around the ankle and the heel. The patent leather is ornamented with embroidery in white or colored silk.

Fig. 11.—Petticoat for wearing over crinoline, made of fine white long cloth.

Fig. 12.—Pattern for corrage for evening dress, made of pink satin cut low square, and trimmed with white lace. The pannier is made of the same, trimmed to correspond; this is to be worn with a white muslin skirt, trimmed with narrow ruffles and lace.

Fig. 13.—Canexou of quilted satin. Black or colored satin may be chosen. Our model was of blue satin, quilted with white. A pearl bead is placed on each corner of the squares, and the canexou is bordered by a trimming of feathers.

Fig. 14.—Drawers for child of three years old, made with waist, with shoulder-straps. The drawers are trimmed with fluted ruffles.

Figs. 15, 16, and 17.—Pillow-cases. Fig. 16 is a pillow-case of linen, ornamented with a pretty pattern in embroidery at the edge, and finished at each corner with a satin bow. Fig. 15 has a row of stitching, and is scalloped and worked round with buttonhole stitch. Fig. 17, the edge of the case is straight; the Greek border is worked in chain stitch with red in grain cotton; the embroidery is in satin stitch in white. Figs. 15 and 17 show two neat modes of fastening the cases.

Fig. 18.—Embroidered border. This pattern is suitable for borders for curtains, covers, mantel-piece or window-seat trimmings, or berceauette covers. It is worked in appliqué of muslin upon net; the muslin is cut away outside the embroidered outlines. Different kinds of lace stitches are worked within the petals of the flowers.

Fig. 19.—Letter for marking.

CHILDREN'S DRESSES.

Fig. 1.—Dress for a girl of ten years old, of blue and black striped poplin. Sacque of black Astrakhan, bound with black velvet. Hat of same, trimmed with black velvet.

Fig. 2.—Suit for a little girl of three years. Dress of white cashmere, trimmed with a band of blue velvet. White cashmere cloak, trimmed with blue chenille fringe; a hood lined with blue silk. White felt hat, trimmed with blue velvet and feather.

Fig. 3.—Suit for a girl of thirteen. Dress of blue poplin. Cloak of blue and green plaid cloth, made with a cape looped up in the back. Black felt hat, trimmed with green and blue velvet, and feather.

Fig. 4.—Dress for a child of one and a half year, of white piqué, braided around the skirt. Circular cloak of scarlet cloth, with hood to draw over the head, trimmed with a ruche of the same.

Fig. 5.—Dress for a girl of eight years, of crimson silk poplin, trimmed with four narrow ruffles. Sacque of white cloth, spotted with crimson. The pockets and cuffs of crimson satin, quilted. Hat of white felt, trimmed with crimson velvet and feather.

Fig. 6.—Costume for a boy of eight years. Blouse and pants of blue navy cloth, trimmed with a band of Astrakhan fur. Blue cloth cap, trimmed with a band of same.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE.

Fig. 1.—Walking suit of Havana brown silk poplin, made with one skirt, trimmed with a deep flounce, headed with two narrow flounces cut in points, and trimmed with a quilling; a puff heads the flounces. Tight-fitting casaque, cut short in the back, and deep in front, trimmed with a plaited ruffle, headed with two rows of velvet. Small cape, with velvet bow and long ends in back. Brown felt hat, trimmed with feather and long gauze veil.

Fig. 2.—Dinner dress of Metternich green silk, made with a court train; the front of skirt and train are trimmed with point lace. Bows of lace and silk are fastened on each side. Plain corsage, cut square in the neck, and trimmed to correspond. Coat sleeves.

Fig. 3.—Evening dress of white silk, made over an underskirt of lilac silk, trimmed with one plaited ruffle. The overdress is trimmed with point appliqué lace; the skirt is cut short to show the underskirt. The upper part of skirt is trimmed with a plaited quilling of the same, with sprays of flowers above it. Pannier puff in back, with ribbon bows and lace below it. Low corsage, trimmed to correspond. Hair arranged in puffs and curls, with string of pearls and flowers arranged in it.

Fig. 4.—Black silk dress, made with a plain train skirt. Mantle forming a pannier puff, with long ends in front, trimmed with a quilling of the same. Black hat, trimmed with scarlet flower and plume.

Fig. 5.—Walking suit of blue cashmere, made with one skirt and casaque. The skirt is trimmed with one ruffle, headed with a puffing. Casaque cut to fit the figure, and trimmed with white fringe and four narrow pipings of white satin. Hanging sleeves, trimmed to correspond, with an ornament in appliqué on the back. The same style of ornaments are fastened on the belt in back and also at the back of neck. Blue silk bonnet, trimmed with blue flowers and black lace.

Fig. 6.—Dress for little girl of cuir-colored silk. The edge of skirt is cut in turrets, bound with scarlet, and a scarlet underskirt below. The upper skirt is cut apron front, with puffs at the side, and trimmed to correspond. Low corsage and sleeves, with white tucked muslin chemisette and long sleeves.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

HAVING concluded our description of winter fashions, and it being too soon for the spring styles to be decided upon, we thought a few remarks upon house furnishing would perhaps be agreeable to our readers, as we have received so many inquiries upon the subject. Fitting up a suit of rooms or a house is not the monotonous work it used to be, when the only choice in furniture lay between mahogany and black walnut, in scrolls or flower patterns, and stuffs ranged from brocade to brocatelle and back again. Now, the owner of a house or rooms (and the fancy for living in one's own furnished apartment, stamped with one's own likings, gains among our people daily) may hesitate between the lighter effects of heavy white enamelled wood and the African holly, or the Versailles richness of rosewood inlaid with brass, china, and ivory, or incrustated with ormolu. For persons whose means and desires are for something plainer, plain rosewood, walnut, varnished and oiled, oak, and the plain cottage sets are seen in great variety. The latter are particularly adapted to country houses.

In furnishing, a paper for your room should first be thought of. These are seen in an endless variety of styles, but for a parlor, sitting-room, or chamber, plain tinted walls, with simple gilt band for border, is always in good taste and style. The fine flower panels of frescoing are sometimes imitated by tinting and gilding the walls in panels, and pasting large groups of flowers, cut from the French paper prepared for the purpose, in the centre.

The carpet is next chosen. There is real delight in examining the new patterns of carpets, beginning with the American ingrains, which show good mottled branching figures in crimson and black, or green and black. A hint may be valued by economical housekeepers to the effect that in a carpet store there are always remnants, several of which will be found of the same pattern, and may be used to good advantage for small rooms. The ancient oak patterns have given way to a small figure, like billets of different woods laid together, in orange or drab with dark brown. The English ingrain makes the most serviceable carpet; the best quality has the Brussels patterns. Next are the Brussels, which are most used for general wear, a good Brussels lasting and looking well a long time. These are generally chosen in set figures, or a plain mottled surface in wood or neutral colors, with a border in rich colors surrounding the room. Of the richer carpets, we will not attempt to speak; so much can be said of them, that our utmost limits would not suffice to do the subject justice.

Cushioned furniture is preferred to any show of carved wood, which only appears in the lightest forms. Small walnut chairs are carved into the semblance of bamboo, with slender cross pieces only in the back. Chairs designed to have embroidered cushions have low backs, with ovals in the centre to receive the work, supported by solid but not too heavy bars to the top and sides of the squarely-outlined frame. Low Duchesse, Lamballe, and marquise seats, resembling miniature easy-chairs, luxuriously stuffed and tufted, are used for parlors, and are fitted in various styles. The scarlet or blue satin cushions have a facing of silk reps in neutral tints, with cords finish, combining the two colors. Figured cloths are faced with rich plain plush or terry, and cords are sometimes drawn outside the star and melon tuftings in the creases. The tufting is very thickly done with a long needle, and no button is placed as finish, but the tuft is sunk out of sight. Square, small, and low sofas, with arms the same height as the back, are placed in recesses. These have no wood work visible, but are tufted to the very top. Louis XIII. sofas have slender, straight, or slightly curved legs and arms, and are plain in outline. Duchesse sofas have scroll backs and arms half the height, all heavily cushioned. Howard sofas are the massive, simple English style with square backs, familiar in old country houses. Very high or very low tops are seen on beds. The low French style, which shows only a rail above the ruffled coverlet, is preferred to the high carved canopy bedstead, except in very handsomely furnished houses. The best style of sofa bed lets the back drop to form half the bed. It is cushioned the same depth and width as the seat, is made without arms, and, when dropped, lets fall two legs in place for support. No wood is visible on these sofas, which are finished divan fashion with fringe and brass nails. This is a piece of furniture that should be in every household, as it can be carried about and used in case of company or sickness without occupying much space. Bureaus are low, with large mirror, with small drawers each side; these are used for dressing stands also.

With a few words about curtains, we must close this now too lengthy article. Embroidered Swiss muslin curtains are used in preference to any but fine lace. A set seen was wrought in convolvulus patterns, and each curtain was nearly two yards wide, with broad worked border. A favorite figure is intersecting diamonds. Small dotted Swiss is much liked, with frills and flutings of plain muslin. A substitute for Nottingham curtains, and a great improvement, is found in the machine-made gimpure lace, which is a fine darned netting, with a firmer thread than ordinary. A set of these are almost as handsome as lace curtains, and much less expensive. Chintz curtains are very much used for upper rooms, also the furniture covered to correspond. They are lined with pink or blue cambric, and are finished with three inch flutings and fluted bands. The cornice is a flat board six inches wide, covered with plain chintz, on each edge of which are tacked flutings, and narrow gilt bands are nailed between.

There is always something new to chronicle in cravat bows. The caprice at present is for black gros grain ribbon, braided and fringed with gilt, made up not in a stiff regular bow, but with three or four careless loops and pointed ends. Other black bows are fringed with Roman or with Scotch colors, or embroidered with a Pompadour bouquet. Blue bows, with silver ornaments, and white, with gilt, are worn. A tiny bow without ends is worn in the hair to match the bow at the throat. For coiffure bows bright Roman colors are much used by young ladies. Yacht neckerchiefs, squares of raw silk of deepest blue or antique red, are worn again with the small linen collars that are standing behind and turned over in points in front. More than anything else the Marie Stuart frills are worn, especially for the house. These standing frills of clear muslin, edged with narrowest Valenciennes, and finely crimped, are far more becoming than thick white linen collars. Several graduated rows of footing in deep flutes, make a pretty frill for demi-toilettes.

Valenciennes lace is used for handsome dresses; crape or white tulle for mourning. Frills to match those worn on the neck edge the sleeves and fall over the hands. These are especially pretty with coat sleeves that are rounded open on the outer seam half way to the elbow. The white frills fill up the opening.

White lace is very extensively used for garniture on very dark silks, and even black dresses. Point, point appliqué, point d'Alençon, and Valenciennes lace are all used. A tasteful novelty in lace, is cravat ends or tabs of point lace, to be worn with a brooch at the throat.

Of the large lace collars now restored to favor, the Empress shape, pointed back and front, is most becoming; but the sailor shape and the Marie Theresa square collar are both very much worn. Sheer linen cambric handkerchiefs are trimmed with the merest edge of point lace. Handkerchiefs of Valenciennes lace have diamond medallions of the lace in the corners, and a border of lace around them.

New veils of thread lace, with the border in one piece and not applied, are very small, rounding below, and curved at the top to make them fit over the face without wrinkling.

We have seen a very charming white toilette for a little girl two years old. It is of white poplin, the first skirt trimmed with two scalloped-out flounces, each headed with a plait of white satin. A similar plait and scalloped-out fluting simulate a square berth upon the bodice, which is continued into a deep, round basque, forming a sort of second skirt, open in front, and trimmed with two flutings. The sleeves are trimmed to correspond. A sash of white satin is tied at the back, with two double loops and two lappets. A circular of the same material, and trimming, with a small hood lined with white satin, and fastened with silk cords. This pretty costume can also be light blue, or rose-colored poplin and satin. The coiffure is a tiny Tyrolean hat of white felt, trimmed with velvet and a feather aigrette. For a little girl three or four years old, a costume of blue and white plaid poplin with two skirts. The first is trimmed with a narrow flounce, headed with two bands of blue velvet; the second forming a tunic, with blue velvet facings in front, and looped up with velvet bows at the sides; it is also edged round the bottom with a fluting. The high bodice is ornamented with a square berth formed of a similar fluting. The sleeves have pointed revers.

Little boys up to four or five years old uniformly wear the plaited skirt of cloth, tartan or velvet, or in lighter goods, such as poplin, serge, etc.; with the jacket cut out in small basques all round, and opening in front, either upon a small waistcoat or upon a full white chemisette. Their plain linen collars are often exchanged for the full plaited frill called piertot. After the age of the plaited skirt comes the age of Knickerbockers, in fact a more sensible style of dress is now adopted for boys, that of not changing it so frequently with every whim of fashion.

Bows are now universally worn on the head; no lady appears to fancy that her toilette is complete without one. They are made in all colors, and to match the dress, but black velvet bows are usually selected by those of simple taste, and exceedingly well do they assimilate with every toilette. The bows are made of wide ribbon, and have two loops, and are arranged at the side of the head, and back, designs of which will be given next month. Sometimes they have four loops, and are made of narrower ribbon, but then they are neither so pretty nor so stylish looking.

The coronets of plaited hair seem to be worn higher than ever, many persons wear in front of them those waved tortoise-shell coronets through which a strand of hair is passed.

For evening wear, we have seen some white muslin bodies, made with muslin panners or tunics; which were particularly tasteful and pretty. These are worn over light-colored silk skirts, and are very pretty. We will describe one. It was made of the clearest white muslin, cut square in front, and trimmed round with a frilling of muslin, edged with lace over green satin ribbon. The sleeves came to the elbow, and were very wide and caught up at the bend of the arm with a large bow of green satin ribbon; the tunic was of white muslin, trimmed with the same frilling of white muslin, edged with lace, and puffed up at the back and sides with green satin bows; a green satin sash went round the waist. This style will be adopted in warm weather, to wear over colored silks and grenadines. In our next we hope to be able to give some hints on spring styles.

From the numerous sources of reliable information including the latest advices from the courts of France and London, and the leading modistes in general, the subject of crinoline has had a thorough overhauling, and the unanimous decision is in favor of wearing the hoop skirts at all evening and full-dress toilettes in not over two yards circumference at the bottom; while for general use and all out-door toilettes, the sizes vary from two to two yards and a quarter. The pannier will also be worn even more fully than heretofore, the hoops swelling slightly at the hips to preserve the shape of the pannier.

2 Did you see her toss those ringlets,
Driving grief away on winglets,
As she shook her pretty head,
Light and free?
And her pretty gaiters peeping—
Time to merry music keeping—
Spinning time on golden thread
In her glee;
Pretty fairy of the ball?

3 Did you see her smiling brightly,
Sweeping like a nymph so lightly,
Through the merry, merry crowd,
So unwearied?
Did you watch my little posy,
Put her hands in mine so easy,
And didst wonder I felt proud
Of my fairy,
Of my fairy at the ball?

KAREN'S RULE.

BY MARION HARLAND.

"I AM sorry to hear all this—very sorry!" said Arthur Dorr, sincerely.

He was a fine young fellow of five and twenty, in naval uniform, and his bronzed face told of recent and protracted exposure to sun and sea-breezes.

"More grieved and surprised than I can express," he added, breaking the sad silence that had pervaded the family circle since the utterance of his preceding remark. "I had hoped better things of Ed Livingston."

"Bad company has done it all," said his mother, who never passed unqualified blame upon any one. "It seems he was intimate with a wild set all the time he was visiting our Karen, although we never suspected it. His cousins—Joseph and Robert Livingston—are ringleaders of the band; gay, unprincipled men, with fortunes they are throwing away in every species of dissipation. It is a pity they inherited wealth. They have fair talents, and, like Edmund, are endowed with good looks, and many other pleasing gifts. Money, which they never worked to gain, has been their ruin. Their influence over Edmund has been fearfully strong."

"His wife's should be stronger," said Jane, the eldest sister, didactically. "If his mind or affections were well regulated, it would be."

"What are his means? He is out of business just now, you say?" interrogated Arthur.

The charitable old lady shook her head, but Bessie Dorr, impetuous and free of speech, would not leave the reply to her brother's imagination. "His means are what he wins at the card-table—more shame to him! The cottage in which they live—a lovely place, by the way, with a fine garden attached—was settled upon Karen by Uncle James, for whose wife she was named, you know. It cannot be sold until Willie is of age, or it would have gone with the rest. It is said that Rob Livingston has lent his cousin large sums of money. I don't know how this may be."

"If it is true, it is the worst feature in the entanglement," observed Arthur.

"I believe it, for my part. Karen never hints or looks a complaint, but various little incidents that have come under my observation during my visits to her, have convinced me that they are often straitened for funds. It is a burning sin and shame that the darling girl should be so villainously treated—she who never knew what it was to have a care or ungratified wish while she was at home. And I do hope, Arthur, that you will make it your business to talk seriously with her husband about his evil courses; give him to understand that she has one protector in the world."

"I doubt the propriety of such a step," said the mother, gravely. "We have no reason to believe that Edmund is ever unkind to his wife. Indeed, she has told me that he has never, in their married life, spoken impatiently or harshly to her; declares that he is indulgent and generous to a fault."

"Oh, yes!" interposed indignant Bessie. "If you listen to her, you will believe him a nonpareil of goodness, honor, and all the leading virtues; will come away questioning within yourself whether, after all, the old-fashioned notions of society upon the subject of wedded bliss are not out of gear, and if men can be moderately decent husbands, who don't stay out at wine and card parties every night, until two or three o'clock; who don't patronize horse-races, and haven't gone to bed intoxicated at least twice a week for a year past. It puts me out of all patience to hear her, when any of us gently intimate that we would be sorry for her if she would let us. I spoke my mind to her last week!"

"Bessie! daughter!" chided the mother, distressed.

"I did, really, mamma! I was spending the night with her, you see, Art, and she tried not to let me guess that she meant to sit up for her precious lord of creation, or that she expected him home at all before the next day. She sat in the parlor and worked at a pair of slippers for a birthday present for him, and talked of this, that, and the other, as if she were no worse off than any of her married acquaintances, or even than when she was single; and at eleven o'clock she proposed to go up stairs. She kissed me at the door of my room, and wished me sound sleep, with pleasant dreams."

"'I hope you are not easily disturbed,' she said, with smiling hypocrisy, so well done it would have deceived me had I not known too much already. 'For sometimes, in Ed's absence, I prow about the house, on patrol duty, at all unseasonable hours of the night. I fell into the habit when we removed to this part of the town. It seemed so quiet and secluded that I was afraid of burglars—very foolishly, as I know, now. I am never nervous when Ed is at home. He is a garrison in himself.'

"I am no coward, and it wasn't the fear of house-breakers that kept me awake until half past one o'clock, when I heard footsteps upon the sidewalk, then the clang of the gate, and somebody walked heavily across the floor of the piazza. Karen's room was upon the opposite side of the hall from mine, and by the time the late-comer reached the gate, her door opened softly, and she slipped down stairs like a shadow. I was up too, so excited I did not know what I was about, only I had a notion that all drunken men were savage, and I meant to fly to her defence if need should arise. So, I drew back my bolt and stole out into the entry after her. She had left the gas dimly burning in the lower hall, and, peeping over the balustrade, I saw her, in her dressing-gown, unbar the door and let in my noble gentleman.

"'Ah, darling! I am glad you have come!' she said, kissing him and speaking cordially, without an accent of reproach.

"He tried to say something in reply, but he mouthed it disgustingly, and let his hat fall to the floor in attempting to hang it upon the rack. Karen laughed—think of it! in stooping to pick it up.

"'Why, it is quite wet! and so is your overcoat!' she exclaimed, passing her hand over his arm and back. 'Does it rain?'

"'Really, can't pretend to say; s'pose it does!' mumbled the wretch.

"'I am afraid you have taken cold, love!' went on the affectionate, spiritless goose, hurrying off his outer wrappings, for he could not unbutton his coat for himself. 'Another time see that you beg, borrow, or steal an umbrella, for my sake. Luckily, there is a delightful fire in our room. Come right up, and get dry and warm!'

"He steadied himself by the balustrade in setting his foot upon the bottom step, and she put her shoulder under his other arm, her hand resting on his neck, rather as if she were caressing than supporting him.

"'I am so pleased to have you back!' she repeated, blithely, as they came slowly up, and I retreated to my chamber. 'Not that I have been lonely. Bessie is here, and we have had a delightful evening together. You would have enjoyed her company, too—and her music. She sang several of the new songs you were speaking of the other day. You must hear them to-morrow, for I mean to keep her several days. Softly, dear! don't awaken her. She might mistake us for burglars.'

"Prattling in this merry, careless strain, she got him safely into his quarters. You people—mother, Sara and Janey, and you, Arthur—do not give me credit for any tenderness of compassion for my ill-treated sister," continued Bessie, her eyes sparkling with hot tears. "But I cried myself to sleep that night. Dearly as I love Karen, I would have wept less bitterly had I seen her in her coffin, than as I did, supporting in her weak arms that red-eyed, foul-breathed drunkard, guiding him carefully lest he should break his worthless neck, and rid her life of its blight, rescue their child from impending poverty and disgrace. Yet, next morning, I was almost as angry with her as with him. She came down to breakfast as lively as a cricket—a little heavy-eyed and somewhat pale, but cheerful and talkative.

"'What do you think?' she cried, without a blush or falter. 'Ed came home last night, after you had gone to bed. I can't tell you how disappointed he was when he heard you had spent the evening with me. He was detained later than he expected by business, and walked all the way up town in the storm rather than make me uneasy by spending the night away from home. He has taken cold in consequence, and I have insisted upon sending his coffee up to his room. I mean to keep him in all day, and you must help me amuse him. All men are restless and out of spirits when sick.'

"'Is he subject to these unfortunate spells?' asked I, provoked beyond reason.

"'He takes cold very easily, and generally has some fever with the cold,' she replied, pretending not to notice my sarcastic tone.

"'I thought liquor generally kept cold and wet out,' I said, openly. 'Karen, there is no use in trying to blind me, or any of your friends. Your husband's conduct, in-doors and out, has put concealment beyond your power. We all know what his falling is, and what your trials must be. Your pretty stories and dutiful subterfuges are thrown away when their object is to screen him. And, excuse a sister's frankness, when I tell you that I—that all right-minded people would think the better of you, were you to show some spark of womanly spirit; strive to arouse Edmund to a sense of your wrongs and his great fault, instead of petting him as if he were the chief of saints, when he comes to you in the condition he was in last night. You encourage him to persist in the downward road, when you ought, with all your might, to drive him back to the right way. But you were always too yielding and amiable—often deficient in moral courage. I am advising you in love and for your own good, my dear child. I dare say, if the truth were known, you have never remonstrated with your husband upon his fatal habit. This is unjust to him, to your child, and to yourself."

"I know you are blaming me, mother! Arthur, I can see by your face that you would have respected her the more had she ordered me out of the house for my plain speaking!" Bessie broke off her story to say, half defiant, half penitent.

"Never mind what my opinion is!" was her brother's ambiguous rejoinder. "Tell us how little Karen sustained your broadside. That is more to the purpose, just now."

"For a moment she colored up so redly, I really thought she was going to resent it," answered Bessie. "Then, she paled and quieted down into a sort of sorrowful dignity, I could not have conceived of her manifesting, if I had not seen it for myself.

"You mean well and kindly, Bessie, and so do the rest of my friends; but you do not understand Edmund or me. I cannot bear to hear you say 'fatal habit.' His temptations are many and powerful—old associations and the ties of kindred, and his own pleasure-loving nature. But there is too much that is noble, and good, and loveable in him, for me to cease to respect him, or to doubt his final reclamation. I must win him back—don't you see? not drive him. If partiality for his lively companions and the dazzle of their pleasures allure him from home, I must leave no means untried to make that home bright and attractive. If they court and flatter him, I must teach him to love his child and me yet more fondly; weave a counter-spell to their arts. I have no hope except in the power of love, Bessie. If I get faint and perplexed at times, it is because my faith is weak for the moment, not that the principle of my action is not sound."

"At that she launched into a dissertation upon the redeeming virtues of her idol, growing more eloquent each minute, until, as I have said, I got out of patience.

"The day will come, Karen," I warned her, 'when you will see that a gossamer veil is not the best thing with which to smother a fire.'

"And she will! If Edmund Livingston were my husband, I would try the efficacy of a wet blanket—that is, a tremendous application of nervous English, undefiled by overstrained scruples and amiable falsehood. And, if after that, he recoiled home at midnight, he would find a dark and empty house awaiting him. I would not disgrace myself by living with an irresponsible brute."

"Nor I," echoed Jane, drawing herself up stiffly.

Arthur glanced with a smile of inquiry at Sara Roberts, his betrothed, who sat opposite.

She answered, lightly: "You will find most women are agreed upon that subject, I think."

"Hardly, or the records of our courts would not be so full of tales of man's cruelty and wifely endurance. It is to the shame of our sex that these are written—to the glory of yours. None of us can doubt that Livingston is undeserving of the loving kindness he receives. It is a question whether our dear little Karen, young in years and inexperienced though she is, may not be wiser than all her teachers except her own loyal heart. My poor girl! What a dancing sunbeam she was when I went away! I dread to meet her."

Nevertheless, he took a street car next morning and set off for a visit to the sister he had not seen in three years. She was a bride when he took leave of her—a rosy, laughing beauty, the prettiest of the family, as she was the most sunny-tempered. Pet names were her birth-right, and her brother lavished such upon her as were expressive of his delight in her society and appreciation of the happy influence of this "Sunbeam," "Ariel," "Rose-bud," "Hebe," "Flora." He ran over the catalogue with more of melancholy than pleasure. Yet she had married with his full consent one to whom she had been attached from childhood. If anybody were to blame for the union, it was her older and more worldly-wise friends, not she who believed the world to be what her own bright fancies and pure heart had painted it.

It was nearly twelve o'clock when he reached the cottage, a tasteful residence in a pleasant street, and, as he entered the gate, he heard a sudden burst of music from within. It was a popular sonata, well played, and the listener's heart was lightened by the sound. "She cannot be very wretched, if she still takes interest in her practising, nor overworked, or she could not find time to learn new pieces," he reasoned. "Bessie may have exaggerated the evil, after all."

A neat servant answered his ring; but the piano was silenced by the shutting of the outer door, and Karen ran into the hall, radiant with welcome. A start and pause showed that he was not the one she expected to see; then, with a scream of rapture, she bounded forward and threw herself into his arms. "Arthur! Arthur!"

"The same darling sister, and prettier than ever," said he, holding her off presently and laughing in his exultation. "You don't look a day older or duller than you did at sixteen."

"I am glad to hear you say so. I dread growing old, and plain, and stupid, because Ed likes me as I am. Come in," drawing him into the parlor. "I am expecting him home every minute; I thought it was he when I heard the door close. He will be overjoyed to see you. We talk of you every day, think of you every hour, you splendid sailor lad!"

"I am sure now Bess was mistaken," thought Arthur, studying her ingenuous face as she named her husband. "I shall take the witch roundly to task for the false alarm."

Brother and sister talked fast and freely for half an hour, more seriously and yet more confidentially for another, and Karen sprang from his knee with a laugh. "That tiresomely unpunctual husband of mine shall not cheat us of our luncheon. I wish he had been brought up in the navy, or army, or somewhere else, that would have taught him the necessity of being up to time at meal hours. You shall eat the oysters I pickled for him and the fresh cocoanut cake baked not three hours ago. You must see for yourself what a famous house-keeper I have become. Ed does me full justice in this respect generally, so I am terribly chagrined at his tardiness to-day."

The luncheon was tempting and set out handsomely, although the table was laid before the arrival of her visitor. Her dress was carefully arranged, and a rose-bud and myrtle-spray were twined in her hair. Baby Willie, aged eighteen months, was arrayed in a clean frock and wide blue sash, and his curls were in irreproachable order, that he might be reviewed by "papa."

"Who is ridiculously fond of him," said the proud mother, kissing her beautiful boy. "Yet, I can't blame him."

He, for whom all these preparations had been made, was still absent when the late luncheon was dispatched, and the short February afternoon began to close in duskiness.

"What can detain him on this day of all others?" Karen remarked, twice, walking to the window to watch for the absentee. "He is very much engaged just now, however, settling up his old business and laying plans for the new. You must stay to dinner. He will never forgive me if I let you go."

Arthur had an engagement to dine at Mr. Roberts', and Karen was reluctantly bidding him "Good-by" in the hall, when a voice was heard upon the piazza, a stamping and shuffling, then a fumbling about the lock. Bessie's story rushed upon Arthur's recollection at the swift fall of Karen's eyes beneath his involuntary glance of anxious sympathy; but she walked directly to the door and opened it, put up her lips for a kiss, and, holding her husband's hand in both of hers, turned upon her brother a face, whose steadfast love and the smile that lighted it made it to him like that of an angel.

"Darling!" and she said it without effort, "here is our dear brother Arthur, who returned home last night."

"You don't tell me so!" The half-tipsy man blundered forward to seize the wanderer's hand. "Upon my word, I am charmed to see you, old fellow. I was never more agreeably surprised in my life. How are you, and how do you think Karen, Happpuch here, is looking? Pretty well-preserved, hey?"

The same could not be said of himself. He had grown fleshy and rubicund, his eyes were watery, and his articulation was thick. Still, with all these drawbacks, he was a handsome man, graceful and courteous in bearing, through the disguise of dissipation. Karen kept hold of his left hand, smiled up at him as he put his arm about her. Arthur could have torn her from him and borne her from the house and his companionship to return no more, but for the light in her eye, the resolute lines of the girlish face. "He is mine," these said. "I am set for his defense, maybe his redemption. Respect my love and my mission."

"And you have had him to yourself all day, have you, Happy?" continued Edmund. "I should have been in at noon, according to promise, but I was engaged!"

Karen struck in quickly: "I know you were, dear. And Arthur is to spend a whole week with us soon, devote to me all the time he can conscientiously spare from mother and Sara. He is pledged to the latter for this evening, or you may be sure I would not let him off. I am more reconciled to his going, now that you have had a glimpse of him."

Looking back from the street, Arthur saw her, through the parlor window, gently lead her husband into the warm, bright room, seat him in an arm-chair, and, standing by him, stroke his disordered hair, her head bent toward him in playful or loving speech—and tears blinded the spectator's vision as he strode on, his heart burdened with a wonder of compassion, admiration, and affection that could not find vent in words. He did not speak of the scene, even to Sara, but he silenced Bessie's inquiries touching his visit with "Karen knows what she is about. If she cannot reform him, it is useless for anybody else to try."

After her brother's departure, Karen stood, as he had seen her, beside her husband, toying with his hair, and talking of the pleasure Arthur's coming had given her, recounting some of his adventures, and repeating his droll sayings. Her tone was sprightly, but there was pain in the eyes Edmund could not see, and heartache was slowly drawing the blood from lips and cheek. That the man of her choice and love should have lowered himself in Arthur's estimation was the bitterest drop that had yet been distilled into her cup of sorrow. The sight of her long-absent favorite had brought up vividly the scenes of her care-free girl-life, the flush and beauty of her honeymoon, and even her hopeful spirit sickened at the contrast between that picture and this. What was to be the end of it all—of her pious deceptions, her struggles, her devotion? For two years she had striven to hide her husband's frailty, and to lure him back to home and virtue. Without a doubt or tremor, asking advice of none but of HIM, who she believed was touched with a great and tender pity for the fallen man's infirmities and her trials, she had marked out her path of duty. Without flinching, she had walked in it. She did not think of leaving it now, but, for the first time in their united lives, her heart burned with something like resentment toward the one who had wrought her mortification and anguish. Other men could resist temptation successfully, fight their way back to respectability when they had seemingly lost caste by vicious indulgence. Was he weaker than the majority of his kind, or was his love for her too slight a lever to be depended upon in so important a matter as moral elevation? It was weary, weary toil, this hoping in the face of a mountain of discouragement, this faith unaided by a flash of sight.

"Did I hear you sigh?" asked Edmund, who was beginning to grow silent and dull in the heat of the fire and the luxurious comfort of the easy-chair. The unusual sound had stimulated his drowsy senses.

"If I did, I was not aware of it," Karen recovered herself in a moment. "I believe I am hungry, though. You missed a famous luncheon by staying away to-day. But don't fret, there's a good child, and I'll get up a nicer one to-morrow. Art looks well and handsome, doesn't he? He is the very picture of a noble sailor."

"He looks like his sister," replied Edmund, his hand closing hard over hers, "who never did but one foolish thing, and that was marrying such a worthless rascal as I am. It was a sorry investment, Happuch."

She stooped to kiss his forehead. "I have never regretted it, dear," she said, firmly. The grasp upon her fingers tightened, but nothing more was said by either. The seed dropped in sorrowful love might spring up by and by, or be lost upon the hard soil trampled by follies many and fiends not a few.

There was no sign of germination within the next month. If Edmund's conduct were changed in any respect, it was in longer absences from home, and, when he was there, in spells of gloomy silence that fairly baffled his wife's attempts at diversion. Her hopes had never been at a lower ebb than on an afternoon in April, when Arthur, whose leave of absence was drawing to a close, came out to see her, accompanied by Sara Roberts. He had in his hand a small white basket with a top, which he passed over to his sister before seating himself.

"An addition to the poultry-yard," he said. "Fifteen white Dorking eggs. There is no finer breed in the market. Sybalt, the great poultry-fancier, selected them for me, so they are fresh, and warranted to break shell all right and in due time. Look at her, Sara. Her eyes brighten as if I had given her a set of real pearls."

Mammoth pearls the eggs did resemble. Arthur, to suit his whim, having packed them in pink cotton wool, such as is used by jewelers, and in regular rows.

"The beauties!" ejaculated Karen, delightedly. "And isn't it the most marvellous coincidence that the staidest matron of my flock is crazy, as she signified to me this morning, to have a nest and eggs of her own? By and by, Arthur, you must go out with me and set these under her. Only, I should like, if I could, to keep them under glass as a parlor ornament. They are so handsome. It seems a pity to hide them away, even in the hope of chickens that will furnish us with abundance of the same."

The three went together to the poultry-yard. It was a section cut off from the garden, surrounded by lattice-work, and lined on three sides with coops of fanciful pattern. Poultry-raising was a hobby with the expert little housewife. Perhaps no one but her brother suspected how often she resorted to the care of her feathered pets as a solace in loneliness, relief from the pressure of suspense or the gloom of forebodings that bowed her to the dust. Each fowl had a place and name belonging to itself, and they flocked about her feet as she entered the inclosure, clucking, screaming, and cackling, flying up to peck at her dress and hands, and one pert young cockerel perching himself upon her shoulder. Karen scolded, her guests laughed, and they made a frolic of setting the eggs under a mouse-colored Partlet, with very round eyes and a top-knot. Arthur marked the "pearls" before handing them to Karen, who knelt by the coop containing the nest, soothing the prospective mother in her arms, while she disposed the purely white ovates in the soft hay.

"Arthur to Karen, April 15th," was the inscription upon each, until the fifteenth was reached. This bore the date and, in minute characters: "Do not enumerate juvenile poultry at a period anterior to their incubation."

"You absurd specimen!" exclaimed his sister, as she read it.

"The egg or myself?" he queried.

"Both."

"So far as your humble servant is concerned, he has seldom given wiser advice than is conveyed in that refined version of the ancient adage. As for the egg, I hope it will speak for itself some day."

"Now, Dame Durden," coaxed Karen, smoothing the ruffling top-knot, "everything is ready for you. I am sure you go into your three weeks' retirement with a thorough sense of the responsibility resting upon you, and the honor conferred by the important trust committed to you. Pax vobiscum."

"What a buoyant nature hers is," said Sara to her betrothed, on their way home.

"Thank Heaven that it is," was the response. "She has enough trouble to crush an ordinary woman."

Karen passed the evening alone when she had put her child to bed. Edmund was absent upon one of the many excursions to which he was invited. This was the trial-trip of a new river steamer, and his wife did not expect him home before eight or nine o'clock at the earliest. She sighed aloud and heavily as the hands of her watch pointed to eleven, and there were still no signs of his return. At twelve, she replenished the fire in the sitting-room, closed the shutters upon the first floor, put out all the lights except that in the hall, and sat down upon the carpet, leaning her head in her husband's arm-chair. She could neither work nor hope longer. Prostrate in heart and spirit, she only wept silently before her GOD. HE knew her misery and her needs, HE alone, and in HIS good time release would arrive. She thought no more of other relief than such as the grave would bring.

She had fallen into a troubled slumber when a bustle and loud talking in the hall called her to her feet. There was only time to rub her eyes open and turn up the light before Edmund entered accompanied by his cousins, the young Livingstons, and Will Lee, the three most objectionable of his very disreputable associates. Not one of them was quite sober, but they were all jovial, relating in one breath to her the mishaps that had befallen the voyagers—the last and worst being their detention upon a sand-bar from six o'clock until twelve. The passengers, having devoured everything edible on board by the middle of the afternoon, had fasted for eight hours, and, when they were landed in town, found every restaurant and oyster-saloon closed for the night.

"So, I have brought them in to get a bite that may save them from absolute starvation," concluded Edmund. "A cup of coffee, hot and strong, for it is confoundedly cold and raw, beginning to rain, too, and something savory in the way of meat or oysters, will be all we want."

"I am afraid I have nothing very nice to offer you, dear," said the wife, endeavoring to hide her dismay at the proposition. "But I will do my best."

He followed and overtook her in the hall. "I am sorry, Happy, but I couldn't get out of it, and we are really famishing," he said, in genuine concern. "I wouldn't have brought them, but they bantered me, dared me, in fact, and I knew I could depend upon your indulgence."

"Whether you can upon my pantry or not, is a more important question," said Karen, forcing a smile. "I have a morsel of steak set away for your breakfast. Willie and I eat nothing but cracked wheat and cream in the morning, you know. There are just two slices of ham besides. Altogether, there is not half enough meat for four hungry men."

"That is unlucky; but you must have oceans of eggs. Your ham will season a big dish-full, and there is nothing more appetizing. I foresee I shall not have cause to regret my trust in you."

Back he went, confident and gleeful, to his comrades, and Karen sought the kitchen. Their only servant had been in bed for hours, and the range was stone cold. Fortunately, materials for lighting a fire were at hand, and it was soon crackling and roaring with a spirit that encouraged the sad-hearted cook. The kettle was put on, the "morsel of steak" inspected and returned to its place as useless in the emergency, the brace of rashers examined doubtfully, and then Karen brought down the egg-basket from the closet-shelf. It was empty. The shock of the discovery revived the recollection that she had that very day lent a dozen eggs to a neighbor, besides having set three hens within the week exclusive of "Dame Durden." "I cannot help it," she said, desperately. "It was unkind in Edmund to bring that crew here. It was insolent in them to come. They mean to annoy and mortify me. I will give them bread and butter and coffee, nothing else."

But she did not put the basket back; stood swinging it from her forefinger, and thinking fast and hard. Edmund would be disappointed and ashamed, and his associates would sneer at him, would choose to discredit the story of the actual poverty of her pantry, misconstrue the meagre array of provisions into a deliberate plan of hers to punish her husband and insult them for their untimely coming and demand. Edmund would be driven further from her, and was not her object by day and night, week and month, to attract him to his home, to make him feel that he could not ask anything unreasonable so long as it was in her power to supply it? "No," she spoke out again; "I cannot afford to anger him. In his least responsible moods, he has never said a surly word to me, never given me an unkind look. He shall not be tempted, now, to doubt his best friend."

She unlocked the kitchen door; threw a shawl over her head, and went out. The night was chilly, and a fine, keen mist was falling. But the light from the open door fell straight down the garden walk upon the latticed gate of the poultry-yard. Dame Durden stared out in sleepy amaze at the yellow flecks shining upon the wet gravel, as the rays darted through the network of the fence, but she cried out hoarsely in her wrath and fright, as a hand ob-secured the entrance to her coop and groped in the darkness for the treasures over which she had brooded in solemn pride, and, it may be, in hope.

"Sh! sh! poor old Durden!" said the voice she knew so well, gentle, but now sad to tearfulness. "I wouldn't rob you of your darlings if I could help it. It hurts me worse than it does you. There! I have left you three, and you'll try to forgive me, won't you?"

Karen did not look at the eggs as she broke them into the frying-pan. Her eyes were too full to read the pencilled inscriptions had she been courageous enough to risk the attempt. But her countenance was tranquil and hospitable when she appeared in the sitting-room where the quartette of worthies were staying their stomachs and warding off the effects of famine and dampness by a glass of "something hot."

"Edmund, dear!" said the patient housewife, brightly, "clear off the centre-table, please. It is so comfortable here I thought you would not care to go into the dining-room."

She sat down her burden—a tray that looked too heavy for her strength, on which were plates, napkins, knives and forks, and two covered dishes. Installing Edmund as head waiter, she bade him seat the guests, and returned to the kitchen for a smaller tray holding the coffee-service. The gentlemen were placed with much laughing and talking, and the lifted covers revealed ham and eggs, and eggs and toast smoking hot. The dishes were prettily garnished with curled parsley, and their contents were cooked to a nicety. The mistress of the house poured out clear, fragrant coffee at a side-table, and passed it with her own hands, and the boon companions, who were really very hungry, enjoyed their repast as they had never done the most superb dinner at a French restaurant. They praised everything, congratulated themselves and complimented their hostess, until they were satisfied and Karen tired listening to them.

She was thankful she had suppressed her resentment, and sacrificed her pride—almost reconciled the loss of Arthur's gift, when Edmund returned to her after seeing his unseasonable guests out.

"The dearest, sweetest wife in the world!" he said, holding her in his arms. "I am obliged to you, love, and proud of you!"

Had she not said truly that his speech to her was always kind and tender? How many women, whose husbands had no open and scandalous follies, could say as much? She could have cried bitterly, being fatigued, as well as hysterical, but she swallowed the hard knot that was tightening about her windpipe, and smiled. It seemed such an easy matter for her to look pleased and happy she never got half the credit she deserved for shining in the dark.

"I am fully repaid for what little trouble I have had, if you were content with your homely fare," she rejoined, clearing away the remnants of the supper. "It is not often that my cupboard is so nearly a copy of Mother Hubbard's, bare even of bones."

"You gave us a capital supper! good enough for the Lord Mayor—too good for three graceless bachelors who had laid a bet upon the chances of my getting nothing to eat but a stolen crust, with a Caudle lecture for sauce. There was not the least necessity for an apology, but yours was so gracefully worded and sweetly said, that I could not regret it." His triumph had evidently raised his wife in his esteem, yet he had always been extremely fond of her—admired her above all other women.

Karen shuddered a little in remembering her soliloquy over the empty egg-basket. What if she had carried her hasty resolution into effect, given her husband and his friends what Bessie would have called "a taste" of her just indignation?

"There is no other rule so safe and sure as that of love," she said to her sage little self when she at last laid her dizzy head upon her pillow, "love that suffereth long, yet is kind." Her last waking thought was a thanksgiving to her Heavenly Teacher that she had not lacked strength in the trying hour, and she dared pray, again in hope and faith, that the bitter cup might yet be withdrawn from her lips.

She was sewing in the nursery the following morning, Willie playing at her feet, when Edmund came in. She had kissed him "Good-by" with a pleasant face, but sinking heart, a little while before, and was at that instant trying to resign herself, without repining, to the prospect of a lonely day. He "had an engagement with Bob Livingston."

"He is about to buy a match to that fast sorrel roan," Edmund explained to his wife. "And nothing will do but I must go with him and try it. He is a good fellow, is Bob, and I don't like to seem disobliging."

Karen looked up inquiringly at his reappearance. His hands were full of egg-shells, and his visage wore an odd expression of perplexity and amusement.

"See here, Happy! what I espied on the top of the ash-barrel which Bridget rolled out for the scavenger, as I passed the area gate. Do your wonderful hens lay eggs ready labelled, or have you and your travelled brother been carrying on a correspondence upon this novel style of 'cream-laid, tinted' materials?"

"Arthur to Karen, April 15th," he read from three fragments.

"And upon this is some gibberish—a long string of it—which I cannot decipher," he added, turning another conical bit around slowly. "Do not enumerate juvenile penalty!"

"Poultry!" corrected Karen, laughing, to drown the heart-beats she almost believed must be audible to him also. "It is only some of Arthur's nonsense. He and Sara were here yesterday."

"But how happened he to get hold of your eggs? You did not entertain them in the kitchen, I suppose?"

"Oh, he is everywhere, you know, as full of pranks as a monkey, and that stuff is what he calls a 'refined version' of an old saying. Give it to me, dear. I will keep it and show it to him when he is a gray-haired, weather-beaten commodore."

Even she had been taken too much by surprise to say this without a conscious quiver in voice and laugh, and she fancied Edmund looked suspiciously at her in resigning the broken shells.

"Come home to luncheon, if you can!" she called after him to scatter his misgivings of mystery. "I shall have a miraculous pie—an apple mêrrique—just such as you dote upon." Nevertheless, she hardly expected him. She knew to what length of absence and other evil results these horse engagements were generally the prelude. She assuredly was entirely unprepared for the agitated face he brought into her presence, and the passion in the gesture that lifted her from the floor and left her with barely breath enough to remonstrate and question. "You grizzly bear! What has happened?" then, catching sight of his face, she clasped her hands, with an exclamation of terror. "Ed, dearest! what is it?"

For he was crying—this broad-shouldered, six-footer, with a beard like a lion's, and the muscle of a gladiator. Great tears were rolling fast down his cheeks, and he sobbed when he would have spoken. "I have seen Arthur," she understood him to say, at length. "I fancied there was something connected with the supper of last night in your evasion of my questions about those egg-shells. So, chancing to meet him in the street, I asked him for the key. I got the whole story from him. And then I told mine. Dear wife! suffering, loving angel!" He broke down outright.

"And all about a dozen paltry eggs!" Karen began to rally him, but failing ignominiously, sat down upon his knee, put her arms around his neck, and cried more heartily than he. "Edmund! Husband! I would lay down my life to make you happy!" sobbed the soft-hearted little simpleton, who ought, instead of hugging him, to have embraced the opportunity of reading him a rousing homily upon the error of his ways, and exhorted to repentance and works meet for the same.

"Karen!" He so rarely called her by her real name, that the sound of it was strange, and the solemnity of his manner alarmed her. "Karen!" lifting his hand toward heaven, "the Lord do so to me and more also if I do not cut off my right arm rather than ever touch another glass of liquor! Bear witness to this, for it is not an idle vow!"

He meant what he said, and through pain, thirst, sickness, the fightings within of diseased appetite and outward temptations, of jeers and entreaties and anger from those with whom he had joined hand in hand in the race to destruction, he kept his word to his earthly saviour.

"But it is my opinion that he would have left off long before if Karen had taken a firm stand in the beginning," Bessie always insisted. And in Arthur's absence, nobody contradicted her.

MORAL.

I have but one plea to make in defence of the pusillanimity of my heroine—the glaring improbability and the unprogressive spirit of the story I have told.

It is true from title to conclusion, in everything except the names of the dramatis personæ.

PANSY COQUETTE.

BY MARY M'CROSS.

In the shadow a pansy grew,
Bearing buds of purple hue,
And from the buds the flowers peeped through,
Sweet to smell and pretty to view—
The pansies in my garden.

Five little leaves on each green bud,
And inside these came a close-drawn hood;
The five little leaves were worn like a snood,
Let any one see her face who could—
Coy pansy in the garden.

By and by she opens her eyes;
On her cheeks the maiden blushes rise,
In her own fair face her heart it lies,
And from it breathe out perfumed sighs—
Sweet pansy in the garden.

Her petals numbered five in all,
Three were short and two were tall;
The tall were purple, as for the small,
She dressed them in orange from summer to fall—
Gay pansy in the garden.

She'd a dimpled chin, and she lay awake
With her eyes on the stars, their hearts to break;
The humble bees quarrelled for her sweet sake,
The braggarts sought sweet kisses to take
From the pansies in the garden.

They did her tender heart much wrong;
They kissed too oft and they kissed too long;
They saw she was dying, and off with a song
They flew, but she faded her sisters among—
Poor pansy in the garden.

NOTHING is more precious than time, and those who misspend it are the greatest of all prodigals.—Theophrastus.

WHAT heart has not acknowledged the influence of this hour, the sweet and soothing hour of twilight—the hour of love—the hour of adoration—the hour of rest—when we think of those we love, only to regret that we have not loved them more dearly; when we remember our enemies only to forgive them?—Longfellow.

LOTTIE'S APRIL FOOL BUNDLE.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

It was the first day of April, clear, bright, and windy. The first of April, be it known, was observed with all due pomp and ceremony in Hanover, the scene of my story. That is to say, boys chalked each other's jackets, left "bogus" packages of goods on door steps, mailed absurd letters, and played all sorts of time-honored tricks upon each other and the community around them. Doubtless there was "fun" for the perpetrators of the jests, or they would have been allowed to die a natural death, but whether the fun was as entirely appreciated by the victims may be reasonably questioned.

On the first of April, 1867 (I like to be particular about dates), Miss Lottie Wilkinson was demurely walking up the main street of Hanover with a little parcel in her hands containing buttons for a new dress. Dress and buttons were of great importance to my little heroine, for money was by no means bountifully supplied in her well-worn portemonnaie, and a new dress was rather an event in her daily life. She was walking quietly along, thinking that if her dress was chosen of a sober mouse color for economy's sake, at least the buttons and braid were blue as her own eyes, and would match the blue ribbons of her hat very nicely. Then she wondered if Bert Gilmore would see her on Sunday in the new suit, and if he admired the combination of mouse color and blue in a walking dress. With such absorbing topics for meditation, it was not wonderful that Lottie had forgotten entirely the day of the month, and stopped with surprise and the pleasure of a discoverer before a bundle lying across the sidewalk, evidently dropped by some one in advance of her. She looked up the street and down, but no one was near enough to be questioned, so she stooped and lifted the package, adding its weight to her own bundle, and continued on her way homeward, hurrying a little that she might examine her acquisition.

"See, mamma, what I found in the street!"

It was not a very tempting looking 'bundle that she held up; not a neatly tied dry goods' package, or a white paper-covered confectioner's store of sweets. It was a carelessly-wrapped, newspaper-covered package, rather long and narrow, and not very large. Still, there was rather an exulting ring in Lottie's tone, as she cried: "See, mamma, what I found in the street!"

Her face fell as a shout came from her brother Tom, a lad of ten, who looked up and, before her mother could answer, shouted: "April Fool! O Lottie, what a goose! I'll bet there's nothing in it but straw, or rags, or old newspapers. Open it, Lottie. There!" he cried, again, as his sister opened the parcel, "I told you so. Nothing but a lot of old papers."

Mrs. Wilkinson smiled at Lottie's disappointed face, as she hastily wrapped the papers up again, and thrust them on a lower shelf of the sitting-room closet, a sort of general receptacle for odds and ends of all kinds, and especially for waste paper.

The buttons were displayed next, and, by the time Lottie had put away hat and shawl, and was seated putting the last stitches in the pretty walking suit, Tom had gone off to a game of foot-ball, and the April Fool parcel was forgotten.

Mrs. Wilkinson had been a widow since Tom had first opened his great saucy blue eyes upon the world, and Lottie, then but eight years old, had but little recollection of a father who had spent most of his life away from home. He had held the situation of travelling clerk in a large commercial house in New York city, and during his life-time his family had lived handsomely in that city. Upon his death, his widow found that her means were sufficient to support her in comfort if used frugally, but were far too small for the style of living warranted by his salary. A country house was at once decided upon, a cottage purchased in Hanover, and furniture selected from the city mansion and sent there. Her income was sufficient for every comfort, but there was no margin for luxuries, and many an article of dress was left unpurchased that the fund laid aside for Tom's education might grow in bulk.

Lottie's education was her mother's own charge, and few boarding-school misses were more thoroughly taught, or could boast of more graceful accomplishments, than the little home-bred maiden. In addition, Miss Lottie was a most expert housekeeper; could make great varieties of bread, biscuit, pie, and cakes; could prepare dainty dinners and savory suppers; was proficient in needle-work of all kinds, and quite dressmaker and milliner enough for all home demands.

Mr. Herbert Gilmore was quite well aware of all these varied excellencies of Miss Lottie, and was also able to describe most accurately the glossy brown hair, soft blue eyes, creamy complexion, and graceful little figure of the young lady. He knew what were her favorite songs, and could bring a clear, powerful tenor to aid her sweet soprano. He knew that the pretty ornaments in the parlor were the work of Lottie's little white hands, that the flowers on the stand were tended by her, and the light tea biscuit were of her mixing.

You guess they were lovers. Well, so they were; but, as "the course of true love never did run smooth," so there was a great rock ahead in the channel of their love, and the rock was named Martin Gilmore. Martin Gilmore was as tough an old bachelor, as rich and hard-hearted, as ever figured in a romance, and moreover uncle to the handsome young Herbert, who had so long studied Lottie Wilkinson's blue eyes and busy fingers.

Mrs. Wilkinson had been a kind friend to the young man, whose only home was his uncle's gloomy house, and when the love story was confided to her, gave a willing consent to her daughter's betrothal with one whom she believed to be honorable and true, a sincere Christian, and worthy of her confidence. The question of money never occurred to her, and her amazement was unfeigned when she found Martin Gilmore entirely opposed to the match on the ground of the bride-elect's want of fortune.

Herbert at once asserted his right to choose for himself. He was a young lawyer, with a fair practice, without sufficient means to warrant matrimony at present, but hopeful and industrious, willing to wait for his home until he earned it, and by no means waiting for his Uncle Martin's fortune to fall to him. In the spring time of which I am writing, Herbert was a party in a lawsuit, of which I must soon write more, and there was some hope that the little home, over which Lottie was to preside, might be nearer than was at first anticipated.

April was a week old when, one evening, Herbert came into Mrs. Wilkinson's pleasant parlor, evidently in a state of some excitement. Lottie was alone, sewing (oh, ye romantic!) a patch on the elbow of Tom's jacket.

"Lottie, put down that sewing, do, and hear my news."

Such sympathizing blue eyes are not always raised for news.

"I've had a windfall."

"What is it, Bert?"

"I never would tell you about this lawsuit before, Lottie, because I did not consider my chance worth a pin; but it is different, now, and I want to tell you about it."

"I am listening, Bert."

"My father had two brothers and one sister, my Uncle Martin, Uncle Godfrey, and Aunt Elise. Years ago Uncle Godfrey and Uncle Martin accumulated large fortunes, but father was too liberal and open-hearted to save much, and never was a rich man. Some two years before he died, Aunt Elise married a man as poor as himself, but good and true. Uncle Godfrey opposed this match bitterly, and, when she was left a widow after six months of married life, he refused her any assistance. She was then very ill with what has since developed into spine disease, and father took her home. In furious wrath Uncle Godfrey made a will leaving his entire fortune to Uncle Martin. I was but a little child when all this happened, but I heard of it. Some five years ago Uncle Godfrey sent for me to make him a visit, and during that visit we became attached to each other. No longer the stern, angry man who disinherited my father, he was softened and penitent, and spoke most kindly of poor Aunt Elise. Before I left him he promised me to revoke his unjust will, giving me my father's share, and Aunt Elise hers. Do I tire you with my long story?"

"No, indeed!"

"Two years ago Uncle Godfrey died. Uncle Martin, as the oldest brother, took out letters of administration, and claimed the property on the old will. But behold, neither old nor new will could be found! I was not of age, and my guardians and Aunt Elise at once claimed the division of the estate according to law. So commenced the suit, and to-morrow the decision will be given in court. But a few days ago Uncle Martin, in turning over some deeds and mortgage papers, found the will leaving him the entire property."

"O Bert!"

"Wait, Lottie! Off started uncle to his lawyer's with all the papers bundled up together, and on his way he lost the whole out of his overcoat pocket. He has advertised in vain, offering a large reward. Small as Hanover is, Uncle Martin's papers are completely lost to all appearance. So to-morrow the suit will probably be decided as Uncle Godfrey would have wished, and Bert Gilmore will have fifty thousand dollars to offer Miss Lottie Wilkinson."

"But, Bert, if they are found?"

"Then Uncle Martin adds my share and Aunt Elise's to his own, and we are left as before."

"It seems hard!"

"True, but he has the law. Of course, if the will is found it would be only cheating to hold it back; but it seems utterly lost, or surely such tempting rewards as he advertises would produce it."

Then came other topics. Mrs. Wilkinson came in, and there was no more said about the lawsuit until the young man was leaving, when he said to Lottie:—

"To-morrow evening you may see the heir to a fortune if those papers do not turn up."

"When were they lost, Bert?"

"One week ago to-day. Good-night, Lottie."

One week ago. Why that was April Fool's Day! If—Lottie scarcely dared to think in words as she sped across the entry to the sitting-room, and tore open the closet door. Pulling out the papers in front, there lay the parcel she had found in the street. With cold, trembling fingers she opened it again. There they lay, closely-written sheets, folded in legal shape, and amongst them even her own inexperienced eyes soon detected the will.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" That was all she said, as she wrapped up the parcel and went to her own room with it.

Martin Gilmore was at breakfast, and to say that he was not in a good humor gives but a mild idea of the energy of his movements and the scowl upon his face. Herbert had hastily swallowed his coffee and toast, and was away to his office, but the old gentleman, growling at everything, was still at the table.

"A lady to see you, sir."

"A what!" cried the old man, glaring at his maid servant.

"A lady to see you, sir."

"What does she want?"

"Wants to see you, sir."

"Show her in. A beggar for some charity. She won't get anything here. If there is anything I do hate it is a strong-minded committee woman!"

The little figure that followed the maid servant into the room scarcely answered one's preconceived ideas of the energetic specimens of the sex hated by Martin Gilmore. She was petite, fair, and young, wore a mouse-colored dress, trimmed with blue, and blue ribbons on her hat.

"Want to see me?" growled the gentleman.

"You lost a package of papers a week ago, sir. Here they are."

Eagerly he clutched them, and opened one after another. "You shall have the reward," he said. "Yes, yes, they are all here!"

"I did not bring them for a reward! They were yours, and it was only honest to return them."

Little could he guess, by the clear steady blue eyes, what a wakeful, weeping night the honesty had cost.

"Why did you keep them a week?"

"I did not know what they were until last evening."

"Can't you read?"

"I did not examine the parcel. I found it in the street on April Fool's Day, and thought it was a trick parcel."

"Humph! Nice mess! Tomfoolery!" grumbled the old man. "And pray," he said, "how came you to ascertain last evening that it was not a trick parcel?"

Lottie hesitated a moment, then she said, steadily: "Mr. Herbert Gilmore told me you lost a parcel of valuable papers on the first of April, and I looked to ascertain if they were the same ones I found."

"Herbert Gilmore! Then you are!"—

"Miss Charlotte Wilkinson. Good-morning, Mr. Gilmore!"

"Stay—stay a moment! Did Herbert tell you what these papers were?"

"Yes, sir."

"And that this one," and he held up the will, "deprives him of fifty thousand dollars?"

"Yes, sir."

"And so you were willing to deprive him of his fortune?"

"He would not have a stolen inheritance," said the young girl, indignantly. "He is young, and can make his own way in the world. We," and a bright little blush followed the pronoun, "do not need a fortune to be happy."

"Then the finding of the will is a matter of indifference to you?"

"No, sir. I would like Herbert to have what his Uncle Godfrey wished him to inherit, if he could have it honestly, and I am very, very sorry for his poor Aunt Elise."

"What! Do you know my sister?"

"No, sir; but she is old, and poor, and sick. I wish she could have her share."

"Humph! Ah! Oh!"

My pen can give no idea of the intonation of the series of grunts that followed this speech of Lottie's.

Suddenly the old man got up, the will in his hand, and stood before Lottie. "Miss Charlotte Wilkinson," he said, abruptly, "I like you!"

"Thank you!" she said, demurely.

"I like you! I'm an old man, worth half a million dollars, but I don't know that anybody loves me. Do you think you could?"

"I don't know," was the frank reply.

"Will you try? You will be my niece, you know, when Bert marries you, and you will be a bit of sunshine in the old house it has not seen for a long time. Will you allow me to make you a wedding gift?" And, to her unutterable amazement, he walked across the room, and deliberately placed the will upon a bank of glowing coals in the open grate.

Both watched the paper crackle, curl, blaze, and finally float up the chimney in little black flakes. Then Lottie came to the old man's side. "I have done you injustice," she said, simply. "I have no father, but if you will let me, I will give you a daughter's love."

"Thank you, my dear," he said, taking her hand, and drawing her to him, "I will come with Herbert this evening to see your mother. Good-by, now; I must go to court and deliver up the remainder of Lottie's April Fool Bundle."

A REFLECTION.

BY J—.

I PAUSED the ocean shore
At the hush of closing day,
And heard the low and solemn roar
Of waters in the bay.
The waves were crowned with foam,
As, borne by the coming tide,
They sought far up the beach a home,
And stretched them out and died.

Mysterious sea of life,
Filling this earthly sphere,
Thy shifting tides and ceaseless strife
How plainly imaged here!
My troubled surge, I prayed,
With Heaven's ray luminous be;
And, speeding towards its strand, arrayed
Like the white wave of the sea.

THE blush is Nature's alarm at the approach of sin, and her testimony to the dignity of virtue.—Fuller.

MOTHERS OF MEN.

ALMOST all great men have had exceptionally good mothers; perhaps it would be better to say all, without any qualification: women, that is, who were able to elevate and ennoble them—which is something more than merely instructing and repressing—and whose action was of a larger kind than simply to keep them innocent and give them domestic tastes and habits. Not to go so far back as classic days, and the Spartan mothers who preferred that their sons should die rather than be dishonored—to the mother of the Gracchi and her kind—we have instances in quite our own time, of which Goethe is the typical example, of how much the future fame and greatness of our first-class men depend on the mother's education. We can easily understand this, knowing as we do how practically infinite is the influence of a mother over her son, and how illimitable his love for her. No after-love comes near it in depth or extent, though in point of fact that after-love may prove the stronger if opposed to it; as we often see when wife and mother come into collision together, and the husband has to side with one or the other, when if he is worth his salt he stands by his wife, unless she is manifestly in the wrong; but it is not equal to what that influence was, as to its effect on the character and future life. The first tenderness which a youth feels for the weakness of a woman, and the first faint exercise of his manly power of protection, are both for his mother. How delightful it is to him when, still a lad, she begins to take his arm, and look to him for little offices of care and help! Nothing makes him feel more manly than this; and even to be first in the school sports is not such a feather in his cap as the fact that his mother trusts to him for manly care. And it is only his mother who can do this. His sisters are either girls of about his own age, or "the children," who are practically babies to his young lordship, though they may be only three or four years his juniors. As the first they are too near, as the last too far off. He may play with the younger girls in a high condescending patronizing way, with just the aura of the paternal instinct surrounding his schoolboy roughness, and making him a trifle considerate and tender; and on occasions he may champion, but he more often snubs, his elder sisters, whose girlish folly he knows too well by heart to either idealize or greatly respect; but the mother is the revered, the adored, set too far above him to be criticized or plumbed—to her he carries the first fruits of his heart, and it is she who, for good or ill, becomes the standard of measurement for all future womankind. She is his saint for whose sake all women are in a manner sacred, because all are seen through the aureole that glorifies her; or she is quite the opposite of his saint, in whose vice, or folly, or meanness he traces the lineaments of the whole sex, which because of her he despises as something illimitably unworthy. Hence the action of women with their sons is of even more importance than with their daughters. Girls, though very much, are not so entirely, influenced by the mother as are boys. The future husband comes in to modify the yet plastic lines of the character, and to improve or deteriorate according as it may chance; but a man's opinion of woman in the abstract, or his character in the main, is seldom touched by his wife, though unalterably moulded by his mother. If he marries a woman of a low moral type, and his mother has been as noble as this wife is debased, he looks back on the grander nature as something that was as true as is this ignobler one, and through her can recognize the beauty and loveliness of womanhood. But if the wife and mother are both bad, can we wonder if he refuses to believe in the worth of the sex at all, and that he holds his own sad experiences as the truest, whatever other men may say? We venture to say that no man who had a noble mother was ever found to thoroughly despise the sex, whatever his after experience may have been; as that almost all men who speak ill of women, speak from the platform of their filial recollections. Mothers seldom think how vitally important is the effect of their influence over their sons, and how it will color once and for ever the tone of their mind towards all women in the future, and make a man chivalrous or a boor, respectful or contemptuous, for the whole of his after life.

Women should be careful to be as beautiful to their sons as to their husbands. If the slovenly carelessness of home is a mistake towards the one, so is it towards the other; and the unkempt disorder, the want of personal niceness in a mother, causes as much shame and disgust to the son as to his father. Following on the same line, and by an analogous course of reasoning, we see how infinitely mischievous is all that familiarity and disrespect of manner fashionable in the present day—how productive of real evil the boy's habit of speaking of his mother as "the old lady," his habit of lounging and talking slang in her presence, and his habit of rudeness and want of conventional courtesy generally. If women could—and a few can—make themselves the companions of their sons, yet preserve their respect, well and good; but for the most part the extreme familiarity of bearing of which we are speaking leads to ultimate disrespect. For when the artificial barriers are thrown down, it is hard to keep the loveliness of the flowers untouched, or the wealth of the vines unspoiled. Again, speaking of the respect which men ought to have for women, and the folly of destroying the basis of it in the family, how many women, naturally perhaps, but very ruinously, indulge and pet their sons at the expense of their daughters.

The best of everything goes to the boys; the most expensive education, which is also the most thorough; the largest share of pleasure; the first consideration; their convenience is studied in the family before that of any one else; their hours, their amusements, their pursuits respected, and the following of them out erected into a paramount necessity; while the girls must give up their time, their interests, their pleasures, the very worth and wealth of their lives, for their brothers' advancement or convenience—be contented with an education which is practically no education at all—be made the humble handmaids at home, and taught to consider themselves the inferior, and sufficiently honored, because fulfilling the law of their nature, if they can but minister to the wants of the nobler creatures. And the worst of it is, that when all is done, and the poor girls have been made uncomfortable and their lives have been dwarfed because of their brothers, those brothers themselves are ruined by the process. They are spoiled, and pampered, and indulged, and taught to be more masterful and selfish than even the natural instinct of manhood makes them; but they are not made lofty or noble-minded. They are suffered to tyrannize over their sisters for their own home pleasure, but they are effeminized themselves, unless indeed they are brutalized; but they are pretty sure to be one or the other as the result of their training. Many a man owes his total ruin to the foolish pampering of his mother. The story of the young thief who, on the place of execution, asked leave to whisper to his mother, and who bit off her ear in punishment for the injudicious indulgence which had landed him at the gallows, may be taken as the example—extreme, if we will—of the mischief of spoiling one's sons by over-indulgence. We see some mothers made into simply the victims of scampish sons, who prey on them and waste their substance in riotous living, but who, by virtue of a pleasant manner and a great show of affection combined with ingenuity in making up false stories, contrive to appear as angels of light, or, more soberly, as hard-working and meritorious citizens. These are the men who are in perpetual disasters not of their own making nor by their own fault; but because they are so confiding, dear fellows, they are being continually taken in by the designing; or because they are doomed by some mysterious law to misfortunes undeserved, and so fail in all they undertake. Hence they are always losing money, and must be kept afloat by the family purse, for love's sake and the family honor; or else they are full of brilliant schemes of a quite glorious and safe character—things that must succeed if only they could command sufficient capital to work them thoroughly. So the mother's dowry and the girl's portions go into the crucible, all to make the fortunes of the house and the undying fame of their elder boy. But the supply is never quite enough, and the end of it all is, with no fault on his part, a mass of burnt-out clay instead of a lump of gold, and universal ruin in the place of a jubilee of good luck. It is all like that wonderful pot of gold which lies under the rainbow, if only you could succeed in getting up to the rainbow! Yet nothing can open the mother's eyes, and she would not thank her best friend for couching her blindness, if even her best friend could couch it. This is one kind of mother—this kind which believes so pathetically and implicitly in her boy, and thinks him faultless, holding him to be as pure and unsullied in all things as when he was a baby. Other women she thinks may have bad sons, but hers is an exception, and she is proud of him accordingly, and never believes in appearances however much they may be against him.

Another kind of mother is she who cannot understand the difficulties of her son's life, who does not see the strength of the temptations besetting him, and consequently cannot provide an antidote—who teaches him nothing of the world, and cannot help him when he is near to fall—who can guide him nobly, but who, if she finds him out in faults that she might have foreseen, and perhaps could have prevented if she had had wisdom and courage, is hard or broken-hearted according to individual temperament. This is because so few women are able to look at life as it is, or to understand the world as it exists. They call their ignorance innocence, and prefer their darkness to any light that could be let in on them; so there is nothing to be done for them, and they must be left to their own self-delusions. Another thing which you cannot get women to remember is, that their children are not their sole property, but that they are citizens of the State as well as sons; and that they should be educated for their own future well being and for the good of the State, and not only according to the crazes and follies of the maternal fancy. All those androgynous boys, with their long curled scented hair, in their hybrid costumes, half frock, half tunic, their pretty little gentle occupations, brought up in a catlike dread of wet, and a girlish horror of rough sports—what are they but so many live dolls in which the mother takes her pleasure, but of whose personal good she is utterly unmindful? She may certainly cheat herself so far as to come to the belief that making them as much girls as boys is good for their souls, if doubtful for their bodies; but in general it is the mere instinct that speaks, and she acts like a fool because she will not give herself the trouble of reasoning out her folly.

In fine, we cannot speak too strongly of the importance of a mother's influence over her son, nor the need there is of a nobler, a larger, and less personal ideal of the duty than exists. She should be his first and enduring object of reverence; in her he should learn to respect all other women; through her teaching he should recognize the main value of such good as he possesses; and, without running into sentimentality, he should think of her justice and sweetness, her blameless honor, her uprightness, and truth, and stainless life, when tempted to degrade himself below the level of his education, and for her sake refrain from the evil which a lower model would have rendered only too easy. Women ask for work and power; they have both ready to their hands; to educate a noble race of men, a generation which will honor their training by their own nobility of life—men who will raise the whole platform of society through the power bestowed by a mother's teaching.

TO THE FIRST FLOWER OF SPRING.

BY MRS. SALLIE E. BALLARD.

Dost vainly look up to the cloud-veiled sky
For one warm ray of love, or one merciful shower?
As chill on thy bosom the early dews lie,
Thou pure-hearted blossom, pale sorrow-nursed flower,
That gem in thy heart thou hast faithfully kept Like a sweet thought of love in its uttermost deep;
'Tis the tear which the pitying flower-angel wept
As she kissed thee awake, from thy long wintry sleep.

Ah! faint was the smile of the storm-cradled day
That greeted thy coming, pale firstling of spring;
Cold, cold, is the north wind, and rough is the play,
And rude is the sweep of his boisterous wing.
No murmuring cadence, no love-softened tone,
No low music breathing his clarion voice hath;
Fair beautiful smiler, so timid and lone,
How dar'st thou bloom in his pitiless path?

Didst think the warm tears that gem-lighted thy gloom,
Were weepings of April, who mourned thy delay?
It was only wild March, leaning over thy tomb,
In tenderness fitful, that died with the day.

Didst think the young grasses would bend o'er thy bed,
And whispering winds seek thy dewy retreat?
That gold-tinted sunbeams at play round thy head
Would woo thy young heart with caresses so sweet?

Alas! gentle mourner, so lovely and chaste,
How cold and unsmiling the face of the earth;
How bleak were the winds, and how barren the waste,
And how cheerless the gloom that encompassed thy birth.

Clasp thy shivering leaves to thy wee slender form,
Fold thy bright petals close to thy tear-laden heart,

Bow thy beautiful head, for God ruleth the storm,
His mercy will shield thee, all lone as thou art.

God tempereth the wind that it may not destroy;
He marks every quiver that thrills through thy form;

And the heart-ware of life, that with tremulous joy, Through thy delicate being pulse swiftly and warm;

And the influence soft of sunshine and shower,
His hand omnipotent fully grasped,
By his infinite wisdom, and power,
Pale tremble and gleamed and clasped.

IN AMBUSH.

BY INO CHURCHILL.

(Concluded from last month.)

THE evening was not so dull to me as I had feared. The roseate hues that often linger far into the twilight seemed to throw their warm glow into my heart, deeper and deeper as they faded slowly from mortal vision, and I almost fear my eyes reflected too much of their brightness. No one had been in that evening except Antonia, and she remained to tea, and when it was time for her to depart, there came up a sudden shower that prevented her going, much to her dissatisfaction. She had hoped for Mr. Talbot's company, and I know she longed to secure him for a while alone. I was dissatisfied too when I found she would share my room, the house was so full. My cousins had indulged me in what they called my whim, in wishing always to room alone, and the chamber over the hall had been assigned to my exclusive use. I hold that my room is my sanctuary, and it is necessary for the cultivation of my heart that this place of refuge shall not be invaded unless, indeed, by one who can become my second self in thought and hope.

My bed would scarcely accommodate two, and I gave it up to my unwelcome guest with the feeling that I was allowing a serpent to creep into my Eden. But there was no help for it, and I assisted her to disrobe, and laid myself down on the lounge, determined to keep one eye open lest it should coil round my heart, and press out my life with its treacherous breath. For a long time she lay with her face toward me, her eyes gleaming in their covert, artful brightness, now glowing and deepening in their fearful concentration; now running over with dazzling light, seeming to inclose me within the charmed circle. And once, when my eyes closed and my head fell back from very weariness, she crept stealthily toward me, twined her magnetic hand among my tresses, passed her fingers slowly and regularly over my brow, her breath coming quick and short, like that of a tigress intent upon her prey. I was too terrified to yield my senses to her stronger will, and I forced my almost enslaved consciousness to struggle against her, and I rose from my couch, as if alarmed for her safety.

"Antonia," said I, "Antonia, wake up, you have risen in your sleep; you will hurt your arm," and I led her back to bed completely foiled, and unsuspecting of my knowledge of the part she meant to play.

She at last grew weary of watching me, and settled down to quiet slumber, while I courted the drowsy god in vain, though I did not think she would really do me personal harm. I resolved over and over in my mind how I should manage to dress in the morning without waking her, or escape unobserved from the room at the early hour appointed for my sail. In truth,

I did not perform a very elaborate toilet; my dress was almost plain in its simplicity, and I only fastened a knot of black velvet and a sprig of green in my hair by way of ornament. I was going to admire Nature, and I had no wish to flaunt bright colors in her face.

Antonia remained quiet as I tiptoed around the room, upsetting half a dozen things in my extra care. She was very lovely with the flush of sleep on her soft cheek, her fair, round arm thrown above her head in the careless attitude of childhood; but the smile that played about her lips as I watched her a moment, seemed sinister even in its unconsciousness. I feared she would wake, and, catching my hat, I went softly out. Mr. Talbot came from his room at the same moment, and we went down the stairs together.

We were scarcely the half hour walking to the verge of the pond. I always felt so light-hearted in the glad morning; my companion's steps kept pace with mine, and we laughed, as we scattered the dew-drops, and bid the daisies "good cheer." Oh! how delightful it was when we were fairly seated in the dainty pleasure boat, that rested like a shell on the water. Mr. Talbot lowered the sail, took the oars, and we darted like an arrow to the middle of the pond; and then we floated leisurely about, drinking in the lovely scene, so tranquil in its hushed joy, that I almost held my breath for sympathy. The sun had not risen, but the earlier sky was a-flush with a glory not born of its own calm loveliness; and the neighboring trees lifted their heads with an expectancy too joyful for aught merely earthly. The fair face of the pond had smoothed itself out into perfect transparency, as though it could not too gloriously reflect the beauteous countenance of the bright king of day. Even the water lilies raised their tender heads that a glint of their creamy lips might show they were ready to give back for the sun-kiss, all that lay in their fragrant hearts.

I forgot everything else as I pushed off my hat, and clasped my hands for a part in the benediction. It came quivering and sparkling at first, as the gleam of some quiet joy comes upon us in delicious bits of splendor; and then the whole great volume of light poured itself lavishly out, as though the hand of God had opened, and there was nothing more to give or ask, so soul-flooding was the benison.

My poor human eyes were dazzled with the glory, and I looked down into the clear water for a bit of earth-born shading, before I could gaze upon the sky again, just as we look into other hearts for a reflection of our joy, that, unsympathized with theirs, might intensify to pain.

I know my tears fell into the lily-cups as I leaned to the other side of the boat, but they were not tears that could mar the softest down of the perfume-laden petals. How each waxen leaf had opened, and every grateful heart unfolded. And I am afraid the tears came faster, as Mr. Talbot removed his hat and said, reverently, "All Thy works do praise Thee!"

But his words had brought me back to the realization that I was not alone, and now that the deeper feeling had passed, the tears went with it, and I laughed and blushed, like any other foolish maiden, when he laid the lily-wreath he had twined caressingly upon my head. Oh, what a happy time we had. And how delicious was the thrill of life that trembled through my veins, and something deeper seemed to thrill there too; I know not what it was, but I think Mr. Talbot felt the same, for his face was strangely beaming as he clasped my hand. We often feel like taking every one into our warmest friendship, when our hearts are vibrating under the touch of "the electric chord that makes the whole world kin."

Suddenly I was conscious of some disturbing element in the peaceful scene. I cannot explain it, except by the magnetism an evil heart endeavors to throw about its opponent. The feeling was but momentary, but in that moment, as my eye glanced searchingly into the thickly-wooded grove that skirted the western border of the pond, I'm sure I caught a flutter of scarlet and a raven shadow. It might have been but the turning of some poisonous red leaf of the wood in hasty shame from the face of the light, or the hurrying of mighty shadows from the open realm of day. I think my cheek paled a little, for my companion looked searchingly at me, then rowed once or twice round the pond, shooting back soon to our starting point.

"Well," he said, as I sprang from the boat, scarcely touching his offered hand, "shall you count this one of your pleasant mornings?"

"Too pleasant; too happy almost ever to be enjoyed again," I said, forgetting the construction he might place upon my words.

"I trust not," he replied, generously, though the light leapt up to his eye; "youth and health find enjoyment in many a less inspiring scene."

We waited long for Antonia the next day, but she did not come, and our party, with Mr. Channing and Fred Ramsey, started out for a ramble. No place in the vicinity was left unexplored, and after a while we found ourselves by the wood, near the "lily pond."

"Oh! let's go into the bushes after winter-green berries," cried one, and we all started forward. We had reached the densest part of the forest, when my shoe became unfastened, and I stooped to secure the lacing, when I caught a glitter of steel under a broken bough. I pushed aside the twigs, and found it was a small poniard, its hilt encrusted with jewels—opals, I noticed, as, with a shudder at their reputed influence, I slipped the elegant but dangerous toy into my pocket. How came it there? Who could have lost it? And with the wonder came the recollection of the flash and the shadow I had half-seen, half-imagined the day before. I had no time to follow out my train of thought, for the girls called me to come forward, for they had found the spicy berries they sought, and were gathering them with a will. They were not agreeable to my taste just then. A deadly miasma seemed to have settled over everything around, as the breath of the Upas taints all that its leaves overshadow.

The air seemed stifling, and I turned toward a more open part of the wood, where the breeze lifted the swaying leaves. Mr. Talbot followed me, but I bid him "hush" as something caught my ear. We both glanced toward the edge of the water, whence the sound seemed to come, and there was Antonia De Lancie, her black hair streaming down her shoulders, her eye searching with terrible intentness along the margin of the lake. She stepped with a careful cat-like tread, turning every leaf of the trailing poisonous vine, reckless of the noxious touch; throwing aside the mud from the gnarled tree-roots, unmindful of its pollution. What was she looking for? Held I the fearful object of her search within the folds of my dress?

I was spell-bound as I gazed at her, and Mr. Talbot remained silent. She grew discouraged, at last, threw back her clinging hair impatiently, snapped the scarlet ribbon that held her wrist, looked mockingly at the severed band, clenched her hands wildly together as in fear, and struck at her forehead as if in anger; her eyes still gleaming in opalescent lustre, her lips muttering some fearful gibberish that grew maniacal and weird-like as its sound was wafted to us by the fitful motion of the intercepting trees. The girls, some distance off, were quiet at their work, and she did not notice us, who were almost entirely concealed from her as she passed. She was too much absorbed in her own thoughts; her face was deadly pale, almost haggard, in its expression of abject fear. I involuntarily shrank closer to my companion's side as she paused a moment and looked piercingly around on the ground. She changed her course soon and disappeared from view, and I looked into Mr. Talbot's eyes, and he looked into mine. Neither of us spoke; there was a look of concentration, almost of pain, about his fine mouth, that, nevertheless, was sternly set as he waited silently with his arm about me for me to recover from the strange shudder that shook my frame like an aspen, and set my teeth to chattering as I felt the movement of the concealed poniard against my side.

"Take me home," I gasped, scarcely able to articulate.

"Soon," he replied, quietly. "We must go on the rest, and you must not carry so much to incite a questioning that would but we have seen. I will gather the leaves from this oak, and you must make me a wreath."

And he climbed the tree, and strew down leafy showers upon me. Then he came down, and we sat together on the rock, and plaited the leaves quietly, until the others, grown weary of waiting, came gleefully toward us. Then he took up an armful of green, scattered it all over my head, with a playful remark that brought back the color to my face and the sparkle to my eye.

"How very exclusive in your leafy bower!" said Lizzie Archer. "Are we everyday mortals trespassing on your bliss, and dissipating all your exquisite fancies?"

I gave her some saucy reply, and we started homeward, Mr. Channing walking persistently by my side as Lizzie gayly led Mr. Talbot captive.

I could see that he endeavored to appear natural, though his witty companion failed to evoke his usual merry laugh. He is pained, thought I, and he loves Antonia, and yet why did he not go to her in her distress? His gentlemanly kindness and considerate delicacy probably held him back.

I put my hand into my pocket thoughtlessly, and touched the hilt of the weapon. I must tell him of it. How could I with all my fearful thoughts concerning it? And yet, of course, he did not share them, and he would return it to her, if it were hers, much more gracefully than I could do. I whispered him to come to the garden-seat as soon after dinner as he could do so unobserved, and wait for me if I were not there; the girls I knew would not be there at that hour. I blushed at my temerity, but he did not appear to think me unmaidenly when he replied in a low tone that he would come.

I did not wish to assume an air of mystery, so when I found him there, and we sat down together, I told him what I had found, and produced it as naturally as though it had been a lost key. It was, in some way, to him, I feared, as I noticed his rapid change of expression as he took it from me. I told him simply how and when I found it. His eyes questioned me still, but he did not speak. He knew of what I was thinking, no doubt. He turned it over in his hand, looking minutely at the opals, and started strangely when he noticed one was gone. Without speaking he took from his vest pocket a ring, an opal, set round with burning rubies, and examined it. The gleaming, changing stone might have been taken from the vacant socket as to the size and coloring. I'm sure he felt convinced it had once rested there. He handed me the jewel. Inside the circlet was inscribed "From A. to W." When I returned it to him, he placed it on his finger. I suddenly bade him not, but he half-smiled and kept it there.

"You will take that away?" I asked, pointing to the weapon he held. "I cannot sleep if it is near me."

"I will take it; but, Miss Jessie, all this must rest between you and me."

I bowed; I could not talk, I was weary and sick at heart. When we went back to the house, I could hardly believe but I had been under some strange hallucination in the morning, for there sat Miss De Lencie, practising the new music with the rest; the scarlet band unruffled, her hair in its polished ripple. The bloom on her cheek might have been artificial, but it was there in all its freshness, and it deepened and spread all over her glorious face as in giving her hand to Mr. Talbot she touched his ring, and glanced down to see the light of the opal and the rubies mingled into one liquid, tremulous drop. She had given him the ring, I saw; the bright flame of love, overpowering the half-avowed design in winning him, was expressed in its blended gleam. And he—~~he~~ put on the signet in my presence, and had come back and clasped her hand upon it. Could he love her, and did he mean to show me, spite of all my fears and vague suspicions, that now he openly trusted and claimed her? Why should he not, indeed, wild heart? Should my dislike preclude him from all love?

I rose dispirited the next morning. The air was heavy and oppressive. Mr. Talbot remained in his room, writing letters for the morning mail. In the afternoon several telegrams came to him, and afterwards I heard him ask aunt if she would keep him a little longer, as he must remain on business for a time, instead of returning to the city the latter part of the week as he intended. Then he came to me and asked me to go with him to Mattie's. We drove rapidly along; he was abstracted and I gloomy, and when we reached the house, I went directly into my sick friend, he remaining in the parlor awhile with Mrs. Brown.

He came in at length, greeted Mattie kindly, sat down beside her, and rested his hand on the arm of her chair. The flash of his ring attracted her notice, and she gazed a moment at it with dilating eyes and clenched teeth, and a low moan of anguish broke from her heart, and a stream of scarlet life-blood flowed from her lips. Mr. Talbot bid me close the door as he lifted her to the bed, and covered her stained garments that her mother might not see. But the hemorrhage was slight, and she did not lose her consciousness, but looked at her attendant so earnestly that he asked:—

"What is it, Mattie?"

"The ring," she replied; "will you let me see it?"

"Not if it makes you worse, my friend."

"It will not; it is all in my heart—this is only the overflow," she said, faintly.

He gave her the ring, and she looked closely at it, the color flushing dimly in her cheek as she saw the initials. She whispered something that I did not catch, and then said: "It is the same. O Will, lost Will!"

"You must not talk," urged Mr. Talbot, though I saw by the increasing pallor of his own face that he felt more than ordinary interest in the matter.

Mattie smiled. "It will make but a few days' difference; I shall see him all the sooner, and you are my friend. You must not wear this ring again. The red glow stands for Willie's blood, the baleful, changing beauty for his temptress' smiles. She drew his heart away from me by her insinuating wiles, and this was the pledge of her unholy passion for him. He broke away from her snares at last, and came back to me; but he kept the ring to mind him of his folly, he said; but when he was murdered the ring was gone, and a delicate but deadly knife remained forgotten in the wound. I can see the gleam of its opals now," and she shuddered. "While in the dismay and confusion, some one went out for the proper witnesses, the room was entered and the knife taken, but this was accidentally dropped. I found it and I kept it," and she drew from under her pillow a dainty handkerchief with a name upon it.

Mr. Talbot grew still paler as he looked at it. "You could not discover the last name?" he asked of Mattie.

"No," she replied; "the first is not a common one, and I never heard of any one who bore it."

"Then you do not know the name of her who exerted this wonderful influence over your friend?"

"No, I would not ask, and he never told me; but she knew where I lived, for she entered my home and killed him; I knew it was her, for no other one hated him as she who had once loved him."

All this was said gaspingly, and in detached sentences, and I observed what Mattie did not notice, that Mr. Talbot had written down each word as it fell from her trembling lips. He changed the subject then, and soothed her, then sang, in his low melodious voice, a beautiful hymn, and we went out. He gave a few hurried directions to the nurse, as I talked to Mrs. Brown, and we sadly went homeward. We had not spoken till he helped me from the carriage, then he said:—

"Do you think we could interest Miss De Lencie in Mattie enough to secure her a visit?"

"I think she would go at your request," I replied.

"I will bring it about, then, if possible. Sweetheart," he added, as if to himself, his eyes growing dewy.

"Sweetheart," indeed! base heart, false heart," I thought. The Sabbath intervened between this conversation and Antonia's visit to Mattie. I did not wish to go, but Mr. Talbot urged me, and I reluctantly consented. It was a long walk, but we were young and strong and did not mind. When we reached the house we were told to go directly to Mattie's room; she was there alone, hoping we would come. I hung back a while till the meeting between Antonia and Mattie was passed. I had a foolish dread of seeing them together, and ere I had gained courage to go in, Antonia rushed through the door and up the street like a fierce wind, and Mr. Talbot dashed after her without his hat. Mrs. Brown looked alarmed, but I made some natural explanation, as I went into the sick-room.

Mattie lay back in her easy chair smiling a little sadly, but she did not look excited or startled. "Did I frighten the lady away?" she asked, "or is she peculiar in her ways?"

"Rather peculiar," I replied, rejoiced that her manner had no ill effect. "No doubt she felt too full of life and hope to look calmly on your pale cheek. I fear she has not the assurance that all would be well with her if she were in your place."

"Then I would not exchange places with her unless my beloved was on earth, as hers is; she loves my kind physician, I saw at a glance. I am sorry if she is his choice, I thought—I had hoped so differently," she said, looking half shyly at me. "I do not like her; I fear her face will haunt me."

I had no reply to make, and I dropped my eyes; they fell on the open locket Mattie held in her hand; the clear, frank eyes of the miniature looked into mine, and I gazed at them admiringly. Mattie noticed my look.

"Oh," she said, blushing faintly, and closing the case quickly, "I forgot; I fell asleep while looking at it; the entrance of your friends woke me, and I did not put it away. But you may look at it now. It is Will, poor murdered Will!" and she laid herself back on the chair, a deadly pallor overspreading her face.

Antonia had seen it, then. But I would not allow myself to think; I soon bade Mattie "good-by," took Mr. Talbot's hat, and went out on the road. They were waiting for me, I saw, when I turned the abrupt bend in the street. I made no haste, for Mr. Talbot was talking earnestly to Antonia, soothing her, no doubt, in love tones, for her head was drooping, her cheeks kindling, then paling, I could see. I slackened even my slow pace, that I might not come too suddenly upon them. They saw me, at last, and came to meet me. I gave Mr. Talbot his hat, but I did not look at him. I did not care at all for anybody in the world, much less for him; but I asked Antonia why she left so strangely.

"I cannot tell myself," she replied; "there was something deathly in that girl's face. I am afraid of death," she added, shudderingly, covering her face as if to shut out some horrid spectre. "Don't take me there again," and she clasped Mr. Talbot's arm beseechingly.

We went over the remainder of the road with only now and then a word, our companions supporting us both, half carrying Antonia, I felt, while my hand rested lightly on his arm. The utter weakness that I felt should not be a weight upon his kindness.

He went away the next morning before I was up. I suppose Antonia knew he was going, for she did not come to us for several days; when she did she was herself again; but she voted croquet the dullest game she knew, and if the girls would play she would not stay with them. I was disengaged, and she put her arm through mine. "Let's off for a walk," she said; "I am in sympathy with your quiet mood and these twilight shadows."

I could offer no plausible excuse, so I suffered her to lead me, not caring much whither. The sombre twilight soon gave way to the play of the silver moonbeams, and they flickered across our pathway, decoying us onward by their fitful light. Antonia's grasp tightened on my arm, the light in her eye intensified, the color on her cheek grew vivid and burning as she talked in a mild way of the spirits that dwelt in the shadows, and their influence over mortals, till my overwrought imagination peopled the adjacent woods with myriads of strange creatures with lurid eyes and mocking, beckoning hands.

I was too frightened and she too intent upon her object, to notice anything else, till a quick, firm step sounded near us, and Antonia turned with an angry, baffled expression toward the intruder. I started a little myself at the sight of a stranger; but he was a human being, and he seemed a friend, coming, as he did, when I was approaching frenzy.

He lifted his hat, and said to my companion, "I believe I address Miss Antonia De Lancie."

"That is my name," she replied, haughtily; "will you make way for us to pass on? This is hardly the place for a stranger to accost me."

"I beg your pardon, if I am rude," he replied, placing an iron grasp on her beautiful wrist, "but, Antonia De Lancie, in the name of the law I arrest you as the masked actress of — Theatre, and the wilful murderess of William Norton!"

For one terrible moment she reeled and almost fainted, but with a superhuman effort she rallied, thrust her bound arm into her bosom, and, before he comprehended her design, drew forth a pistol and lodged a ball in his shoulder, pushed me violently to the ground, and sped away, we knew not whither. I was not hurt, only stunned, and I soon recovered enough to go toward the stranger; he was groaning terribly, and his face looked ghastly in the moonlight. What could I do alone in this dreary place? My first impulse was to run for help, but I considered that some one would hear the report of the pistol and come to us. I lifted the poor man's head to my lap, and wiped the dew of pain from his forehead. I was not wrong in my conjecture, for soon I saw Mr. Talbot's form coming rapidly toward us, followed by Mr. Channing and uncle. I explained hastily. Uncle took me, while the others lifted the wounded man, tenderly and carried him forward to the hotel. I cannot tell how the next week went by. We were all in excitement. Detectives were employed for the capture of the adventuress; her whole shameful story came out.

The dreadful particulars of William Norton's murder were familiar to uncle's family and Mr. Talbot. Indeed, we had all heard more or less through the papers at the time. But six months had passed, and, though strong suspicions had rested on the masked actress, she had preserved her incognito so well that until now she had successfully eluded pursuit, or even recognition, in the person of Miss De Lancie. Her character was anything but lovely and of good report, and aunt was horrified that she had permitted her to associate with us. The girls were shocked and indignant, though they insisted that during their acquaintance with her she never had revealed to them a glimpse of her evil heart. Mr. Talbot was silent on the subject. It was evidently a most painful one to him, though he had caused her to be apprehended, I felt assured.

Another week dragged itself wearily by, and yet no trace of the guilty one, and the officers except one had left. Lizzie Archer had bidden us farewell, and I was to go the next day. It had been a happy time, but for the unlooked-for ending, and I wanted to take a good-by look at all the frequented places. So on the last afternoon of my stay, I went out of the garden gate unobserved by the girls, and wended my way toward Mattie's; I never should see her again. To reach her house, I must needs pass the entrance to "lily pond" grove, and as I reached it, I had a strange longing to enter it once more. I had nothing to fear, with the bright sun dispersing all the gloom that surrounded it, and the evil heart had fled away forever. Yet, as I walked on, something beside my own will seemed to lead me. I noticed the apparently careless sprinkling of wintergreen leaves without attaching any particular meaning thereto, except it minded me of the other hour I passed there, and some other thoughts, warm ones, perhaps, clustered around the withered oak leaves blown in my path.

I forgot my surroundings, and only remembered myself, as I sat down on the same seat he and I had occupied together. Our lives mingled for a short time, pleasantly in the main, but now we were to be separated. The evil influence had taken itself away and hidden under its own black wings, and I was going out from under the protecting power into a way of my own approaching.

The sun had withdrawn his cheering beams, and evening with its dew and shadow was fast gathering there; so, perhaps, they would sometime close in around my heart and life. I looked hastily around, half-frightened, I scarce knew at what; but a low, entrancing music had reached my ears, and a little distance off, with torn, disordered dress, and hair unkempt, and glaring eyes, stood the murderess; her gaunt finger beckoning with slow, meaning emphasis for me to come, while the other hand was raised in caution. I did not move; astonishment rendered me powerless, and then her hands dropped listlessly, and her attitude grew abjectly pitiful in its mute appeal.

She was a woman and in distress, and I went to her. "She was innocent," she said, but I did not credit that, "and friendless, and starving, and tired of crouching there in the bushes with the scream of the night-owl echoing in her ear." She begged me to give her money, that she might go away at the midnight, when only spirits walked, and reach some lonely, secluded place, where hearts were simple, and minds were just.

I gave her what money I had, and offered her some jewels, but she would not take them; she dared not exchange them for bread. Then she thanked me and I turned to go; but like a tigress she sprang upon me, hissed fearful words into my ear, glared her hollow eyes upon me, and clenched her bony fingers around my throat. I thought my last hour had come, for she was mad with hunger and hate, and all the evil in her nature predominated. If ever I needed protection, it was then. Would God send me my deliverer? Yes, almost before my thought he came from the bank of the lake with a stride that compassed all the distance, and dashed the maniac's hand aside. Oh! the ribald, fearful oath she flung back at him and me, as with taunting gesture she turned from us, and fled from our sight with the speed of an arrow.

Oh! how sad was Mr. Talbot's face. The dark circles deepened under his eyes, and his firm lip quivered as he placed me on the grass and seated himself beside me. I had been too terrified to faint, and now I thought more of his suffering than of my own. It seemed so dreadful to have loved one who had proven herself so utterly unworthy; and that he loved her I felt sure, for he was kissing the very print of her nails in my throat. At last, I told him all that had passed. He said I did wrong to help her; justice demanded that she should be overtaken. He must go then and put an officer on her track, or she would altogether escape them. But I clung to him and would not let him go, and told him "I was glad to be only a woman, if a sense of justice could prompt a man to tear out his heart."

"But, Mattie," he asked; "shall not her sorrow be avenged?"

"Mattie is going, even now, where all human passion and suffering shall have passed away."

"The parents," he urged; "does not their woe call for the punishment of this traitress and murderess?"

But I shook my head. "It is well," I said, "that women need not make and execute the laws; their hearts would free all the criminals in the land."

He looked down into my face; the great tears trembled on his lashes, and I knew he thanked me; but I could not bear the sight, and I told him I had understood it all, and for his sake I would not wish her convicted, feeling, as I did, that my own hand had furnished the connecting link in the chain of evidence that could be brought against her.

He looked at me strangely, but then I knew he was half wild with grief. We rose and went toward the edge of the pond. A bit of scarlet ribbon attracted our attention, and stooping to pick it up, Mr. Talbot noticed and pointed out to me what had probably been the hiding-place of Antonia. The earth had been scooped out rudely, and twigs interlaced, and leaves so scattered, as to effectually conceal it from the casual passer. Berries and roots were strewn about the shallow cavern; they had been her only food, no doubt. I shuddered at the thought of her lying there in her voluptuous beauty for so many days and nights; the water-snake coiling about her feet, and the lizard crawling in her hair. Her soft cheek grown thin against the damp earth, her limbs sinking in the slime till they had lost their roundness. I was inexpressibly shocked and saddened, and we turned to go out. We would leave her and her memory environed with gloom, and go out from the place of shadows into the pale, soft light of the summer evening; subdued, because of her crime and distress; tranquil, because of our angel-defended lives and our hopeful future.

Had we all been in ambush together? She, crawling beneath the deadly nightshade. I, beneath the self-entwining bay-tree, and he, close by the stately, self-sustained cedars of Lebanon. It seemed so to me, for when he drew me to his side at the dear, old garden-seat, he whispered words to me that turned the world around. He had loved me every moment of the precious time, and never once Antonia. And I? Oh! quivering, self-deceiving heart of mine, that danced with his words into the very sunlight of bewildering joy, as though no other heart had coveted the bliss, and, failing it, had slunk away into black darkness and withering, blighting cold. What wilt thou answer when One shall ask thee if thou hast bowed down unto and worshipped idols found among this feeble clay?

The clear morning air has lifted the vapors, even from the dark river beyond which Mattie has passed. Her loved ones are looking now to the glad time of their blest reunion, and Arthur and I are looking partly thitherward, for we go forth to-day hand in hand; with a softened sigh for Mattie, and a tremulous wonder if mayhap Antonia, who was found last night cold and still by the water's edge, had not, like the dying thief, asked and obtained pardon of Him who died for sinners; go forth, not gleefully, as though life were a playtime, but thoughtfully, trustfully, prayerfully forth, lest we may fall with the unwary.

I looked at my beloved first with prejudice and through tears; but the tears have taken on the shimmer of the rainbow, and the dislike grown somehow to enduring love that holds within it the germ, the element of perfect earthly bliss.

SHADOWS.

BY E. BLYN.

A SPIRIT of wretchedness
Hovers around
My heart, in its loneliness
Darkly profound.

A dread, a discouragement,
O'er me have stole;
A cloud of presentiment
Shadows my soul.

A spell of vague restlessness
Throbs through my brain;
My heart is all motionless,
Writhing in pain.

I watch the pale, flickering
Lamp-light contend
Where shadows of evening
Painfully blend.

Its dim rays persistently
Struggle with might,
But grim shadows instantly
Fold them in night.

So, star rays of hopefulness
Stagger about,
Till fate-clouds in hatefulness
Shut them out.

While over my destiny
Shadows enhance,
My darling joins thoughtlessly
The circling dance.

While from her in tenderness
One word of love
Could calm me to gentleness,
Shadows remove.

Two things, well considered, would prevent many quarrels; first, to have it well ascertained whether we are not disputing about terms rather than things; and secondly, to examine whether that on which we differ is worth contending about.—Colton.

QUICK is the succession of human events; the cares of to-day are seldom the cares of to-morrow; and when we lie down at night, we may safely say to most of our troubles: "Ye have done your worst, and we shall meet no more."—Cowper.

THE TWO EDUCATIONS.

IN our colleges, and in most of our seminaries of the higher order, two kinds of education are given. They may be distinguished as the true and the false education. The true education is that which is calculated to benefit the student; the false education is that which is not likely to benefit him, but is given to him merely because it has in former times, or under other circumstances, benefited other students.

If any person were to propose that the youngest class at one of our colleges should devote a whole year to the study of heraldry and the Hindustani language, the public would be a good deal astonished. He might argue that in former times a knowledge of heraldry was deemed an essential part of a good education; that it promotes the study of history, and that, even now, it affords a good income to quite a number of persons in Europe; that the Hindustani language is spoken by many millions of people, and that the study of it is deemed so important in England as to be made obligatory upon the students in certain colleges. He might further urge that these studies would be valuable in exercising various faculties of the mind, such as memory, comparison, analysis, and so forth.

To all such arguments, the reply would at once be made that these studies, though useful in former times and in other places, were not suited to the needs of our day and our country; that all the intellectual advantages they offer can be much better attained through other branches of instruction of a more useful cast; and that, in short, though such teaching would doubtless be education of a certain sort, it would not be a true or real education for students in our seminaries.

Greek, Latin and the abstract mathematics are not so utterly useless to our students as heraldry and Hindustani would be. But the extent to which those branches are taught renders the course of instruction in many of our colleges little better than a false education throughout. To persons who intend to pursue the learned professions, including the profession of teacher, some acquaintance with the classical tongues is certainly of advantage; but a knowledge sufficient to enable the student to read Cæsar and Xenophon is all that is really requisite, and this amount of knowledge is usually attained by the pupil before entering college. As to algebra, although a knowledge of it (like that of Hindustani) is of the utmost importance to certain individuals, and has led to the most valuable results, yet it is certain that not one graduate in ten thousand of those who leave our universities ever makes the slightest practical use of the acquaintance with this branch of study, which he has spent so much time in acquiring.

In looking over the "Catalogue" of Vassar

VOL. LXXX.—22

College for 1867-8 and the statements appended to it, while seeing much to admire, we find some reason to fear that the munificent provision made by the lamented founder for the education of young women may not produce the beneficial results which were expected from it. The system of education appears to be in many respects eminently a false one. It is based, not on a consideration of the real needs of the students, but on the semi-obsolete systems which have existed in certain ancient universities—Oxford and Cambridge, Harvard and Yale—and which those universities are themselves now discarding as unsuited to the wants of our time. The spirit which presided at the framing of the system is indicated, to an experienced eye, by the very names given to the four annual classes of pupils. These names, "Freshman," "Sophomore," etc.—sufficiently odd and uncouth even in young men's colleges, where ancient custom alone keeps them in use—become simply ridiculous when applied to classes of young ladies. When such terms appear in the catalogue, one is not surprised to find that "for admission to the Freshman Class," the student "must be prepared for examination in the following, or in equivalents: Harkness's Introductory Latin Book; Harkness's Reader; Cæsar, four books; Cicero, four orations; Virgil, six books; Harkness's Latin Grammar, complete; Robinson's University Algebra, to equations of second degree; Quackenbos's or Boyd's Rhetoric; Outlines of General History."

There are, it should be said, two regular courses of study in the college, the classical course and the scientific course; but for each course the pupil must be prepared to pass an examination in the works and studies above set forth. It is evident that the devisers of this system firmly believed that a knowledge of heraldry and Hindustani—I beg pardon—of Greek, Latin and algebra was the all-essential requisite in the education of an American lady.

As I have already remarked, it may readily be admitted that some knowledge of the classical languages is an advantage, and that for certain pursuits (which one person in ten thousand may follow) an acquaintance with the abstract mathematics is essential. But for any purpose whatever, the amount of knowledge which the pupil is required to possess for entering Vassar College is ample to enable her to go on, without the assistance of an instructor, to the highest degree of attainment in either of these branches. Surely, after entering the college, her time will be devoted to more useful acquisitions. Here is the list of studies, quoted literally from the catalogue, which the student is to pursue during the "Freshman year," according as she may prefer the "classical" or the "scientific" course:—

CLASSICAL COURSE.

FRESHMAN YEAR.

First Semester.

Latin.—Livy; Arnold's Prose Composition.
Greek.—Polton's Historians; Kühner's Grammar, Syntax; Arnold's Prose Composition.
Mathematics.—Robinson's University Algebra, completed.
English.—Exercises in Composition.

Second Semester.

Latin.—Cicero, de Senectute et Amicitia; Prose Composition.
Greek.—Homer's Iliad, six books; Kühner's Grammar, completed; Prose Composition.
Mathematics.—Loomis's Geometry.
English.—Exercises in Grammatical Analysis.

SCIENTIFIC COURSE.

FRESHMAN YEAR.

First Semester.

Latin.—Livy; Arnold's Prose Composition.
French.—Poltevin's Grammaire; Larousse's Lexicologie, 1e Année and Howard's Aids to Composition, begun; Scribe and Racine.
Mathematics.—Robinson's University Algebra, completed.
English.—Exercises in Composition.

Second Semester.

Latin.—Cicero, de Senectute et Amicitia; Prose Composition.
French.—Poltevin, Lexicologie, 1e Année and Howard's Aids, completed; Racine and Souvestre.
Mathematics.—Loomis's Geometry.
Botany.—Gray's Lessons and Manual, with Excursions.
English.—Exercises in Analysis.

With the exception of Loomis's Geometry and of the "exercises in composition" and in "grammatical analysis," the whole of the classical course belongs to the system of false education. The student who pursues the studies required by that course may perhaps find herself a little better fitted for the duties of her future life than she would have been if she had spent her time in guessing conundrums or putting together Chinese puzzles, and this is really all that can be said. The scientific course is much better, and I should in justice add that it improves as it goes on in the subsequent years. Yet even this course leaves, on a careful perusal, the impression that it was framed, not so much with a view to the actual needs of the student in the probable pursuits of her after life, as with the idea of furnishing a well-rounded scheme of study in the sciences and modern languages. The most important science of all, chemistry—which may be called the true household science—which, in its different branches of organic and inorganic chemistry, illustrates every department and appliance of our daily life, the food we eat, the clothes we wear, the houses we build, our medicines, our farms, our gardens—this wonderful science, which, in its study of equivalents has the analytic precision of algebra, and is, in its experimental process, as interesting as the Arabian Nights—this science of such transcendental usefulness, that it well deserves to be called the queen of studies, only appears once in each course, and that merely as one of seven studies in the "first semester" of the "senior year." On the other hand, astronomy is pursued through two years—no doubt an interesting science and of essential use in navigation. But unless the fair students all intend to follow the sea, it really seems that the relative position of the two sciences in the course should be reversed.

The whole system is based on a serious error. Vassar College, it is understood, was established for the excellent purpose of giving to young ladies an education equal to that received by young men at the best universities. The mistake is in considering that this education, to be equal, must be similar to that which young men receive. That education in the older colleges, with all the reforms of recent years, is yet by no means of the best order; but its defects are greatly amended by the subsequent training which the students receive. After leaving college, they usually spend two or three years at other institutions—schools of law, medicine, or divinity—or else under private tuition, where all the instruction they receive is directed to the sole object of preparing them for the duties of after life. To young women, in most cases, this subsequent training is not offered. The seminars in which they are educated should be to them what the law, medical, and divinity schools are to young men. The only pupils to whom this remark will not apply are those ladies who intend to follow the profession of medicine; yet, even to these, the course of studies in Vassar College does not offer by any means the best preliminary instruction. The slight attention given to chemistry sufficiently shows that the requirements of this class of students were not specially considered.

The Board of Trustees of this institution comprises gentlemen of great eminence in many departments, professional, literary, and scientific. The staff of professors and teachers leaves little to be desired. The library, the apparatus, and all the aids to instruction are of the best description. The system alone is in fault; but this fault is so serious that, unless speedily corrected, it may lead to most unfortunate results. When the students leave the college, the defects of their education and the uselessness of many of their acquirements will be apparent to clear-sighted parents and friends, and speedily to the students themselves; and then it may be feared that the experiment of giving to young ladies an education of the highest class will be deemed to have been tried, and to have resulted in failure. Thus this college, established with such noble views and high aspirations for the benefit of the sex, may be the means of dealing its best interests a heavy blow. Let it therefore be clearly understood that the education which the college affords, like that of many of our oldest colleges for young men, is not of the highest order, but rather approaches the lowest. It is based chiefly on the teaching of words and computations; and the fact is certain that the talent of verbal memory and the talent for computing are two of the lowest faculties of the mind, and are often possessed in a remarkable degree by persons whose mental powers are but little above the grade of idiocy. The inductive sciences belong to faculties of a far higher order; and the civilized world, which is now entering upon their study, looks back upon its former studies of words and numerals with feelings resembling those with which the grown man remembers the occupations of his childhood.

TO MISS H—,
(Of Chapel Hill, N. C.)

BY WM. F. WILLIAMS.

OH! the sick heart is bleeding, and long hath it bled,
While my pale hopes, so shattered, will die!
I cannot be happy, to dwell with the dead
Nor yet with the living, since beauty has fled,
And tears of affection are dry.

In vain to the gay group I hoping depart,
For still sad reflections of thee,
Like spectres, are prowling around the sick heart,
And mutter no solace, nor will they depart,
Or grant a respite unto me.

To see the bright smile of the youthful and gay,
As lovers do murmur of love,
With a heart overflowing I turn me away,
And sigh, as I did on the dream-crushing day
Our pledges were shrouded above.

When the music begins, with its soul-stirring swell,
There's a heart its sweet strains cannot cheer;
For a story of sorrow the violins tell,
And the boom of the drum seems a funeral knell,
As it lingers so doleful and clear.

OH! the sick heart is bleeding, and long hath it bled,
While my pale hopes, so shattered, will die!
I will go, a lamenter, less living than dead,
To battle for honor, since beauty has fled,
And tears of affection are dry.

COURTESY.—THINK OF THIS.

THE power of diffusing happiness, says Doctor Chalmers, is not the exclusive power of the rich. All are capable of it. The poorest man can cheer me by his affection, or distress me by his hatred or contempt. Every man is dependent on another. A piece of neglect, even from the lowest and most contemptible of men, is fit to ruffle the serenity of my happiness; and a civil attention, even from the humblest of our kind, carries a gracious and exhilarating influence along with it. The poorest have it in their power to give or withhold kind or obliging expressions. They have it in their power to give or withhold the smiles of affection and sincerity of a tender attachment. Let not the humble offerings of poverty be disregarded. The man of sentiment knows how to value them; he prizes them as the best deeds of beneficence. They lighten the weary anxieties of this world, and carry him on with a cheerful heart to the end of the journey.

A CRICKET'S STORY.

BY TAMAR ANNE KERMODE.

CHAPTER I.

I AM a cricket—a busy, brown, noisy little cricket, and I assure you I've seen a good deal of life in my day; of its bright, and of its dark side, too. I will tell my story in a straightforward, natural manner, for I'm a conscientious cricket, and can boast with some degree of truth that I have a natural antipathy to the by-ways, shams, and blind alleys of life that is really (for a little creature like me) quite remarkable.

I am one of a large family of crickets, and, although I am at present on the American side of the water, I was born and raised on the English side, in a very comfortable mansion, and many and many a time I have trilled my cheerful notes as I sat in a cosey corner, warming my little body by a rich English merchant's parlor fire. His letters were addressed: "Wm. Harrison, Esq." Wm. Harrison was his name, and a fine, portly-looking gentleman he was—just the kind of man to go smoothly along, with full sails, a fair wind, and plenty of sea room.

I was attached to this wealthy merchant, for, you know, there is an old adage to the effect that, if you love a person, you must necessarily love everything that belongs to that person, and I loved the old gentleman's daughter most truly, most sincerely. Somebody else loved her, too; a French gentleman, he called himself, a count something or other (I never could master those French names well), and I was very jealous of him. Now I know it was exceedingly foolish for a cricket to be jealous of a French nobleman, but, still, I couldn't help it, and when his patent-leather boots glided over the carpet, and his soft, silky voice said: "How is my dear Miss Lucy?" I positively hated him, and always made it a rule not to sing a single note while he was in the house.

Sometimes I had her all to myself. Ah! those were pleasant evenings. She would sit with some little trifle of fancy work in her hands, working quietly hour after hour, with such a look of content in her sweet blue eyes, and her beautiful brown hair falling in curls about her face and neck, brightening here and there into strands of gold as the firelight played upon it, that I quite doted upon her. My happiness on these occasions was wonderful, and I exerted myself to sing for her to that extent that I was hoarse for days after. Sometimes the merchant would come in and disturb her happy thoughts (I know they were happy), and she would turn her face towards him, and kiss him, and give him such a smile of welcome that I almost envied him. I was magnanimous enough, however, only to sing the louder, and then she would say:—

"My dear father, just listen to the cricket.

Surely, you're going to make a very lucky speculation." (This is an old English superstition, and not to be relied upon.)

Her father would say : "Yes, my dear, but I don't care anything about crickets. I don't believe in them ; indeed, I'd rather not hear them."

"O father," she would say, "I love them dearly, and this little singer particularly, for he seems to be ever singing of a happy future. You know how happy we are at present ; I should like to think that our happiness will last."

I remember well the evening when she said these words. The old man sighed, and a dark shadow came over his face, a darker shadow than I had ever seen there before. Then the servant brought in the tea, and the room was brilliantly lighted, and Lucy sat at the table, and chatted gayly, and attended to her father's wants ; but he was strangely silent, and soon after tea he went to his room.

Then that odious Frenchman came, and brought with him his odious guitar, and Lucy listened to his soft strains and whispered speeches with such a light in her eyes, and such a glow upon her cheeks, that I longed to bite him. She was an only child, and, as her mother had died many years before, when Lucy was a little child, and her father had remained a widower from that time, she had long reigned the sole mistress of the fine old English mansion—its loving, merry, cheerful, light-hearted mistress.

But a change was coming. I noticed it coming little by little, bit by bit, ever since the night that the shadow came upon the master's face and seemed to stay there. Poor, innocent Lucy ! she never dreamed what that shadow meant. She didn't see it grow longer and darker as I from my quiet corner did, and one night she quite startled me by saying to her father : "What can be the matter with my cricket ? I haven't heard his voice for a week."

And her father said : "I cannot tell, my dear," and then he looked sadly at the fire, and muttered something about the wheel of fortune, and some going up and some coming down.

Lucy looked surprised and anxious, and said : "My dear father, is there anything the matter ? You look pale ; are you ill ?"

"No, my daughter, I am not ill. Well, well, fortune is a fickle goddess ; we may not trust her. Some go up and some go down," and stooping over her he softly smoothed her shining hair, and then went to his room, and we saw him no more that night.

A day or two passed away with their usual freight of joy and sorrow, and then the joy went from our home, and the sorrow remained with us. Wm. Harrison, Esq., merchant, was a bankrupt. And I heard him say, in a strange, broken kind of a way, to his daughter : "You see, my dear, in my old age I have come to beggary, and there is nothing left to me, nothing. Houses, lands, even the very furniture, all gone—a perfect wreck—and what am I ? A perfect wreck, too, drifting amongst the broken timbers."

"My dear father, I am left to you, and I'm young and strong, and we have many friends."

"Yes, Lucy, I have you," he answered, rather bitterly. "Do you think that there is any satisfaction to me in knowing that you must suffer through my mistake ? And as to many friends, they will pass from our pathway as quickly as the clouds sail over the summer sky. Friendship seldom keeps company with poverty."

Lucy couldn't believe in that doctrine, however, and she exerted herself to raise her father's drooping spirits, and looked so bright and blooming, and there was so much music in her voice, that I became quite cheerful myself, and managed to sing for full five minutes for her benefit, although my voice shook a good deal, and I was altogether out of sorts.

Well, time passed on. The rich merchant's affairs were almost wound up, and Lucy had plenty of time to think of her troubles, for very few of her many friends had crossed the threshold of her home since poverty had touched its inmates. The count came occasionally ; and, one evening, with a great deal of false show of sympathy, he asked Lucy to name an early day for their marriage. He wished to go to Paris ; they could live there very happily, and they would never come back to England—he didn't like it—so cold, so gray.

My poor Lucy actually loved this man, and I, it is impossible for me to tell you how I hated him. But, then, you see, I was only a cricket, and what did it matter ? There are very few persons, indeed, who would care for a cricket.

"But my father," she faltered, "what would become of him ? I couldn't leave my dear father in his great trouble," and she looked earnestly at him.

"Ah ! my angel," he said, "your father is old enough ; he can care for himself. Let him do it. He will get a situation ; he will do very well."

"I cannot leave my father," said Lucy, more firmly. "My poor father ! I couldn't be so ungrateful, so wicked."

"Very well," he said. "Ah ! I see, you don't care for me. You choose between us ; you stay with your father. I release you ; I wish you joy. You do not wish to marry ; you never loved me. You English are like your climate—cold, cold, nothing but frost and snow—not like sunny France. Once more I wish you joy. I kiss my hand to you ; I say farewell." The door closed and he left the house.

Poor Lucy sat very still, looking at the fire, and I crept out of my corner to look at her.

The bright firelight played upon her sad, quiet-looking face, and lighted up her beautiful hair, and tears were falling from her soft blue eyes, and some of them fell upon my little brown back, and I was so grieved (you will, perhaps, hardly believe it, but I was indeed so grieved), that I actually trembled, and shrieked with pain.

The old gentleman never missed the count, and never asked any questions about him, and I could see that Lucy was glad that it should be so. And when everything was settled up, he and his daughter found that there was enough left from the wreck of their fortunes to *take them to a foreign land.

"We will go to America, my dear," said Mr. Harrison. "We will begin life over again; everything is so changed with me, I cannot stay here."

"Yes, father," was Lucy's cheerful reply, "we will go whenever you please. In that glorious land, so noted for its plenty and its hospitality, two strangers, such as we shall be, may make an honorable and perhaps successful effort to retrieve our fortunes."

And so Lucy began to pack up her little treasures (gifts of affection which had been presented to her from time to time), and her own and her father's wardrobe. She brought these articles into the parlor, and knelt upon the rug before the fire, as she arranged them and put them all in order. You may be sure that I sang for her, and gave her all the encouragement I possibly could.

One night, as she was kneeling there, she picked up a newspaper that her father had been reading (he had dropped it on the floor), and she read in it an account of her lover's marriage. The count had married an English lady of fortune. He had been dividing his attentions between her and my Lucy from the time that Mr. Harrison's wheel of fortune took its first turn in the wrong direction. Well, he was a quick observer, and he knew as soon as the merchant did when the first stroke of misfortune came.

My Lucy's face was a study as she read the little paragraph. There was the deepest crimson in her cheeks I ever saw, and such a look of grief and scorn in her bright eyes, I really didn't think they were capable of taking that expression. I never saw them look like that before. "And so," she said, "he has married, and gained ten thousand pounds. I wish him joy," and then she laughed, but there was no music in her laugh; I didn't like to hear it. And then, after a while, she cried a little, but not for him. I'm quite sure the tears fell not for him. They dropped silently and heavily for lost trust, and hope, and faith. She knew that these had gone back to her happy childhood, and would never brighten her life again.

Well, we sailed. I couldn't think of being left behind, and so I snugly settled myself in one of the folds of Lucy's travelling dress. We sailed; and I must say that I never saw an English sky look more beautiful than it did on that morning when we slowly steamed down the Mersey. The soft white fleecy clouds were pure and lovely, as, taking many a fantastic form, they floated gracefully beneath the deep dark blue. And the air was fresh and balmy, and had that wonderful property in it of bracing and brightening everybody up to that degree, that even I, a poor, sorrowful little cricket, felt its influence, and almost betrayed myself to Lucy by quite unconsciously chirping out a little. The Mersey itself was a beautiful sight to see, with its ships of every size, all outward bound, and with their white sails gliding along, all shining in the sunlight. Ah! it was well for each and every one of us that we couldn't know all the sorrows of the heavy hearts, over which smiling eyes kept watch and ward, as the shores of England slowly receded from our sight.

CHAPTER II.

WE settled down very comfortably in a small house in the city of New York, and were very well pleased with the house and with the city; though I may say, in perfect confidence, that the house was a little too small, and very inconvenient, and was situated in a rather out-of-the-way place; but then rents were high, and as our means were really very limited, we had to put up with these little drawbacks, and be satisfied.

Lucy declared that she was more than satisfied; that it was a perfect little handbox of a place, and that she didn't see how any person could feel anything but glad after coming safely over the great ocean, and enduring all the anxieties of its uncertain perils; "indeed," she continued, "I don't think such ingratitude is possible; and really our house is very nice, and the bustle of the great city is cheering, and the bay is magnificent!"

"Yes, my love, you are quite right to make the best of everything," said her father, rather despondingly.

I listened to Lucy's remarks, and thought that in speaking of the place as a handbox, she had done it justice; although for my own part I don't like handboxes, not that I'm at all particular about myself—a cricket can be as cosy in one chimney corner as in another—and if I hadn't quite as much hearthstone to walk upon as I had been accustomed to, I couldn't blame anybody for that; and if I was a stranger in a strange land, I became one of my own free will; and there was one great advantage to me in the small room, I could cause a perfect flood of melody to fill it without straining my voice in the least. But then my poor Lucy! I fancied that she really didn't like it—that she missed the handsome parlors, the well-filled library, the broad stairways, and the comforts and luxuries of her English home; and that all her cheerful ways and pleasant words were only—to use a homely phrase—make believe.

Well, if they were, I never saw a person able to do up that kind of thing to such perfection as she did. She quite imposed upon her father; he believed at last that his failure had been a blessing to her, and that its ill consequences had passed harmlessly over her head. I knew better than that; but then, as she said, she was young and strong, and I hoped she would be strong enough to bear the burden she had taken upon herself.

As to Mr. Harrison, he sunk into a kind of lethargy for a while, and then he suddenly awoke to the fact that it was necessary that he should make an effort. One morning after breakfast, he said: "I am going out, Lucy, to look for a situation. I might take a clerk's position for a while, until something better offered."

She smiled, brightly, and told him that she was very glad, and that no doubt it would be a stepping-stone to something better, and her dear father would be prospered in the future as he had been in the past.

And then, when the door closed, and she had removed the things from the breakfast-table, and put the little parlor in order, and had given her attention to all the matters belonging to her little household, she drew her work-stand up to the fire, and sewed away very steadily; and as she worked, I noticed that her face wore a very sober expression—a look of painful thought. The brightness had all gone out of it, and she was pale and sad, and the room looked dark and comfortless; and although I chirped out one of my best strains, at its conclusion I became quite melancholy and homesick—a very unpleasant feeling, I can assure you.

At one o'clock Mr. Harrison came home in a desponding state of mind. "You see, my dear," he said, "business is unsettled at present; merchants are discharging their old clerks, instead of taking on new ones; and I didn't bring letters of introduction; there are many difficulties in my way. Strangers are looked upon with suspicion; our chances are small, and I really don't know what to do."

"Well, never mind," said Lucy, "you will have better fortune next time; and in the end you will surmount all difficulties."

"It may be so," said the merchant, doubtfully. "I don't see it in that light myself, though; but still it may be so, and as I'm very tired, Lucy, I'll take my dinner now."

She brought the dinner, and entertained him while they were at the table; but he told her very little of his morning's adventures; he was weary, he thought he would rest; and, spreading a silk handkerchief over his head, he was soon in his dreams at the head of a prosperous business, and had ships of his own, heavily laden with merchandise, dancing over the blue waves to foreign ports, where they would leave their wares, and then hurry back with the merchant's gold.

Well, somebody has said that "dreams are but echoes of our waking thoughts." These dreams were certainly not likely to be realized, and Mr. Harrison's thoughts before he went to sleep could hardly have been of such a character as to justify them; and as to Lucy, I don't think that if her thoughts were echoed to her in dreams, they would have given her any pleasure at all, for she had a faculty of trying to look ahead on the sea of life, and, just then looking, she couldn't see anything but breakers; and as these breakers were heavy and rough, and beat against a rocky coast, the dim, uncertain light that struggled across the waste of waters from the lighthouse, gave her but little comfort; for it only served to show her the dangers of the coast, and that coast was poverty—without pointing out the means by which she might escape from it.

"I must see what I can do," she said, as she stopped sewing for a few minutes, and looked at the fire. "Our money is nearly all gone, and if I should sell my watch, and the few articles of jewelry I have, the little I should get for them would soon go, too. We must find the means to live;" and then she sighed. "I might get a situation as daily governess, or give music lessons;" and then she read carefully through the long columns of advertisements in one of the daily papers, and, after cutting out two or three of them and putting them in her purse, she sewed on steadily till the light began to fade in the west, and then she lighted a lamp, and stirred up the fire to make the room look cheerful and pleasant, and her father awoke quite refreshed with his nap, and they had tea. A stranger looking in upon them would have thought that they were very happy—the old man and his daughter—that they were in what is called middling circumstances, and that they hadn't either of them a single thought of care to sadden their lives. In fact they looked so cheerful, that I was almost deceived myself; and as they seemed determined to make the best of everything, I assisted them to my utmost ability by singing, with great power, my sweetest strains, and filling the room with melody, that, in my humble opinion, rivalled any opera—English or Italian.

The next morning the merchant went out again, and Lucy prepared to follow his example. As I had determined always to be with her, I quietly climbed into her watch-pocket, and we set off very comfortably together. She walked a long way, and then rang the door-bell of a handsome villa in a retired street.

After waiting a few minutes in an elegantly-furnished parlor, a lady entered, dressed in a flowing white wrapper, from which floated a quantity of trimmings of lace and ribbons ; and, looking languidly at her young visitor for a few seconds, said : " Ah ! I suppose you have come after the nursery maid's place ? It was filled to my satisfaction yesterday. I don't think you would have suited me in any case."

Lucy, very much surprised and distressed by her reception, said she must have been mistaken in the number of the house ; the situation she was applying for, was that of governess.

"Governess? Ah! yes; I do want a governess; but really," observed the lady, "I should not have supposed that you were fitted for that from your appearance. I require a great deal from my governess; my daughters are almost young ladies. They have some knowledge of music, and French, and fancy needlework, and a great many things. Can you teach music, and singing, and French?"

Lucy thought she was capable of giving satisfaction.

"Well, give me your references. But really I don't think you will suit me; I should prefer a much older person. As to salary, it will be time enough to talk about that if I engage you."

Lucy said that as she and her father were strangers in the country, she could only refer to her father; he would satisfy her as to their respectability.

"Your father for a reference! Dear me, I never heard of such a thing; and strangers, too! I couldn't think of taking you; I could not even be sure that you were honest. How could you think for a moment that I would trust my dear girls with a person without a character?"

She was still talking in this strain when Lucy closed the front door and walked quickly down the street, pulling her veil over her face to hide from passers-by the indignant color that was burning in her cheeks. She made one or two other applications which were also unsuccessful. I could see by the expression of her countenance, when we came home, that she had utterly failed. I didn't hear the conversation that passed at the other houses, for I cried so much, and felt so cramped up in the watch-pocket, that a slight deafness, accompanied with a strange sensation in my head, attacked me, and I didn't recover my usual spirits and powers of observation till I had been settled for some time in my corner by the fire, and then I noticed that Lucy had taken off her bonnet and shawl; had arranged her hair, and was getting her own and her father's dinner ready.

Mr. Harrison came in soon, and his daughter looked quickly at his face, and, as if not satisfied with what she saw there, looked away again.

"Well, my love," said the old gentleman, slowly, "this business of looking for a situation is very discouraging; in fact, I've a good mind to give it up altogether. You see there are a great many persons wanting employment, and any one of them would have a better chance than an old man and a stranger like me. I will try again, if you like, but it's only trouble thrown away."

"I think you'd better try again," said Lucy, soberly; "perhaps if we keep on trying we may succeed at last."

"I almost believe, Lucy, that it would have been better if you had persuaded me to stay in our own country; I was well known there; you ought to have done so. My head was not very clear at the time, and I certainly think you ought to have taken more thought about the matter; you should, indeed, my dear, you should, indeed!" he said, irritably.

"Well, father," said Lucy, "we did the best we could under the circumstances; let us hope that our prospects will brighten after a while." (She didn't tell him that because he was well known there, he didn't wish to stay.)

Well, the time passed on; day after day, week after week, month after month, and yet their prospects didn't brighten; and although Lucy made many more applications, and met with much kindness, and was not rudely treated as she was when she made her first effort, yet she failed to get employment, and there did not seem to be any work in the great city for either father or daughter.

Lucy's watch had gone, and her bracelets and rings were going; even such articles of her wardrobe as she could do without were ready for sale, and she thought with dread that the time must shortly come when there would be nothing more to sell. Her father's health, too, had been for some time failing, and his mind, weary of the struggle it had gone through with poverty, and sympathizing with the frail body, was failing too; and he was often very cross, almost childishly so.

Poor Lucy bore her trials very patiently. It was sad to think that the only friend the dear girl had was a poor little brown cricket, utterly incapable of doing anything for her relief; although she was kind enough to say to herself sometimes that she loved to hear me sing, it reminded her of happier hours.

Well, we were all three sitting quietly in the parlor one day thinking over our future plans, when the postman's rap startled us. Lucy went to the door, and brought back with her a letter edged with black, and sealed with a large black seal. "From England, father," she said, "and for me."

Her father nodded in a bewildered kind of a way, and watched her as she opened it; a bank-note fluttered out and fell upon the floor. The old gentleman picked it up and straightened it out. "Fifty pounds," he muttered, "I had plenty of these once," and then he looked at Lucy.

"Father," she said, "do you remember my mother's aunt, Mrs. Horace? She lived in Devonshire, you know? She was deeply offended with me when I was a child, and we haven't seen her since. This letter brings the intelligence of her death, and she has left me a fortune of fifty thousand pounds."

My story is almost told. Another letter came this morning containing money enough to take us home, and we expect to sail next week for England. The merchant has improved wonderfully under this going up of the wheel of fortune, and my dear Lucy is her happy, blooming self again.

I don't believe that she ever really could have cared much for that French nobleman, and I hope to see the day when she will be the mistress of her own cheerful home. I'm quite sure she will make me welcome to the best corner by her drawing-room fire.

A HOME PICTURE.

BY H. M. T. C.

It has often seemed as though the philosophy of our social relations is more especially overlooked than any topic we might name. True, we have our theories, correct in the main, that the character of the mother moulds the individual, that "like mother like child," etc. But do we take in the full scope of woman's influence upon all the relations of society? Do we realize how thoroughly taste, morals, intellect, politics, religion are moulded by her forming hand? The homes of a nation are in her keeping, the children are as the workmanship of her hand, society takes color from her character.

I was looking at a little three-year old daughter of my friend, to-day, and listening to her loving prattle, and I recalled her mother at the same age. She was beautiful in her childhood, with a Psyche face, and an intellect clear as amber. She was carefully nurtured; all her education was superintended by her mother, who made everything as clear to the child as the most simple mathematical demonstration. No task was ever imposed in her early childhood. She learned, just as she ate, simply to satisfy hunger, and the mother was careful to give her nothing that was indigestible, either for body or mind. Thus she grew up to womanhood; good, intelligent, beautiful in the noblest sense of the word. She is fit to grace a palace, but she also graces her humble home, to which men of letters come, and pay homage both to her intellect and her rare domestic grace.

The poor and unlearned also find in her a friend and instructor, one who never gives unwise counsel, nor despises them because of their lowly lot, but seeks to lift them up. Her husband finds in her a companion who can fully understand him and sympathize in all his pursuits, not a poor butterfly of fashion, who, when denuded of her wings, is but a worm.

Nothing could be more beautiful than her relations as a sister, the eldest sister, repaying her mother's care by the aid she rendered to the younger members of the family. Thus far through life, their relations have been marked by the truest brotherly and sisterly affections, and much of this has been a reflex of the intelligence and purity of the life of this elder sister. Now, her own sons and daughters claim the benefit of this culture. It will mould their characters, as it has already given them outward beauty. The path of knowledge will be made easy for them, because their mother can help them in all their little difficulties. She will be able to fit them for college without sending them from home, and, indeed, they could be instructed by their mother almost or quite through the present scientific course of our colleges. Will not the sons love and reverence their mother more and more as they become able to appreciate her truth?

Now, as I have indicated, this woman is not and never has been a child of wealth. Her culture may be traced back through four successive generations of intelligent, high-minded women; all workers with head and hands, capable of filling high places with dignity, yet honoring the humblest duty by its intelligent and cheerful performance. Without this intelligence, their lives might have been squalid; and without integrity, morally poor. As it is, they have scattered blessings in their path, and it would be hard to estimate their influence. I once knew the political character of a town thoroughly revolutionized by the influence of one of these women. Men were led to see that they must act from principle, rather than from expediency, and yet it was simply like rain upon the grass.

I remember when the great-grandmother of the little one I saw this morning had her young daughters round her. When the labors of the day were over, the table with books and maps was brought out, and father and mother joined the children in their studies. No wonder that teachers praised, and scholars envied.

One night the daughter of a coarse, neglectful mother sat with them while they prepared the lessons for the following day, asking questions, which were answered by either father or mother, and thus led on to ask more. The lesson was acquired without effort, while many little anecdotes and plays of wit rendered the hour of study a mere pastime. The poor girl sat as one in a dream, and no efforts at amusement could draw her out. When they retired for the night, she said, very abruptly, but with a force never to be forgotten: "Girls, you live in heaven; I live in hell. You will be dreadful if you are not good; but how can I think good thoughts, or learn anything that will make me wise and respectable, with only contention and bitterness in my home? We children shall become demons; we cannot help it. If you are not almost angels, you ought to be, with such a home."

I have thought that we could only estimate the requirements of the age upon women, and the consequent duty of society to them, by comparing the wisest, the purest, the best with the most ignorant, and degraded, and defiled. Then, we shall see how thoroughly furnished to good works every daughter of our land should be.

MARRIAGE IN RUSSIA.

WHEN the bridegroom is presented, the whole house is in confusion; all the relations, friends, and neighbors, on both sides, are invited to the house of the bride. When all the expected company are assembled, the match-maker comes in, leading the bridegroom by the hand, and, going straight to the head of the house, presents him. The father first, then the mother, kisses him. The bride's father then leads the young man to a table covered with a white cloth; on the table is a silver salver with a loaf of bread on it, and on the bread a salt-cellar with salt. Two rings—one of gold, the other of silver—are placed on a small silver tray before a golden image of the Virgin Mary holding the Child Jesus in her arms. With this image they bless the future couple. All the company stand; the mother holds the bride, completely dressed in white, by the hand, surrounded by all her dearest friends and companions. All bow before the image. The father takes the image, the mother the bread and salt; the young couple then kneel under the image, and are first blessed by the father; the latter then takes the bread and salt from the hands of the mother, and gives her the image, and the same ceremony is repeated. After this the father and mother of the bridegroom do the like. Then comes the giving of the rings. The bride's father gives the golden ring to the bridegroom, the silver one to the bride. They are now affianced to each other, and give each other the first kiss. When the ceremony is over, the company enjoy themselves; they chat, laugh, eat, and drink, and separate, after having fixed the day for the marriage. During the interval between this ceremony and the marriage, the bridegroom spends all his evenings with his bride, often tête à tête. The marriage ceremony follows. It is also called the coronation, because, during the ceremony, a crown is placed on the heads of the affianced. Then the priest offers them a cup of wine, of which they both drink, as a sign of the union they have contracted. A solemn procession is led by the officiating priest, the bride and bridegroom following him, round the desk placed in the centre of the church, upon which is laid the Bible. This is meant to represent the joys which await them, and the eternity of these ties. During the public celebration of the marriage, the rings worn by the young couple are exchanged; the husband now wearing the silver one, the bride the golden. From the church all the company invited go to the house of the bridegroom's father. A week after they return to church, when the priest lifts the crown from their heads. This is the final consecration of marriage.

A WONDERFUL MACHINE.

THE pin machine is one of the closest approaches that mechanics have made to the dexterity of the human hand. A small machine, about the height and size of a ladies' sewing-machine, only much stronger, stands before you. On the side at the back a light belt descends from a long shaft in the ceiling that drives all the machines, ranged in rows on the floor. On the left side of our machine hangs, on a small peg, a small reel of wire, that has been straightened by running through a small compound system of small rollers. The wire descends, and the end of it enters the machine. This is the food consumed by this snappish, voracious little dwarf. He pulls it in and bites it off by the inches incessantly—140 bites to the minute. Just as he seizes each bite, a saucy little hammer, with a concave face, hits the end of the wire three times, and "upsets" it to a head, while he gripes it in a counter-sunk hole between his teeth. With an outward thrust of his tongue he then lays the pin sideways in a little groove across the rim of a small wheel that slowly revolves just under his nose. By the external pressure of a stationary hoop, these pins roll in their places as they are carried under two series of small files, three in each. These files grow finer towards the end of the series. They lie at a slight inclination on the pins, and by a series of cams, levers, and springs are made to play like lightning. Thus the pins are dropped in a little shower in a box. Twenty-eight pounds are a day's work for one of these jerking little automatons. Two very intelligent machines reject every crooked pin, even the slightest irregularity of form being detected. Another automaton assort's half a dozen lengths in as many boxes, all at once and unerringly, when a careless operator has mixed the contents of boxes from various machines. Lastly, a perfect genius of a machine hangs the pins by the head in an inclined platform through as many slots as there are pins in a row of paper. These slots converge into the exact space spanning the length of a row. Under them runs the strip of pin paper. A barb-like part of the machine catches one pin from each of the slots as it falls, and by one movement sticks them all through the corrugated ridges in the paper, from which they are to be picked by taper fingers in boudoirs, and all sorts of human circumstances.

CROSS PURPOSES.

BY MAURICE C. LYNDE.

"YORKE and Lancaster, what a singular coincidence! Well, again it shall be the 'war of the roses.' Blonde, and brunette, and 'væ victis!'" With a little mocking laugh, haughty Helen Lancaster turned to her mirror, and stood brushing out the waving lengths of golden hair that gleamed and shone about her, like the veil enveloping the Prophet of Khorassan; but the face beneath this Midæan shower was fitter for peri than prophet. Apple-blossoms on the warmest eastern slope, or the waxen cups of April arbutus were not more delicately fair than this almost perfect face, a floral beauty, certainly, for her eyes were like the upper petals of pansies, now blandly blue in the light, and again solemn proud purple in the shadow. A Luxembourg moss-rose would have paled in contrast with that clear-cut mouth with its scarlet lips, but if you mark the shortness of the upper one, you see at once whence my red rose of Lancaster obtains her alliterative title of "haughty Helen." Beautiful spoiled Helen, "fed on the roses and rocked in the lilies of life," her way thus far, had been chronicled in the words of the terse despatch of the egotistic old Roman, "I came, I saw, I conquered," but her victorious march had been interrupted this evening, and, startled for an instant by the thought that she might be facing her Waterloo, she stopped to hold a council of war, here in her chamber looking straight in the eyes of her trusty prime minister—her mirror. Call it vanity, if you will, I don't. When a woman stands gazing on her reflection is she always admiring herself? No; oftener holding silent converse with that other inner self, which looks from the reflected depths of her eyes, down into her very soul.

Miss Violet Yorke, of New Hampshire, was the Wellington whom this young Napoleon defied. Miss Violet Yorke, with the prestige of a hundred thousand dollars in her own right, and such accomplishments! An anomalous production of the Granite State, truly, was this tropical bird; you felt when you saw her, as if she was the incarnation of a southern sunset, all rich color and dazzling light. Great velvety black eyes, looking all things to all men; complexion, not the dusky pallor of the magnolia, but that luscious blending of roses and snow and gold, which you see on the sunny side of an August peach; a tempting mouth, with full pouting lips, and teeth as white and even as grains of young corn; and then her hair—such a snare for trapping hearts! black, and fine, and soft, not in elaborate ringlets, but caught back with its globy, witching wilfulness, just to get it out of the way, and fastened as you see it in some antique. She was dangerously lovely.

There was a picnic that day, and all

Winstead had set its face toward the picturesque hills on the west of the village. Ostensibly for the benefit of the pupils of "Winstead Academy," but in the end proving to be the jolliest kind of a merry making for children of larger growth. Helen had been on the ground since the early morning. Her pretty spring chintz dress harmonized perfectly with the scene, and through all the day's vicissitudes she had borne herself bravely; but afternoon came, and with it the carriage loads of new guests with their fresh toilets, making her feel sorely like returning home and not trying to hold her ground, but that was acknowledging defeat. She would not run off and abandon the field to "the Yankee heiress," as she scornfully denominated Miss Yorke, who, cool, deliberate, and elegantly dressed, made her feel keenly that the contrast was not in her favor. So she smoothed back the bands of ruffled golden hair, shook out the wrinkles of the pretty chintz, tied down her sundown, and started off over the green with Nettle Ray to the temporary platform erected for dancing, on which stood Violet Yorke with a bevy of beauties. Drawing off her heavy chamois gloves as she walked, she approached the platform, where she was greeted with boisterous welcomes from the party, and a cool stare from the house of Yorke.

"O Helen Lancaster!" screamed half a dozen of the girls at once, "have you been out the whole day?"

"Yes," said Helen, "and have been enjoying it, too."

"Dear me!" chimed in another, "not with all those children, I hope?"

"Why not?" Helen asked.

"Because I didn't think your high mightiness cared to be bothered with the small folk, or fancied that sort of thing."

"Ah!" laughed Helen. "What a flattering inference you would have people draw concerning the amiability and industry of my high mightiness."

And Miss Yorke, turning to Captain Darrell, asked, nonchalantly, "Is that Miss Lancaster?"

He, answering with, "Haven't you met her?"

"No, I was out riding when she called."

"Ah, indeed! then you must know her; she has been our belle," and the emphasis on the "has been" was so marked, that what could Miss Yorke do but incline her beautiful head? "That dowdy pale face the belle of Winstead!" thought she. "Well, I do sincerely pity the taste of some people. Preposterous idea!" and as the vision she had seen in the tall mirror of her dressing-room ere Alice and Kate Vaughn summoned her to the carriage, rose before her remembrance in fair contrast with this dusty hamadryad, she mentally thanked her stars that the Vaughn party had decided on waiting until the cooler evening. Two minutes later and the rivals met. Helen acknowledging the acquaintance with all the stately grace in her possession, and Miss Violet, after one look in those calm, clear eyes, contented herself with sweeping a courtesy which would not have disgraced Queen Victoria, peerless in that art as the royal lady is said to be.

The two silently measured swords. The gay ripple of talk flowed on, and the bell presently summoned them to the evening meal. You know all about the picnic; why should I describe it? And I leave you to imagine whether Helen's supper tasted most of honey or wormwood, as Captain Darrell led the way with her rival of Yorke, and she, looking back on the train, saw Harry Glenn, the dullest wight in the village, sandwiched between Helen and Alice Vaughn. He, to make himself agreeable, the dolt, began eulogizing Miss Yorke. "Wasn't she stunning? By George! a girl that rode as she did, was little short of a marvel; he believed she'd beat the best jockey in the county mounted on his chestnut Sheridan." He meant to ask her to try a race with him; and more to the same purpose, for poor master Harry's style was eminently "horsey."

Supper over, and the sun sinking low behind the cedars, some of the faithful ones remained behind to gather up the fragments, and attend to the clearing away of the feast. Of course it was only the poor tired Marthas who had been on hand all day; the blooming goddesses of the evening were again at the platform, waiting for the genial strains of the inspiring violin, to break forth into a regular old-fashioned country dance.

"Captain Darrell is evidently impressed," whispered Nettie Ray to Helen.

"Yes, it seems so," answered she, while every word she uttered fell like a clod on her heart. For there was Dagon, her idol, with hands and feet lopped off. Captain Darrell, "Helen's Captain," as some of the girls, her intimate friends, called him, bowing down, offering incense before a strange shrine. "Well, it was only man-like; they were all alike, empty, conceited, and vain. She did think, however, that Grey Darrell had more in him than that, but he was like all the rest. Just as vain and unstable as any of them." These were some of the haughty Helen's thoughts as she passed to and fro in the mazes of the dance, with Grey Darrell and Violet Yorke as her vis-a-vis. "Because this stranger had thrown herself at his head, deliberately, confidently, it had tickled his vanity and fed his self-conceit, the ruling passion in all men, and he had eyes only for that bold, black-eyed Violet Yorke. He, who had declared his abhorrence of 'fast' women, who had openly expressed his admiration of a softer, more womanly character. His theory was excellent, but where was his practice?"

Poor Helen was becoming furiously jealous of Violet Yorke, that was the whole of it. True, she had no claim on him, if she had, she might have trusted him more. Perhaps, only perhaps! Well, but what meant so many looks, each speaking more than a volume; so many bouquets, which were each a living poem? Those quiet moonlight strolls, when Helen's clear eyes shone up in his face, as they found the nearest way home by the longest way round, and those sleighrides, when, side by side, they went flying through the frosty air, over the crisp, sparkling snow, while the bells tinkled their "Runic Hymns," and the stars, like diamond points in mosaic in the deep blue of heaven, glittered about the pale-faced moon? Could he have been flirting with her, playing "fast and loose?" If she lost confidence in Grey Darrell, it seemed as if all the solid earth around her must go to pieces. "Can it be possible?" she asked herself, and arraigning him at the bar of her own heart, she could not make him plead "Not guilty." "Well, she had been a fool, an unmitigated idiot; but there was one thing, she was done with such folly and idiocy, now and forever," and, as she came to this very definite conclusion in her own room that night, she broke down in a sob of uncontrollable grief. The quiet influences of that maiden sanctuary had failed to still the storm of wounded pride and pique which had been aroused in her breast. The one line of the old ballad, "Earl Percy sees my fall," kept ringing constantly through her brain, bringing with it a surge of anger and mortification, that, like a wave of a stormy sea, coming over, threatened to engulf her. Poor child! She gave herself up to her grief, and wept so piteously, that little Nan, her nine-year old sister, woke and sat up in bed crying in sympathy with her, till her poor little night-dress was damp with her tears, while she besought "Nellie" to tell her what ailed her. At last Helen crept into bed, and, drawing the child close to her heart with such a feeling of utter desolation, that in self-pity the tears would come, and so she cried herself to sleep. Haughty Helen, you say? Baby Helen, more likely.

Well, the next morning Miss Helen came down to the breakfast-room with a headache, little Nan having been bought over to keep the peace concerning last night's tears by promise of unlimited candy and an immaculate bonnet for her doll.

"Yes, I knew you would have the headache after a day like yesterday," said mamma Lancaster, when expressions of sympathy had been exhausted; and papa Lancaster, over his third egg, wondered "why people couldn't stay at home and enjoy themselves rationally." O mamma and papa Lancaster! were the days when you went gyping such a very long time ago?

On that memorable day, memorable, at least, to Helen Lancaster, Captain Darrell discovered what he had been trying to do for six long months, for all that time haughty Helen had refused to hang out any signal of capitulation. He could not tell whether he was losing or gaining. This "familiar friend" footing is not just what a man wants when he is seeking to gain firmer and loftier ground. To be sure, it was pleasant, delightful, to come to this airy old country house just when he pleased, to begin what threatened to be endless talks with Judge Lancaster in his scholarly library, and to be tantalized at the same time by the vision of Helen through the doorway into the sitting-room with its cool India matting; to hear the soft sway of her sewing-chair, the click of her needles, or the jingle of the old-fashioned silver chain which held her scissors; for while Othello recounted his "tales of flood and field," and "fought his battles o'er again," this Desdemona sat with her mother in the inner court and listened. Who could take his place with the latter in her flower garden, or with the troop of lesser lights of the Lancastrian dynasty, who evidently considered him the most agreeable and certainly the most useful visitor at Breezewood, from Master Tom on his way to Yale, not disdaining a little assistance in his Cicero or Anabasis; and saucy Bert, with her French theme unfinished, which "only needed a single word," but which Captain Darrell, on being appealed to for help out of the difficulty, finds to be wanting just fifty, and sends the little maid on her way rejoicing at having escaped the inevitable scolding which "that horrid Mad'llie" would administer; to little Nan on her Shetland pony, cantering by his side with so much self-importance? Pleasant? Yes, it was decidedly pleasant; he didn't think he would exchange places with any other youth of the village who basked in Helen's smiles for an evening. No; Grey Darrell had the best of it, and he flattered himself that he understood Helen better than any other man of her acquaintance; but, with all that, he could not tell whether she really cared a snap of her white fingers if he came or stayed away. Ready and brilliant in repartee; attack her which side he may, his shafts bounded off harmlessly as from polished steel. He could find no vulnerable spot. He even tried the mean old stratagem of going into raptures over some one or other of her friends; but Helen loved her friends, and praised them with a will. Miss Yorke had disclosed the flaw in the armor; and Grey smiled to himself as he lit his cigar, and sauntered leisurely away from the Vaughns that evening, and through the soft May moonlight took his way out the drive toward Breezewood, "to stretch himself and cool his blood," he said, just as if he had not had enough of it the livelong day, and as if no other air had the same cooling, revivifying properties as that which drifted through the apple blossoms of Judge Lancaster's orchard. His cigar smoked out, and himself properly "stretched and cooled," he strolled back to his home, and entered his room, house-breaker fashion, by swinging himself to the window by the slender pillars of the veranda.

Captain Grey Darrell was spending some months with his aunt, Mrs. Grey, a model old lady, with an ample fortune, whose special delight it was always to have some one with her to pet and spoil, and which she tried to do to the best of her ability with her nephew. A nice-looking pet he was, truly. Tall, well-built, soldierly fellow, with sunny lights dancing in his brown eyes; a scar scanning his broad forehead, telling its silent tale of terrible fighting. Dark brown hair and beard, and the sunniest, pleasantest smile in the world completes this tout ensemble of my hero. I dare not describe him more minutely, lest you say I have rolled the Chevalier Bayard and Sir Philip Sidney into one immaculate ideal. But, poor fellow! he had no home; his mother was dead, and his sisters married, scattered far and wide, and, coming back from his four years' campaign with an ugly wound scarce healed, he found his way to his hospitable aunt's home, where he had spent his boyhood. It was not long until he found himself exalted into a hero, and the vague ideas he had of setting about something assumed no more tangible form as the few months, which he had devoted to recuperation, lengthened out to the semblance of a year. Helen Lancaster was indirectly to blame for this, "for," thought the captain, "if I only knew she cared whether I went or stayed, then," and he repeated, with angry contempt for his own cowardice:—

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his desert is small,
Who fears to put it to the touch,
And win or lose it all."

But bravery before the glistening line of steel blue bayonets is one thing, and bravery before the mocking light of purple blue eyes, before you can tell whether they will melt in misty tenderness, is quite another. And so it was that the summer grew on, and Grey was all afraid to trust what was evidently Helen's partiality towards him as an agreeable companion, until fate sent the Yorke into the field, and he resolved by a little strategy to see if he could indeed gather the royal "red rose," and wear it on his heart. He was satisfied with the result, yet little Nan helped no little to his complete enlightenment, as, the next morning, on taking his accustomed walk to Breezewood, Helen was invisible, sick with headache, and little Nan seized on him to help her put up a swing, and, instigated by the indwelling spirit of mischief herself, began:—

"Captain, you were at the picnic?"

"Yes," said Grey, "for I saw how many times Tom Foster kissed you while you played 'Oats, peas, beans, and barley grows.' Sixteen times, I declare."

"Indeed, it wasn't," cried Nan, triumphantly. "It was only eight."

"O Nannie, Nannie," laughed the captain, "in a few more years will you acknowledge the kisses so readily?"

Nan changed the subject. "Did you see our Helen? I wonder what ailed her. Some one must have hurt her feelings very much, for she said last night she never would go to a picnic again; and she cried so that I couldn't help crying too, and she told me not to tell."

"How well you keep your promise," said Grey, in a tone rather exultant than reproachful.

And Nannie had enough of mother Eve's curiosity to say: "I thought, perhaps, you could tell me what had happened."

But what could Captain Darrell know when he only came on the grounds at four o'clock? But if he had but a key to the cipher before, Nannie had unwittingly given him a complete translation. So the young gentleman lounged away the morning, talking to Mrs. Lancaster about her flowers, and to the judge on some one of the many knots in the tangled political skein, but Helen obstinately kept her room. At last he left, sending condolences to Helen, and a request that, if she were able, she would take a ride with him that evening.

The weather gods were propitious, and they had a merry ride. Helen's spirits were never higher, though she looked worn by fatigue and illness. She had dismounted on a little terrace, where she stood while her horse was led away. Unstudied yet strangely picturesque was the group. She with her long riding habit falling in sombre folds about her, and the lingering glow of the sunset still lighting up her pure pale face; Grey stood just before her, with his bridal rein over his arm. Suddenly, without a word of preliminary, he began:—

"Helen, I am tired of this aimless way of living of mine. I have resolved to turn over a new leaf and get to doing something. It rests with you only how soon I shall do it."

She felt that there was something too deep in his words to be answered by light badinage; she did not look at him or answer a word.

He came up to her and grasped her gauntleted hand, which was switching about with her riding whip: "Helen, dare I say my Helen, for I have loved you so long?"

His voice sank low with its burden of tenderness. Never, ah! never, until her dying day could she forget that passionate murmur. But something had the ascendancy (was it her bad angel?), and in a tone so hard and measured that she scarcely knew it for her own, she answered: "We have been friends, we always will be, Captain Darrell, but we can be nothing more. I do not love you."

What did she expect? That he would entreat, beg, plead for her love? Creature of moods as she was, she did not herself understand the strangeness of the one which now was upon her. Captain Darrell stood with one hand on his horse's neck while he awaited her answer, and bent his keen eyes upon her. She never raised hers from the tuft of grass which he had deterred her from switching to pieces. He loosed his clasp of her hand, and it fell nerveless by her side, and the little whip falling to the ground, he picked it up and handed it to her, saying:—

"Thank you for your frankness; I have made a bitter mistake. There is nothing more to say, Helen?"

"No, Captain Darrell," she answered.

"Good-by, then, Helen," and Grey leaped to his saddle and was away.

Helen entered the house, feeling numb and frozen as if she were walking in a dream. As fate would have it, Bertie was sitting in the dusk, singing that saddest of songs, "The long, long, weary day." Her voice sounded like a sob. Helen went to her room, laid aside her riding dress, and came down with a light, sweeping Bert and her love songs from the piano, and then commenced a carnival of brilliant, dashing music, until her mother came in, asking:—

"Why, where is Grey? I thought this unusual entertainment was all for his benefit."

"He did not come in, mamma," she answered, and went on with her mocking polkas and marches.

"Grey Darrell has gone to Milwaukee," said Judge Lancaster, two days after, as he seated himself at dinner. "I am glad of it; it was too bad for a young man of his ability to be wasting time in loafing around in such a shiftless sort of way. Don't make any difference if he was heir to a million. Glad of it."

How could Helen steady her nerves and voice to say, in such a piqued tone: "Well, he might have come to say good-by to us." She dared not trust herself to say more, and shut her teeth firmly to keep back a moan.

Every one had something to say about his going. The only topics of conversation during the entire meal was Grey Darrell's abrupt departure, and Helen, though she died a thousand deaths, gave no sign. The judge gave as Grey's reason for not coming to see them, that he had received a telegram from his brother-in-law requiring him to attend to urgent business, that he was obliged to take the earliest train, and had left regrets and good-bys with Mrs. Gray, for all who cared to receive them.

As Grey Darrell galloped back home from his interview with Helen, he could scarcely tell, which was the uppermost feeling in his mind, wounded pride or disappointed, baffled love. He did love her, and had done so for years, and he fancied that she loved him. She was not, she could not have been flirting with him; he knew her character so well, that thought was unworthy of them both. She had but one reason, she did not love him. He had not asked her to learn to do so; he ought to have felt grateful for her frankness and sincerity, and for her proffered friendship; but though he said the words, he felt anything but gratitude. It was such a sudden, tremendous blow. Like Jonah, he was rejoicing in the shade of a gourd—a shade sprung from the seed planted by Nannie in her tell-tale mood—but now the fresh green leaves of hope were withered, and the sun was scorching. Never was message more opportune than that which called him to Milwaukee, and, to his aunt's dismay, he had packed his goods and chattels, and in an incredibly short time after he received it, was following the star of empire on its westward way.

The weeks lengthened into months, and, save an occasional "Grey wishes to be remembered to all his old friends," from Mrs. Grey, no one in Winsted heard aught from Grey Darrell. Certainly not Helen Lancaster. The simple gayeties of the village found her among them as usual; merry and full of wit and sparkle as ever, she seemed to all her friends, but there were closely-written pages in her book of life that no mortal eye might read but her own, and then only at the expense of an agony of tears. Yet she was happy, for she had found that "happiness lies in use." Do not imagine that her character was like a shallow expanse of water, which widens its circles as a stone is thrown in it, but which as they break against its shores becomes calm and smooth again. No, the stone which had fallen was so huge and gross that it raised the tide, which flowed on again smoothly after a time, but which away down beneath fretted and murmured against the sharp edges of the opposing force. The months swelled into a year, the winter's drifted flakes and the summer's buds had come and gone for the second time since Grey Darrell left Winsted. He was coming back now; he had not written, and, with the usual fate of such surprises, arrived to find his aunt absent. He might surely trust himself to see Helen after this length of time. Perhaps she was changed; perhaps—and he hardly dared finish the thought—were he to repeat his question now, he might have a different answer. He concluded to go at any rate.

The afternoon sun was shining broad and full over the wide valley, the amphitheatre of hills around Winsted wore a soft, purple haze, and Breezewood itself, the finest old place in the county, lay bathed in the glory of summer. Standing not a mile from the village with the smoothest road and the greenest lane as an approach to it, which some people more careful of appearances might have called an avenue, as it really was, but to whom Judge Lancaster, obnoxious to the customs of his forefathers, in a brusque way, said, "Nonsense!" The old man, gay with the hues of the rain-fragrant as the winds from Araby the blest; the giant trees, relics of the primeval forest, mingled with the plantings of later years; the grove of hemlocks and cedars on the north, cutting off the savage wind as it came roaring and raving like some mad creature down from the mountain, and great labyrinth of the stiff conventional boxwood with its dark verdure and "fragrance of eternity;" all the surroundings inspired you with a feeling of veneration for the old mansion. An old-fashioned double house, built of native stone, but remodelled with wings and deep bay windows and piazzas, until old Dudley Lancaster (who laid its corner-stone in the governorship of William Penn, and whose mortal remains rested in the locust grove on the southwest, under a mildewed gray slate slab), would have been sorely puzzled to tell which was the original structure. As no one ever saw or heard anything of the old landholder's spirit, it is to be supposed that he took very little interest as to how "ye faire house of Breezewode" was used or abused by his descendants. The shrill chirps of summer insects mingled with the musical ring of scythes sharpening in some not distant field as Grey strode up the lane in the refreshing shade of the pyramidal horse-chestnuts, and the wild roses, as they tossed their graceful arms over the fences, seemed extending their pink fingers to welcome him. His quick impatient knock was answered by Helen in person, in her cool afternoon dress, just as she looked on that same summer afternoon so long ago. If the blood did leave her heart with a sudden bound, he did not know it, and the hand she extended in welcome was as cool as if it had not been almost crushed in his passionate farewell clasp two years before. She called her mother, and returned to the shady parlor, and from the gay chatter and persiflage which followed, no one would have dreamed that they had ever been more than the best of friends.

But it was not to chat with Mamma Lancaster, however pleasant and agreeable that lady might be, that Grey Darrell had closed his office in his Western home. He could not well spare much time for a vacation, but he told Helen that he was going to New Haven to attend the reunion of his class at Yale, and, with a woman's faculty of making herself unhappy, she remembered that Alice Vaughn had already gone on to attend Violet Yorke's wedding in July, and though she had not heard the name of the fortunate lover yet, "putting that and that together," there was now no doubt in her mind but that they both wished to conceal something from her, and that Grey's journey would not end at New Haven. The thought "They tried to save my feelings by silence. Oh! have I been such a fool as to wear my heart on my sleeve for every daw to peck at?" flashed through her mind, and made her so utterly cold and repellant, that Grey wondered what had changed her, from the moment when she opened the door for him, with a glad surprise, which she could not altogether hide, shining in her eyes.

At last he rose to go, regretfully declining Mrs. Lancaster's invitation to tea, tempting though it was, with the promise of the first early raspberries, saying as he did so, to Helen, "The lane is shady, won't you walk with me part of the way?" adding, in a lower tone, "I have something to say to you."

"He will tell me of his approaching marriage; I cannot and will not hear it and congratulate him;" she thought, and would have said, "No," at once, but Mrs. Lancaster, though vastly different from a "manœuvring mamma," broke in with:—

"Yes, Helen, walk down to the gate and see if your father is in the locust grove."

Helen was obedient, perhaps she might not have yielded so passively, but as her eye swept the road, she took in a broad brimmed Panama hat moving up the lane, and knew that Captain Darrell's confidence could not proceed very far before they would meet Robert Griswold, her cousin, and her father's student. So she took her sundown from the rack, and very leisurely started down the gravelled walk, stopping in the meanwhile along the flower borders with Grey to admire the wealth of bloom with which Mrs. Lancaster's cherished pets had repaid her care.

"Will you give me a 'buttonhole bouquet,' Helen?"

"Oh, yes, a dozen, if you like," she answered, gayly, but she would not choose them for him. He gathered two tiny bouquets—rose-geraniums, fuchsia, and heliotrope, and giving her one of them, fastened the other in his buttonhole.

She could not avoid taking it, but as she did so, fixing her eyes far down the shady lane, exclaimed, "Oh, there comes Robert! But I forgot that you don't know him; I shall have the pleasure of introducing you to my cousin, Mr. Griswold," and she hurried through the gate, which he held open for her, dropping the emblematic little bouquet as she did so. She did it with a purpose, and Grey Darrell saw the discarded, neglected flowers lying on the earth ready to be crushed under a ruthless foot as his hopes had been, while the words he meant to say to her were frozen on his lips. Helen was a skilful strategist, and they had gone but a few yards when they met her cousin. The two gentlemen seemed mutually delighted to form each other's acquaintance, as Helen introduced them, only Grey himself knew how much he felt like knocking "the fellow" down, than shaking hands with him. Here was the secret of Helen's indifference to him, this was her lover; fool that he had been to expose himself a second time to her mocking coquetry! Fool that he had been ever to dream that she was worth loving or winning. "Confound the fellow!" he broke out, as he went on alone. "I should like to know how she would have heard me, though I know she would have rejected me. I cannot believe it, and yet I might have saved myself all this. Aunt Grey generally knows everything; strange that she could not have posted me on this Griswold affair. Pshaw, Grey, lad, don't maunder over 'Locksley Hall,' with its egotistic question, 'Is it well to wish thee happy?' How do you know anything about this Cousin Griswold? All you do know is, that you have tried twice and failed, disastrously failed, and it isn't her fault if she can't and won't love you. God bless her! Whoever she marries ought to be a happy man!" and if the latch of the gate at which he fumbled was invisible because of the mist before his eyes, he surely is excusable.

Back he went to Aunt Grey's, for though that lady was not at home, the housekeeper was, and, gathering up his light luggage together, he marched off to the dépot and started for New Haven. Two weeks after, Helen Lancaster was almost thrown off her equilibrium by a question from one of "her lady friends." "Are you going to call on Violet Yorke? Mrs. Brevoort, I should say, that being the name for which she has exchanged the prettier one of Yorke."

Helen could almost have screamed. She was able to reply that as she and the Vaughns had always been such intimate friends, of course she would call on Violet Yorke. Poor foolish Helen! she could scarcely sit still and listen to Nettie Ray's girlish nonsense. The "bitterness of death" was not past, and all through that long summer day she endured the tortures of the rack. Grey Darrell was avenged, had he but known it. A second time had Violet Yorke stood between her and happiness. Ah! no, Helen, only your mad, blind jealousy. It was all over now, and he had gone back to his Western home, and might never, never come to Winsted again. It was all over; she had lived her life, and it seemed to her as if the wearisome length of threescore and ten could hold no more anguish than was compressed in her short score and two. She wondered what the niche in life was which remained for her to fill, and how long she would be obliged to wait until peace came. She was the eldest, and would watch her sisters growing up around her, and how tenderly she would guard them that no such bitter mistakes as hers might be their fate.

Thus she took up her burden of life again. Saying only, "It might have been." Pure as royal ermine lay the white drifts on the wintry fields, and the encircling hills of Winsted wore their knightly helmets gleaming in the December moonlight. Ruddy, strong-armed autumn had gathered in her purple clusters, tawny apples and golden maize, and laid them in decrepit Winter's lap, and in return he covered the tired, slumbering earth with the fleece shorn from his snowy flocks. It was Christmas week. In front of the church in the village was brought load after load of fragrant evergreen. Inside, busy fingers wove wreath, and star, and cross, but none busier than Helen Lancaster's. Bevy of girls were there with their lovers, and the regretful burden rose in mocking cadences, "It might have been." Sorrow had not corroded her temper, nor faded her beauty. It is not altogether true that "sorrow can beautify only the heart, not the face of a woman." In place of her former insouciant spirits, might be seen a subdued tenderness which characterized her whole life. Like the veil of moss bestowed on the already peerless rose, it added to, without concealing or altering its loveliness. So that Mr. Watson, the theological student who "bunched" the evergreen for her, was thinking while he helped her, "What a model help-meet she would make for a minister."

Christmas eve came, the decorations were nearly done, the church was beautiful, the resinous smell made you think of some dim grove where tapering pines point their unswerving fingers toward heaven, and where "dark green layers of shade" filter the sunshine into a more "dim religious light" than is found in gray cathedrals with the "frozen music" of pillared arch, and fretted dome, and jewelled windows. Some of the older members of the congregation came in, and among them Mrs. Grey, leaning on the arm of a strange gentleman. But not a stranger entirely, for soon Helen heard the friendly words of greeting on all sides, and, looking up, encountered the gaze of Grey Darrell fixed full upon her. "He has come back," was her first joyous thought, "but not to me," as she recovered from the spasm of surprise, in which she felt as if her heart had been suddenly grasped and stopped in its beatings. He did not come near her. Her assistant, the quiet theologian, left her to speak to Captain Darrell, for Grey had always been a favorite in the place where he had spent his boyhood. Helen continued to weave her wreath, and presently Mr. Watson came back to his work. Her eyes were too full of mist to see the pine she was tying, but as she reached for the "bunch" extended toward her, she became conscious that the hand that wore that familiar seal ring was not Mr. Watson's. She looked up again, to meet Grey Darrell's eyes, and hear in his deep, suppressed tones: "Helen, you only have no welcome for me?" She tried to smile, but the effort produced only a convulsion of the corners of her mouth, and with quivering lips she succeeded in enunciating, "Welcome, Captain Darrell," when, like wells overflowing, two great tears flashed from her eyes, and sparkled on her lapful of pine.

Grey grasped the trembling little hand she extended, "Is it from your heart, Helen?"

It was dusky in the lecture-room, the kerosene lamps were failing, and the room was large, but she could not mistake his look, or his meaning, and again she answered very low indeed, but Grey heard the words, "From my heart." "God bless you, my Helen! "O Grey!" If it is a fragmentary conversation, unintelligible to us as that of two robins, rest assured that they understood each other perfectly, and through the exchange of scarce a half dozen words, two hearts were happier this Christmas eve than they had dared dream they could be, six months before.

They were all standing together in the church, the last decoration had been hung in its place, Mr. Watson had found himself de trop, and had gravitated to the side of the three sisters Bell. Mrs. Grey came up, saying to her nephew: "You can come when you are ready, I am going with Doctor Lowe."

Grey and Helen stood side by side under the solemn Christmas arches, and he read the legend in its leafy lettering, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men," the song of the angel host eighteen hundred years since. Helen softly whispered "Amen." Truly, it was festival time to them; into the loneliness and despair of their hearts had been brought "tidings of great joy."

But Tom Lancaster was ready with the sleigh for his sister, and the reconciled lovers parted until the morrow. Helen dreamed summer dreams all the way home by her brother's side, and if she was unusually taciturn, that discreet youth wisely refrained from questioning the cause thereof.

Nine o'clock Christmas morning found Grey Darrell in Judge Lancaster's study, and ten minutes later the old judge led his daughter to her lover with his paternal blessing, while Mamma Lancaster was crying softly to herself in the pantry, while she dispensed the materials for the Christmas dinner. Grey and Helen, too happy for tears, rehearsed their doubts and fears, and opened some of the gates and took down the bars which they had mutually been shutting and putting up in the "course of their true love" for the past two years. When the trio came to church that morning and sat together in Judge Lancaster's pew, of course everybody knew that Helen Lancaster and Grey Darrell were engaged, while Aunt Grey, in the opposite pew, smiled and said to herself, "The foolish children! They do not know that I laid the foundation of their little romance years ago, and now finished it by writing to Grey to spend Christmas with me, that I would take no denial;" and, like a benevolent fairy god-mother, as she was, the old lady beamed on them through her gold-mounted spectacles.

AU DEUXIÈME.

BY MISS HELEN MAXWELL.

A NARROW, bustling, noisy street in Paris—the name I have forgotten—but it was somewhere near the rue du Bac; whether in the Faubourg St. Germain or the Quartier Latin, I cannot say. It had once some pretensions to being aristocratic, and you passed through it on your way to the Palais de Luxembourg or the Odion. Not the very pleasantest place in Paris to live, perhaps, but it had one attraction—it was gay. Not gay with fashionable toilets, emblazoned carriages, or brilliant cafés; but gay with a merry crowd of bourgeoisie, grisettes, and ouvriers, and with clattering fiacres. You saw many more snowy, ruffled caps than bonnets, and ten blue blouses to one frock-coat.

One fine spring morning two gentlemen were threading their way along this street, their eyes directed towards the upper stories of the houses, where printed notices were hung, advertising apartments to rent. Occasionally they would stop and consult with one another as they looked rather dubiously about them, and then slowly continue their way. So far they had not entered any of the tall, shabby houses, but had satisfied themselves by the appearance of the outside that the apartments would not suit them. They were both young, well-dressed, and good-looking; Americans, evidently, by their appearance and walk. Presently they stopped simultaneously before a gloomy but respectable house, the lower windows of which were barred with iron, and the heavy doors leading into the court tightly closed. Hanging from the stone balcony of the first floor was a card, with the usual announcement—"Appartement meuble à louer."

"I think this will do, Amory," said the elder and taller of the two.

"We can at least try."

They pulled the bell, and immediately one side of the great door swung open with a dismal, grating noise. The square, paved court was green with mould and grass; many windows looked upon it, but of the many only one showed signs of life.

The two young men made their way to a small door, half glass, through which a pretty, red-faced concierge was seen busily at work preparing her dinner. As they pushed open the door she called out: "Bonjour, messieurs!" in a chirpy, friendly tone.

"I believe there is an apartment to be let here," said the elder gentleman, after they had returned her greeting.

"As many as you please," she answered, laughing; "you can have the entire house for a trifle."

"Can we see the first floor?"

"Certainly; I will show you the way."

A key had to be hunted for, and when found they followed their plump little guide up one flight of dark, broad, stone stairs, where at the landing they had almost to grope their way.

"Here we are, messieurs. This is the antechamber." She flung open a door, and they entered a high, bare room, furnished only with two spindle-legged sofas, and table to correspond. The floor had been waxed and polished till it was as smooth and slippery as glass, but the dust now lay thick upon it. "And this is the salon," answered the little concierge, as she held aside a heavy curtain.

The salon was huge and gloomy. Four great windows on one side, topped with massive tarnished cornices, and shaded by yellow damask curtains; the walls showing plainly the marks where pictures had been; an old carpet on the floor, still thick and soft, but the garlands of bright flowers knotted with blue ribbons, faded into a dull gray. The furniture was abundant, and in the style of Louis XVI., thin twisted legs of gilt, and covers of faded damask to match the curtains.

From the salon they passed into the salle à manger, and from thence into several chambers. They were all drearily and sparsely furnished except one little room—a chintz boudoir—which had evidently been fitted up at a much later period. The walls were bright with white and gold, and the stuffed, chintz-covered couches and low chairs, and ample drapery at the one window gave an air of great comfort to the room.

"What are we to pay a month," inquired he who acted as spokesman.

"One hundred and fifty francs," was the brisk reply; "and the use of the stables if you wish. It is for nothing, as monsieur will see."

"We shall not require the stables. Perhaps you can furnish us with our breakfast and find some one to attend to the rooms?"

"Parfaitement, monsieur. You shall be well served. Coffee and an omelette for breakfast, n'est ce pas?"

"And when may we come?"

"Whenever it pleases you."

"To-morrow, then?"

"A merveille! you shall find everything in order. Bonjour, messieurs, bonjour!"

The little concierge peeped out of the door and watched the young men as they walked away; then went back to her dinner, nodding to herself as if well content.

"It will be livelier when they come, perhaps," she thought; "I must inform madame. Mademoiselle Léonie will be pleased, pauvre petite!"

When the young Americans returned the next day, they found their apartment in readiness for them, clean and fresh as possible; the old-fashioned rooms smiling grimly in the sunlight, of which they had been for months deprived.

"Are we the only tenants in the house?" they asked the concierge, as she busied herself in unpacking their boxes, putting a box here, a picture there.

"Mais, non! There are madame, mademoiselle, Jacques, and myself."

"And what may we call you?" asked the younger gentleman, smilingly.

"Madame Tessier, if you please. Jacques, he is my husband. You will find him useful, perhaps; he was a gentleman's valet once."

"We would like breakfast at nine every morning."

"Bien!"

"And hot water."

"Bien! And if monsieur should want anything, let him call from this window; it looks into the court, and I shall hear."

"Why not ring?"

"The bells are in monsieur's kitchen, which will be closed, you know?"

"Ah, I see. Very well, then, we will call."

"I think we are going to be comfortable here, Amory," remarked the elder of the two, after Madame Tessier had left them.

"I am sure we are. What a nice little concierge, to be sure! M. Jacques is a happy man."

"Pray, don't be making love to that little woman. Remember, we are here to study. And, seriously, we must make the most of our time."

"I know that, Frank. And there is really no danger of my falling in love with Madame Tessier. You need give yourself no uneasiness."

"I have engaged Damereau to read with us three hours every morning."

"I wonder who the 'madame and mademoiselle' are who live here?"

"Damereau is a good sort of fellow, don't you think? He is clever, too. I am satisfied we could not have done better."

"They live au deuxième, of course. I noticed flowers at one of the windows in the court."

"Pshaw!"

"I wonder if she is pretty?"

"I trust not, indeed, for there will be small chance of your studying."

"Frank, you have no sentiment."

"And you no sense."

"A truce, a truce! Did you say Damereau would be here to-day?"

"I am expecting him every moment."

"It is eleven already. Perhaps she's thin; if she is thin I'll have nothing to do with her."

"Again! I am beginning to repent having taken you under my charge, Amory. You are a troublesome fellow."

"We will turn this pretty boudoir into a study. But it will be a shame to smoke here. Ah! here comes Damereau. Comment ça va-t-il?"

A cheerful, wiry young Frenchman came into the room with a hop, and responded to the salutation by saying, in (what he called) English: "Teep-to!"

They made a very pleasant party. Damereau much enjoying the society of the Americans; often staying the day, and dining with them at a modest little café near by. Their evenings were invariably passed at the opera or theatres.

Amory had not caught a glimpse, as yet, of the ladies au deuxième, and in consequence gave his time to his studies. Once he had declared that, early in the morning, peeping from behind the window curtains in his chamber, he had seen a very small and very white hand watering the flowers that were grouped on the ledge of an opposite window. But the information had been received with impatience by Frank, and indifference by Damereau, so he alluded to it no more.

One morning, as they were seated at breakfast, Amory discovered that they had no salt. "How can we eat without salt?" he cried; "why, the butter is tasteless. Where is Jacques?"

Jacques had gone.

"I will call from the window," and accordingly he put his head out and called loudly for Jacques, and then for Madame Tessier. There was no response but the slight echo in the empty court. "Provoking! I shall go down."

"Nonsense! Eat your breakfast as it is," said Frank, as he filled his great cup with boiling milk.

"Without salt? Impossible!" and he was off. When he reached the little den which Madame Tessier called "chez moi," he heard voices inside, and so passed through the glass door before entering.

Madame Tessier stood with her hands in the pockets of her white apron talking with a young lady who was standing with her back to the door. She was slight and rather tall; her dress, of some inexpensive gray stuff, but fitting with that elegance and grace which a Frenchwoman knows so well how to give. Her head was small, and covered by a mass of waving black hair. She held a little basket in one hand. Madame Tessier was saying:—

"The eggs are fresh, mademoiselle, and the grapes very fine, and not dear."

"Indeed, you have done wonders with the five francs, Clemence. We live splendidly now, and dear mamma is looking well again. Do you think the gentlemen are pleased with the apartment and will remain long?"

"Through the summer, they promise, mademoiselle, and I do all I can to make them comfortable."

"I am sure of that, Clemence. What would we do without you?"

"And what would I not do for you, mademoiselle? Ah! when monsieur, your father was alive, things were different."

As she spoke she turned and saw Amory standing in the doorway. "Tiens, monsieur," she cried, "that imbecile Jacques has forgotten something, of course?"

"The salt," said Amory, mechanically. He was looking at the lovely, startled face the young girl turned upon him.

"Why did not monsieur call?" asked Madame Tessier.

"I did; but you did not hear."

"I was talking with Mademoiselle Léonie."

"It is of no consequence," said Amory, hurriedly, and taking the salt from her hand; "I thank you, madame." He bowed—the bow including both the little concierge and Mademoiselle Léonie—and withdrew. He then rushed up to Frank in great excitement. "If you had seen her!" he cried; "gray eyes as large as—as—oh, immense! And such hair! I tell you, she is perfectly beautiful!"

"Of whom are you speaking?"

"Who? You cold-blooded creature! The young lady who lives au deuxième, Mademoiselle Léonie. I knew such a hand could only belong to a beauty."

"Is she thin?"

"Thin! Well, perhaps she is rather thin," Amory admitted; "but so graceful! Frank, you must see her, and for once you will capitulate."

"Probably," said Frank. "Did you bring the salt?"

"Don't you think we had better call? I have an idea it is the etiquette here for newcomers to leave cards."

"If you choose to make an ass of yourself, you can do so."

"I shall ask Damereau if it would be the thing, and, if he says yes, I go this very day."

Frank made no reply, knowing it would be useless, and finished his breakfast in silence.

The apartment au deuxième corresponded precisely in disposition to the one occupied by Frank and Amory, but it was more completely furnished, and the salon was filled with the pretty odds and ends that women gather about them. Although the weather was warm—the fresh, breezy warmth of spring—there was a wood fire burning in the large fireplace. Bird cages hung in the windows, and the brilliant yellow songsters hopped gayly about, watching with their sharp black eyes the crowded, noisy street beneath. In a deep chair, placed at the corner of the fire, a lady was seated. Her features were fine and regular, and her snow white hair clustered in thick, short curls about a face which appeared almost youthful. In one hand she held a painted screen, and the other lay idle in her lap.

"Mamma," cried Léonie, entering the room, the little basket in her hand, "I have some delicious grapes for you, which I am sure you will enjoy."

"Thank you, ma fille. Did Clemence get them for you?"

"Yes, mamma. And who should I see below but one of our tenants? A handsome young man, and Clemence says he is very lively."

"You should not gossip with Clemence."

"Oh, indeed, mamma, I say nothing; but she chatted so."

"Clemence is a very good girl, a very good girl, but she talks too much."

Léonie laid the grapes upon a pretty China dish, and put them on a table within reach of her mother's hand; and then, picking up a book, went over to a low seat in the window, and began reading aloud.

Day after day these two lovely women amused themselves by reading novels; or, rather Léonie amused her mother in that way, for she herself cared little for the romantic and sentimental stories her mother took pleasure in. She liked better to look from the window, talk to her birds, or play gay little songs on the old-fashioned, upright piano. But Léonie devoted her life to the care of her mother, and there was nothing the poor child would not have done to prevent the fits of depression that she sometimes fell into, and when she could think and speak of nothing but the luxury of by-gone days, or weep over the pride and indifference of former friends. Sometimes Léonie would gently urge her mother to go out for a walk, or propose to hire a fiacre, and drive to the Bois.

"No, no," Madame de Fontornel would cry.

"A fiacre, indeed! Did I not once drive in my own carriage?" So for months the poor lady kept to her rooms and to a chair removed as far from the sights and sounds of the street as was possible, for she felt her vulgar entourage sadly.

Amory must have been assured of the propriety of calling by Damereau; for at two o'clock, after vainly urging Frank to accompany him, he mounted the staircase and rang.

"What is that?" asked Madame de Fontornel, "the visitor's bell?"

"It sounded like it, mamma. It cannot be Clemence; she always comes the other way."

"And no one to open the door but you. Suppose it should be Madame de Lorville?"

"I don't think it can be, dear mamma," Léonie said, gently. "I heard no carriage enter the court, and Madame de Lorville would scarcely come on foot."

"No, that is very true," said her mother, bitterly. "You can see who it is."

Léonie accordingly traversed the antechamber, and withdrew the heavy bolt of the door. She stood in some surprise when she saw who the visitor was.

"Forgive me, mademoiselle," stammered Amory, who had, of course, expected a servant would answer his ring, "I called to leave my card on madame."

"Mamma is at home. Will you not come in?" said the young girl, with quiet politeness.

"Thank you," and Amory, who was a well-bred young fellow, slipped his card in his pocket.

Madame de Fontornel received him graciously. The attention pleased her, and the young man's respectful and admiring glance, as he bowed, pleased her still more.

"I am your tenant, I believe, madame. My name is Amory Richards."

"I am charmed to see you, monsieur."

Amory took the chair madame motioned him to, and in a short time was talking gayly in his imperfect French. Before many minutes he had succeeded in making a pleasant impression upon the two ladies; and, when he took leave, Madame de Fontornel asked him to repeat his visit, and expressed a hope that she should also see his friend.

The enthusiastic description he gave Frank of his success can be imagined. And he, at last, won from Frank a reluctant consent to go with him in a few days, and pay his respects to Madame de Fontornel and her daughter.

Frank Tremont, be it known to his shame, was a professed woman-hater. The very sight of a petticoat would put him out of humor. He had no sympathy for the pretty, coquettish ways of the belles of society, and he declared aloud that he had never known a woman who was worth a heartache. He listened, therefore, with small patience to the descriptions Amory gave of Mademoiselle Léonie's attractions, and much regretted the promise he had made to call.

But Amory was all eagerness for the suitable time to elapse before he could again present himself au deuxième, and gladden his susceptible, boyish heart by a sight of the little French beauty. The day came and the hour, too, although he had had great difficulty in getting Frank to budge from his books, and put himself into a tight coat.

Léonie answered the bell as before. She received the visitors with a smile, and ushered them into the salon with hospitable haste. "Mamma will be delighted," she said, acknowledging the introduction to Frank by a graceful inclination.

And, indeed, Madame de Fontornel had been looking forward to the expected visit for several days. It was a new and pleasant excitement in her dull life. She gave a courteous welcome to Frank, but Amory received more of her attentions. He was so bright, so chatty, and it was very evident how much he admired the dark eyes and white hair of his hostess. She was flattered and amused at the same time. So Amory remained by her side, occasionally casting envious eyes at Frank, who stood with Léonie at the window.

She was trying to amuse him, in her girlish way, by showing off the droll tricks she had taught her birds; how they could draw water and seed, play dead, and hop one—two—three, as she counted.

Frank listened attentively; but he looked more at the slender, elegant figure and beautiful face than at the busy little birds.

Presently Léonie picked up some bit of worsted work, and sat down near her mother. The conversation became general and animated. Frank spoke the language with fluency, and, to Amory's astonishment, he was evidently making an effort to be agreeable. He had asked Madame de Fontornel about some actress who had been a celebrity ten years before. Madame, answering that she had seen her constantly, proceeded to speak of various plays in which Mademoiselle ——— had been famous, and related (confidentially to Frank) some gossip little anecdotes in which she had figured.

"Ah! how I wish I could go to a theatre!" cried Léonie, at last, her bright eyes and reddening cheek showing the interest she took in the subject.

"Is it possible that you have never been to the theatre, mademoiselle?" asked Amory.

"No, never."

"Nor to the opera?"

"Never," repeated Léonie, almost sadly.

"And you a Parisienne?"

"My health has been such for several years," said Madame de Fontornel, with a sigh, "that it has been impossible for me to take Léonie anywhere. Our life is a very quiet one."

"A little diversion would do you good, madame," said Amory.

"Indeed, it would, mamma," cried Léonie.

Madame de Fontornel replied only by a slight movement of her shoulders and eyebrows, that meant either "No, hélas!" or "Yes, if it were but possible."

Frank interpreted it in the latter sense, and said, immediately: "I wish you would do us the honor to accept a box at the Gymnase for to-morrow evening. They give 'La joie fait peur' and 'Une femme qui se jette par la fenêtre.' Both unexceptionable."

"Mamma," whispered Léonie, imploringly.

"You are very kind, Monsieur Tremont. I do not know how to thank you enough."

"By accepting, madame," cried Amory, eagerly.

They all laughed.

"I am almost tempted to do so," said Madame de Fontornel, looking at the supplicating face her daughter turned towards her.

"Then you consent?" Frank said, quickly. "A thousand thanks."

"I cannot refuse. And, indeed, I believe it will be as great a pleasure to me as to my little Léonie here."

"With your permission, I will order the carriage at seven," said Frank, as they arose to take leave.

"At seven, soft."

Léonie did not speak, but the great dark eyes were brilliant with delight. She accompanied their guests to the door.

"A demain," cried Amory, as he ran chatting down the stone stairs.

Léonie nodded smilingly a friendly "adieu."

Madame Tessier was immensely pleased when she heard of the invitation and its acceptance, and spent a busy day in preparing a dress for Léonie to wear. "Did I not tell you, mam'selle," she whispered to Léonie, as they sat together sewing on the same skirt, "did I not tell you that M. Amory was charming?"

"Yes, Clemence."

"He is so good-natured!"

"Yes."

"But M. Tremont I find disagreeable. He never has a word to say when he meets me, and I believe he scolds M. Amory for chatting and laughing with me," and Clemence smiled.

"Indeed!"

"Yes, indeed, mam'selle. M. Amory is lively and full of fun, and he always has something nice and amiable to say to one, you know. And where is the harm? And why should that sober M. Tremont look black if M. Amory offers to kiss me? Not that I would permit it," she added, in haste, seeing the surprised and blushing look Léonie gave her. "Certainly not. What would Jacques say? But why should M. Tremont frown and scold the poor young man, je vous demande?"

Léonie made no reply, and Clemence wisely changed the subject.

Madame de Fontornel had various old velvet and brocaded gowns made, of course, in a by-gone fashion; but they seemed peculiarly to suit her. And as she sat in the loge that night, dressed in dark blue velvet, and with a faded but wonderfully rich India shawl draping her shoulders, she attracted more attention, even, than her lovely daughter, whose delicate figure and sumptuous little head were charmingly defined against the crimson cushions.

The Gymnase is an ugly theatre, and, to the Americans, appeared wofully shabby and dark. But to Léonie the light and crowd were brilliant, and she watched the plays with most absorbing interest. The evening was one of unalloyed pleasure to the young girl. And from that time dated a great friendship between the two little families. Amory ran up to the deuxième half a dozen times a day. Madame de Fontornel never tired of his bright visits, and would pet and make much of him till he was in danger of being thoroughly spoiled. With Frank, this intimacy lasted for a short time and then suddenly stopped. Night after night he would go off to the theatre with Damereau, or sit before a café on the boulevards watching the gay throng passing like a panorama. Fine carriages, omnibuses, and flaccs rolling noiselessly over the asphalt pavement. The fair occupant of an elegant "Victoria," reclining lazily on the cushions, her silken skirt trailing about her, filling the carriage and almost concealing the little husband who sits meekly at her side. A "tilbury," drawn by a proud, powerful horse; the reins carelessly held in the tightly-gloved hand of a young Englishman, who, with a bit of glass screwed into one eye, calmly surveys the ever-changing scene about him. A crowded omnibus, the seats on the roof occupied by students, who dangle their legs over the side and sing or smoke. Or a flacc with a pretty little grisette and moustached lover—their two heads close together—looking laughingly out of the window. And on the trottori—a lively, sauntering, idle throng of people. A party of travellers stopping to gaze in the shop windows. A "swell" picking his way along, looking at everything and everybody with supreme contempt. A Savoyard, with his marmotte and hurdy-gurdy. A little ragged Italian playing his fiddle in the drollest fashion. Such were the living pictures that Frank looked upon in endless variety. And when it became late and the countless lights dropped out, he would walk slowly home, stopping sometimes on the Pont Neuf to give money to some wretched outcast who would be leaning over the parapet peering into the dark river.

"You should stay with us, Frank, instead of going always to the theatres and nobody knows where," said Amory, one night.

"I can tell you, my fine fellow," growled Frank, in reply, "that if I did not know it was improving to your French—which is what you are here for—I would soon put a stop to the visits au deuxième as far as you are concerned."

"You are perfectly inexplicable!" Amory exclaimed, rather angrily; "the first week you knew the de Fontornels you were with them as much as I, and I thought they were really humanizing you a little. Now you never go near them; and if you meet Mademoiselle Léonie on the stairs, you hide in one of the dark corners till she has passed by. Madame de Fontornel is pained by your neglect; she said to me yesterday, 'We do not see your friend; he finds us dull?'"

"And what says Mademoiselle de Fontornel, pray?" asked Frank, after a pause.

"She says nothing, now. At first she looked uneasy and disappointed when you did not come. I was almost jealous of you; I was, upon my word!" and Amory laughed at the absurdity of the thing; "but I told her how unsocial you were, and how you detested the society of women, and now she has ceased to expect you."

"I am obliged to you."

"Come, Frank, go up with me to-night?"

"Excuse me," said Frank, leaving the room, "I have another engagement."

He walked thoughtfully down the stairs and into the court. As usual, the great doors leading into the street were closed. "Cordon!" he cried. And Madame Tessier hastily pulled the rope that hung in her little room. "Mon Dieu!" she said to herself, "he is so impatient!" Frank had stepped into the street and the door swung to.

"He is gone!" said Madame Tessier, "and we shall see no more of him till midnight." At that moment the bell rung violently. "Who can it be?" thought the little concierge, peeping through the glass door as she again pulled the rope. It was Frank. "Déjà, monsieur!" she cried.

Frank vouchsafed no reply; but, going to his rooms and finding that Amory had already left them, he mounted to the deuxième. The door was partly open, and he passed on to the salon without being discovered. Madame de Fontornel and Amory were playing écarté; Léonie was seated at the piano softly striking the keys with one hand. She looked thoughtful and a little sad.

"If I could but think that my absence causes her sadness," muttered Frank, beneath his breath, "but I have been once deceived, let me be wiser now. 'May I come?'" he asked, aloud.

"What! is it you?" cried Amory.

"Come in, come in," said Madame de Fontornel, cordially.

Frank bowed over the white hand she held to him. And then crossed the room to Léonie. "Do you not welcome me also, mademoiselle?"

"With all my heart."

"Truly?"

"Yes, truly."

He looked down earnestly, steadily into her eyes. A rapid blush spread over her face.

"Is it true, or am I to suffer again?" he thought. But there was truth in the dark eyes—conviction in the blush.

"If you are good, you shall go with us to the Bois, to-morrow, Frank," called out Amory; "we are going to make it a holiday."

"I promise to be very good."

"You may not smoke."

"No."

"Nor scold Mademoiselle Léonie and me if we like to run into the long alleys?"

"I promise not to scold."

"And will you really go?" asked Léonie.

"With madame's permission."

"You have it," said madame, smiling; "we have missed you much these past weeks."

"What brought you back to night?" asked Amory, when they had returned to their own apartments. "I believe I shall never be able to understand you."

"You had better cease trying to do so."

"At any rate, I am glad you made up your mind to be civil. I was tired making excuses for you."

The next morning Léonie looked anxiously from the window to see if it was a pleasant day. Satisfied on that point, she ran into the kitchen, where Clemence was preparing their breakfast, to confide to her the programme for the afternoon. Clemence thought it would have been much wiser if M. Tremont had not joined the party. "He will spoil all your pleasure, mademoiselle. He is not amiable like ce cher M. Amory."

Léonie said nothing. She stood looking thoughtfully into the fire.

"He is both proud and impatient," continued Clemence; "I pity his wife if he ever marries."

Léonie still said nothing, but patted her little foot on the brick hearth, and smiled to herself.

"Ah, what a husband M. Amory would make!" cried Madame Tessier, enthusiastically. "And what a son! Madame is devoted to him."

Léonie now laughed outright. "Clemence," she said, "I think mamma is right in saying you talk too much."

"And does madame say that of me?"

Léonie nodded.

"It is very droll; Jacques has often said the same thing."

"You see, Clemence, it must be true."

Madame Tessier shook her head, doubtfully. "M. Amory," she began, but Léonie ran away without listening, declaring she had heard quite enough about M. Amory.

The day was the perfection of a summer's day. And Paris had never looked brighter to the little party than when they had left their narrow, crowded street and were rolling through the Place de la Concorde and up the Avenue des Champs Elysées. Children were tumbling their hoops, driving in the little goat carriages, taking reserved seats (two sous each) at the Polichinelle theatres, and escaping from their bonnes, who pursued them with shrill threats, laughing the while.

They had reached the Bois, and were driving slowly through the long, shady alleys.

"I should so like to get out and walk," said Léonie.

"I have no objections, *mignon*ne," said madame, "the carriage can follow you."

Frank called out to the coachman to stop, and, springing out, assisted Léonie to alight.

"I suppose I may come, too?" asked Amory, in English.

"And leave madame alone? That would hardly be civil," said Frank, closing the door.

"Where shall we go first?" said Léonie. "Do you know, I have not walked in the Bois since I was a child?"

She looked almost a child yet, as she raised her lovely, smiling face to Frank.

"Shall we have a sail on the lake?" he suggested.

"Oh, how I should like it!" Léonie exclaimed; "but I fear mamma will not consent."

"We will not ask her," said Frank, assuring himself that the carriage was some distance behind them, and then beckoning one of the boatmen.

"Why cannot mamma and M. Amory go with us?" said Léonie, looking longingly at the pretty, gayly-painted boat; "I must not go with you alone."

"And I will have no one else. It would be nothing in America."

"Are you quite sure it is the custom in your country?" Léonie asked.

"Positive," said Frank, smiling, and gently drawing her towards the boat. "The carriage is nearly here; come!" he urged, eagerly.

Léonie yielded and stepped into the boat, Frank followed. They had just pushed off, when Amory caught sight of them.

"Stop, stop!" he cried, "and we will join you."

But Frank only spoke to the boatman, who was unfurling the little sail, bidding him make haste.

"They should not have gone alone," said Madame de Fontornel, somewhat displeased. "However, M. Tremont is very good, and I dare say he did not know it was not convenient."

"I never knew him do such a thing before," muttered Amory to himself, as he looked enviously after the truants. "We can make the tour of the lake, madame," he said, aloud, "and keep them in sight."

But they could not keep them in hearing; and Frank hastily determined to make the most of his time.

"Léonie," he said, rapidly, and in a low voice, "this may be my only chance for weeks of speaking with you alone. I want to tell you what you must have seen almost from the first day I met you, that I love you; I have avoided you, and have tried to conquer a feeling which I found had no response in your heart. But last night you unconsciously gave me some hope. Was I wrong in thinking so? Léonie," he continued, hurriedly, for she had made no reply, but sat motionless, her eyes fixed upon the water, "tell me now, tell me quickly; do you love me?"

"Yes," she whispered, "I love you. I love you," she repeated, with a long sigh.

"Ma bien aimée! My darling!" said Frank, suddenly breaking into English, "I will make you happy. Believe me, dearest child, my life shall be devoted to your happiness."

Léonie looked at him smilingly. She could not understand a word, but his earnest voice interpreted his meaning sufficiently.

"In the name of all that's good, what induced you to go off in that way, Frank?" cried Amory, from the shore. He had left the carriage, and was walking along the foot-path. "Madame de Fontornel insists upon your landing immediately."

"By all means," said Frank, coolly, and then gave the order to the boatman.

"Ma fille," said madame, "you should not have gone in the boat without my permission."

"I did wrong, mamma," murmured Léonie, blushing deeply.

"It was my fault, madame," said Frank. "You should scold me alone."

"I shall scold neither of you, naughty children. But such a thing must not occur again."

Amory was devoured by jealousy. He looked from Léonie to Frank, and was convinced that something had passed between them. When they reached home and had left the ladies at the door of their apartments, he burst out with: "Confound it, Frank, it takes you quiet ones to cut a fellow out! Of course, I'm not blind. I saw in a moment how matters were."

"I am glad of it," said Frank; "it saves me the trouble of an explanation."

"And suppose," cried Amory, in immense indignation, "suppose I had intended to marry her myself?"

"I should have put you on board the first Cunarder and sent you home."

"Should you, indeed?"

"I should, certainly. Pray, what have you to support a wife upon? And how do you think your father would take your marriage?"

Amory was silent.

"Come," continued Frank, "you are as much in love with Madame de Fontornel or Clemence as with Léonie. You are but a boy. Twenty-one, is it not?"

"Twenty-two," said Amory, in great haste.

"Ah! Well, even then, you have plenty of time. Believe me, although I am ten years your senior, I do not yet feel old."

Madame de Fontornel was almost overcome with surprise when Frank asked her for her daughter. She could not believe it, and was incredulous, till Frank laughingly called her "mamma," and kissed her hand.

"But Léonie, what will Léonie say?" she said. "The child has never thought of such a thing. Indeed, I almost suspect that she prefers your friend."

How Léonie convinced her mother that she very much preferred Frank I cannot say. But that she was convinced and was greatly pleased with the match is positive, especially when Frank took a handsome apartment in a strictly fashionable and exclusive street, provided his wife with a luxurious little coupé, and invited his belle-mère to live with him. Clemence and Jacques were promoted to positions of great trust in the new household, namely, lady's maid and valet.

Clemence never entirely recovered the astonishment she was thrown into when Léonie told her that she was soon to marry M. Tremont. "M. Tremont! M. Tremont?" she exclaimed. "Vous voulez dire M. Amory, sans doute, mam'selle?"

But Léonie insisted that it was M. Tremont, and was rather indignant with Clemence for supposing she would marry any one else.

As for Amory, three weeks after the wedding he fell desperately in love with a bewitching little grisette, who had flirted with him over a pair of gloves. Frank fulfilled his threat of sending him home, and we will hope that he is now safe under the control of his papa.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

PAPER ROSE.

Materials.—Pale yellow, white, or red, and light green tissue-paper; thick gum, fine wire, paint-brush, pincers, hyacinth hook, the thickest wooden rounding pin, green leaves, and green wax calix; light green wool.

double, and then cut. The stamen calix, represented in Fig. 2, consists of a few light green loops of wool fastened to a wire. These are carefully combed out and surrounded with stamens of gold thread, touched at the points

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Our model is a light yellow rose, with a reddish pencilling; any pink will do as well.

The coloring is painted with carmine. The several leaf parts are folded four or eight times with fine white sand. Six double leaves, curled with what is called a hyacinth hook, are then pressed together at the under end, as shown in Fig. 3, and bound round the calix. They are one inch and a quarter long and half an inch wide, with a little piece cut out of the middle in a tapering form to within a quarter of an inch of the bottom of the paper. Then make three hollow pads, each formed from one inch and a half square by inclosing and pressing the corners together carefully (see Fig. 4). The again laid in the palm of the hand, and pressed up with the hook several times, so as to form the shapes represented in Figs. 7 and 8. First the four smaller, then the four larger petal parts; the latter, reversed, are bound round the hollow pad; then follow three circles of the petals cut four in one piece, with a little open-our leaves, which are all cut in one piece, are for the smaller size, two inches long and one inch broad, quite straight at the bottom, folded together at the top, and slightly rounded, so as to give a little curve exactly in the middle. The larger ones are one inch and a quarter broad, two inches and a half long, shaped at the top as described for the smaller one. Four of both sides (see Fig. 5) are pressed between the thumb and fore-finger of both hands, then opened out again, and, lying fourfold upon each other upon the palm of the hand, are crimped with the hyacinth hook, according to Fig. 6. The scalloped edges are then drawn lightly over the scissors in order to give the part that turns over the delicate form natural to the rose-leaf. Then the separate parts of the petal must be quite unfolded and separated from each other, and the four petals in one piece must be pressed together at the under end; then the so-far prepared petal part is ing in the middle for pushing on. These are cut in the exact form shown in Fig. 9.

Each leaf is two inches and a quarter at the widest part, and is the same length from the highest point to the hole shown in the middle to draw the wire of the stamen calix shown in Fig. 2. The largest round of the wooden pin will be needed for rounding the large petals. As soon as a separate circle of the so-far finished rose is closely pushed on, the edges of the petals are very carefully gummed over each other at the side edges. Twelve leaves taken from this pattern are placed in reversed lines, and again carefully gummed over each other at the under points and side edges.

Suitable branches of moss are firmly gummed at regular distances under the roses. The stalks are covered with light green tissue paper, and a calix of green wax completes the rose. The mode of placing on the wadding and yellow tissue paper bud is shown in Fig. 10.

The large buds are easily made, and require a long or short strip of paper, according to their size, about one inch and a quarter or one inch and a half broad. Every leaf must be scalloped, and rounded, and turned back, according to Fig. 6, and squeezed together from the inside outwardly in the usual manner. The buds are also ornamented with branches of moss and a wax calix. The green leaves are bought very cheaply at a florist's.

PORTABLE BOX.

Materials.—American cloth, light brown cloth, embroidery silk, black, two shades brown and white, gold beads, little gilt ornaments, two buckles, striped ticking, pasteboard, leather for border, wooden frame.

Fig. 1.

THIS box opens in the middle, forming two equal halves, and measures fourteen and a half inches in length, and ten inches in breadth, and is eight and a quarter inches high at the sides. It is made of pasteboard covered with American cloth, and ornamented with leather scallops round the outer edges, borders covering the straps, and large palm-leaves in appliqué of light brown cloth, worked with a little black, and two shades of brown silk, with a few gold beads, and pretty little gilt ornaments. The arrangement of the tray, which is covered with ticking, is clearly shown in Figs. 2 and 3. The parts must be very firmly joined together with paste and glue; holes must be bored with a thick needle, and strong waxed thread used.

For the outer box, cut a piece of thick pasteboard, fifteen and a quarter inches long, and fourteen and a quarter inches broad for the principal part; the side parts are eight and a quarter inches broad; the ends in the middle, five inches high, and at the straight sides, two inches. In order to be able to arrange the under rounding, each pasteboard part must be covered with American cloth, and a piece left to turn over at the outer edges only. The other sides must afterwards have holes bored in them, and be firmly sewn together. The pieces of pasteboard for the inner box must be cut with great accuracy, and arranged according to the outer box, so that one-half of the inner box advances three-quarters of an inch above the outer, and the other half is as much below the outer box. The ticking must be glued on, and one and a half inch must be left to turn over everywhere. The parts must be afterwards sewn together at the edges. The four large pasteboard parts are cut through with a sharp knife exactly at the places where the sharp bend comes (for the outer box two inches from the edge; for the inner box, at a corresponding distance) upon the side that is not gummed for the requisite bend at the corners. Above this bend, a thin wooden edge, one inch broad, must be glued on to the outer box, and an edge of corresponding height must be also placed on the outer side parts. For the leather scallop on the seams and outer edge, a strip of leather one and a quarter inch broad, is cut out in scallops. For covering the joining seams, the strips of scallops must be sewn on underneath. Previously to fastening the scallops at the edge of the cover a strong cord must be placed in to make a firm finish. After fastening on the palm-leaves, and the little border in brown chain stitch, with a brown edge and slanting white stitches, the inner box with cord and straps (see Figs. 2 and 3) must be fastened to the box with almost invisible stitches. The handles are stitched over a cord, and the straps are lined with tick, and embroidered, and holes are bored for fastening them and the handles in the places where the wooden ledge renders it most secure. The buckles must be made secure with silk braid.

INFANT'S FLANNEL SHOE, WITH KNITTED SOCK.

THIS pretty little shoe is made of white flannel, worked round with button-hole stitch of red wool; the sock is knitted with colored wool. Cast on for the sock a sufficient number of stitches with red wool; begin at the upper edge, and work 16 rounds alternately 2 stitches knitted, 2 purled; then begin the striped pattern, which is worked in plain knitting, 2 rounds with red wool, 3 rounds with white wool, 2 rounds red, and 1 round black. The sock is worked like a stocking, only shorter and looser. The shoe is made of flannel taken double; it is embroidered with red wool, from illustration. The lappets of the shoe are fastened with a button and button-hole.

SPECTACLE CLEANER.

NOTHING damages an eyeglass or spectacles more rapidly than wiping them with any harsh, rough fabric. This small contrivance will be found very useful for the purpose. The shape is cut in paper, and the back is covered with green silk, ornamented in the centre with a few fancy stitches; a little wadding is added, and the lining consists of either soft wash leather or a piece of white kid glove, the inside being turned outwards. The edge is finished off with a piece of cord. Both sides are alike.

SCISSOR-SHEATH AND STRING.

Materials.—Drab crochet cotton, blue floselle, blue purse-silk, steel beads, blue satin ribbon three-fifths of an inch wide.

THIS scissor-sheath consists of a strip eighteen inches long, three-fifths of an inch wide, worked in crochet with drab cotton, and darned with blue floselle in a damask pattern. At the lower end of the string there is a small pocket finished off into a point; it is worked with blue purse-silk. At the upper end fasten a hook, by means of which the strip is fastened on to the waistband. At the same place a rosette of blue satin ribbon is sewn on. For working the crochet strip, wind some gray crochet cotton closely over a mesh three-fifths of an inch wide, work along one side of the mesh one slip stitch round each piece of cotton. Draw the thus covered cotton off the mesh, leaving only the last three or four, cover the mesh again, and continue to work on in this manner till the strip is nineteen inches long. Work slip stitches in the same manner along the other side of the

into a point. Then sew the lower end of the crochet strip on to half the upper edge of the pocket, after passing the handle of the scissors through, in the manner seen on illustration. Lastly, ornament the pocket round the edge with steel beads, from illustration, fasten a large hook at the upper end of the holder on the wrong side, and a rosette of blue satin ribbon on the right side.

SCISSOR-SHEATH AND STRING.

strip; at both ends work the slip stitches round the last piece of cotton. Then darn the loose cotton between the two rows of slip stitches with blue flosselle in the damask pattern, fold the strip in two, so as to form a point in the centre, and so that the selvedge stitches of one side meet together. These selvedge stitches are sewn together five inches from the point with buttonhole stitch of blue pûrse-silk, taking up two corresponding stitches with one buttonhole stitch; a steel bead must be threaded with each stitch. When the strip has been thus far joined together, work on the free side one buttonhole stitch in every selvedge stitch, likewise threading on one steel bead for every stitch. For the pocket, make a foundation chain of twenty-eight stitches, join them into a circle, and work eighteen rounds in double crochet, decreasing in a manner that the pocket is finished off

BUTTERFLY WORKED ON NET.

ORNAMENTAL BOX.

BUTTERFLY WOKED ON NET.

THESE butterflies are used for ornamenting evening dresses; our model is composed of white and black net worked with pink silk.

ORNAMENTAL BOX.

THIS small box, intended for holding the knick-knacks on a dressing-table, is made of the new gold canvas, and can be of any size, according to requirement. The foundation, sides, and lid are all cut in card-board, which is covered with pink satin at both sides. The gold canvas is then cut the size of the card-board, and worked with black chenille, according to the illustration. The small round dots are gold beads. A gold cord is sewn at the edges to conceal the joinings.

BIB IN CROCHET TRICOTEE.

Materials.—This bib is crocheted with knitting cotton, No. 16, and a long coarse steel crochet hook; a finer cotton and hook are required for the edging. If worked in wool it would make a capital chest preserver for children in cold weather.

Commence at the bottom of the point in front with 3 ch, take up the 2 chain, and work back as usual.

2d row. Make a stitch by taking up the horizontal stitch running between the 1st and 2d loops, take up the 2d long loop, make another stitch as the first between the 2d and 3d long loops; work back.

3d. Make a stitch as in last row on each side the centre long loop in the row. Work back; repeat this row until you have 59 long loops; this should bring you to the 28th row.

29th. Take up 29 loops only with the one on the needle. Work back. This is the first row of the right shoulder.

30th. Take up 28 loops. Work back. 31st row to 37th row. Take up one stitch less each row.

38th. Leave 3 loops unraised at the end of this little row; repeat this row 5 times.

44th. Take up each 3 stitches left in each of the last 6 rows. Work back. Work the 2 last on the needle off together, so decreasing 1 stitch.

45th. Take up all the loops of last row, work back the 2 first together, decreasing one, and the two last on the needle also.

Then work 6 rows, decreasing one each row at the end of each row in working back.

52d. Take up all but the last loop, work back plain.

53d. Make a loop between the loop on the needle and the 2d long loop, as in the first rows; leave 1 loop unraised at the end of the row, work back. Work 7 more rows like this.

61st. Leave 1 loop unraised at the end, and make no increase in commencing; work back. Work 4 more rows like this.

66th. Raise 2 loops besides the one on the needle; work back.

67th. Raise the loops of 66th row and all the stitches left at the end of the rows to the 46th row.

9 rows plain.

77th. Leave 1 loop unraised at the end; work back; work the next 16 rows as the 77th.

94th. Raise all the loops left between this and the 77th row; work back; 8 plain rows, fasten off.

Join to the 3d stitch from the centre of the work in the 29th row, and repeat from that row for the left shoulder, with this difference, that all the stitches are left in working back at the end of the needle instead of in raising the loops, and where you decreased in commencing the row, decrease in ending it—the same with the increasings—when this left shoulder is worked, work a row of double crochet all round and in the neck.

The border consists of 11 ivy leaves worked in the finer cotton; these ivy leaves are joined by 12 sets of 6 rings.

1st ivy leaf. 11 ch for 1st vein, 1 l on the 7th ch, * 2 ch, miss 2, 1 l on the next * twice. 2d vein, 14 ch, 1 l on the 10th * 2 ch, miss 2, 1 l on next * 3 times; repeat the 2d vein twice more; after the 4th vein is worked crochet 1 l on the 1st l of the 1st vein, then 11 ch for the 5th vein, 1 l on 7th, * 2 ch, miss 2, 1 l on the next twice, 1 dc on the 1st ch in the first vein.

2d round. Double crochet, work 1 dc in each stitch, excepting in the top stitch of every vein, in it work 3 dc, and at the bottom of each vein miss 3 stitches; at the end of the 5th vein leave 1 stitch, and commence the 3d round in the 2d dc of last round.

3d round. Dc in each of the 2d and 3d stitches, * 3 ch, 1 dc in each of 2 next stitches; repeat. At the top of each vein only leave 1 dc between the little loops of 3 ch; at the bottom of each vein leave 2 stitches unworked, besides the centre stitch, and 2 on the other side the centre stitch, making 5 stitches altogether. Always begin the next vein with 2 dc. At the end of the round leave 2 stitches unworked, and join with 1 s in the 1st dc of the round; fasten off. Work 11 of these leaves; when 2 are worked, join them with the rings.

1st ring. 13 ch, unite, work inside half only of this ring with dc, then 16 ch, join into a ring, 1 s on the last dc in last ring, fill half this ring with dc. 16 ch, join as the last, fill half of it with dc, and draw through the picot at the top of the first vein in a leaf; work back in each half of the 3 rings with dc, and join with 1 s to the 1st dc in 1st ring, and at the same time to the top of 1st vein in another leaf; fasten off. Work the next row of 3 rings in the same manner, joining to the picot at the top of the side in the 2d vein, and drawing the centre dc in each half of the ring through the middle dc of each ring below. You will observe that two leaves are joined on both sides the bib with 4 rings in the 1st row. At the back end the border with a set of rings on each side.

You join the border to the bib in the following manner: Commence on the point of the bib in front with 1 dc, 6 ch, join with 1 dc on the dc of leaf between the top of first vein, to which the ring is joined, and the one to the outside of it; 6 ch, * 1 dc on bib, 6 ch, 1 dc on ring; repeat, taking up each ring and first and last veins of the leaves, making the border fit nicely; fasten off. Add 2 little buttons and loops at the back.

KNITTED DUSTER.

SHOWS part of a duster, full size; it is knitted with narrow tape, in rows backwards and forwards, with thick wooden knitting-needles. At both ends the duster is finished off with a fringe of the tape. The duster can be made of worsted braid or wool, if preferred.

CROCHET SCARF.

Materials.—White wool, mauve-colored wool, a bone crochet needle to correspond.

MAKE a foundation chain of 22 stitches with white wool; join the stitches into a circle. 1st round. Insert the needle into the 1st stitch, work 1 stitch, draw out a loop three-fifths of an inch long, keep the loop on the needle, work 1 stitch more, and draw the loop out of the top of the same size. 2d. Take the needle out of all the long loops, and take them up separately one by one by slip stitches of mauve-colored wool.

Work thus 34 rounds. Gather up the ends, and fasten a small tassel of white and mauve wool.

POISONOUS HAIR DYES, ETC.

BY DR. CHARLES F. UHLER.

It is fully time that the press were attracting more general attention towards the great injury arising from the use of the various "Invigorators," "Restorers," "Hair Washes," etc., that are becoming so popular among the people.

Scarcely a paper or periodical can we take up for perusal, scarcely can we turn our eyes, but we meet the cunning schemes laid to ingratiate into public favor these injurious compounds. And the people, itching to try every new thing that appears, purchase them, daub them upon their craniums, and then recommend them to their friends, without the slightest investigation or thought as to the consequences.

They are, to be sure, without exception, warranted "perfectly harmless," "perfectly safe," "perfectly pure," and "all that sort of thing" which, as might be expected in the first place from the extra pains taken to give this idea, is a perfect humbug. It is well known to the manufacturers, and all who are acquainted with their ingredients, that they are neither safe, pure, nor harmless in any way that they can be used; and the thousand deluded mortals who are in the daily habit of using them will to their sorrow sooner or later find this to be the truth. Lead in some form is the principal ingredient of all of these preparations. By their continued application to the skin or scalp, an absorption of lead takes place, and its poisonous effects manifest themselves under the various forms of lead poisoning; for it must be known that lead, gaining access to the system in this way, is fully as dangerous, and is attended with fully as disastrous results, as when taken in by the usual methods.

Were the penalty of the introduction of this metal into the system more promptly suffered, or its disastrous results experienced as quickly as with many of the more active mineral poisons, its danger as a poison would be infinitely less, but, unhappily, this is not the case. They act so secretly and insidiously that they undermine health, break down constitutions, and often directly destroy life without a suspicion existing of their real character.

Thus it is that those who suffer the effects of this agent are in the greater number of instances entirely beyond cure before the real cause of their "ill health" is even suspected. There is no doubt but that hundreds have gone to their graves without even their physician being aware of the cause of the destruction that was going on within them. It is a serious matter, this introduction of lead into the human system. Arsenic, strychnine, Prussic acid are far the more preferable and generous. They kill outright and end the matter at once, a "consummation devoutly wished" by many a poor victim of saturnine poisoning. And all of this is equally true as regards many of the cosmetics now so universally used by the feminine sex; they are poisons in the rankest form. They are not only hurtful by obstructing the natural pores of the skin, stopping up the mouths of the excreting ducts, which are designed by nature to throw off by an insensible and sensible perspiration the impurities of the blood, but also "presenting to the absorbent vessels a poison which is taken into the system, and penetrates to every portion of the body." The effects of these cosmetics are to destroy the natural texture of the skin, causing it to become dry and wrinkled, and impervious to the oxygen of the air, and by depriving the blood of this life-giving principle, producing rapid decay. Ladies, take our advice, and do not use them. Keep your skin clean and in a healthy condition by the frequent use of pure cold water and rough towels, and no cosmetic will ever be necessary. Their use removes all impurities from the skin, stimulates its delicate net-work, allows the oxygen of the atmosphere to come in contact with its bloodvessels, and thus supplies all the needed elements to enhance and preserve beauty.

We herewith give a few simple but reliable tests that all who may desire may detect the presence of lead in any of these cosmetics or hair washes. No one who values health and immunity from pain should neglect to apply them to any compound recommended for the purpose of coloring the hair or improving the complexion. A solution of iodide of potassium (twenty grains to one ounce of water) added to the wash will throw down a light yellow precipitate. Sulphide of sodium (Glauber's salts) will immediately turn it black or dark, and generally throw down a precipitate. A solution of sulphuretted hydrogen will have the same effect. By using these simple and inexpensive tests, which may be obtained at any drug store, and rejecting everything that is proven to contain lead in some form, the slow poisoning, which is sure to follow their constant application, will readily be avoided.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Potato Pone.—This is a favorite dish in the West India Islands. Wash, peel, and grate two pounds of potatoes; add four ounces each of sugar and butter (or beef dripping) melted, one teaspoonful each of salt and pepper; mix well together; place it in a baking-dish, and put it into a brisk oven until it is done, and become nicely browned.

Rabbit Soup.—Cut one or two rabbits into joints; lay them for an hour in cold water; dry and fry them in butter till about half done, with four or five onions and a middling-sized head of celery cut small; add to this three quarts of cold water, one pound of split peas, some pepper and salt; let it stew gently for four or five hours, then strain and serve it.

Forcemeat.—Take equal quantities of cold chicken, veal, and beef, shred very small and mixed together; season at the same time with a moderate quantity of pepper, salt, sweet herbs, and grated nutmeg—that is to say, if intended for white meat, or for anything delicately flavored; but if meant for a savory dish, add a little minced ham, and an atom of garlic. Put the whole in a stone mortar, and pound it until quite fine, then make it into a paste with a raw egg, some butter, marrow, or fat of some kind. When used, it may either be rolled into round balls and fried for any made dish, or put it into any joint of meat or poultry as stuffing; and if kept in a cool place, and well seasoned, it will keep good for several days.

French Mashed Potatoes.—After well boiling some potatoes in their jackets, peel and mash them with a fork; put them into a stewpan with some butter and salt, moisten them with fresh cream, and let them grow dry while stirring them over the fire; add more cream, and so continue for nearly an hour; dish them, and brown them on the top with a salamander. Serve directly.

To Glaze Pastry.—To glaze pastry, which is the usual method adopted for meat or raised pies, break an egg, separate the yolk from the white, and beat the former for a short time. Then, when the pastry is nearly baked, take it out of the oven, brush it over with this beaten yolk of egg, and put it back in the oven to set the glaze.

Horseradish Sauce.—A spoonful of mustard, a table-spoonful of vinegar, three spoonfuls of cream, and a little salt. Grate as much horseradish into it as will be required to make it rather thick; and, if liked, a little garlic may be added.

Buttered Eggs.—Four new-laid eggs, two ounces of butter. Procure the eggs new-laid, if possible; break them into a basin, and beat them well; put the butter into another basin, which place in boiling water, and stir till the butter is melted. Pour that and the eggs into a lined saucepan, hold it over a gentle fire, and, as the mixture begins to warm, pour it two or three times into the basin and back again, that the two ingredients may be well incorporated. Keep stirring the eggs and butter one way until they are hot, without boiling, and serve on hot buttered toast. If the mixture is allowed to boil, it will curdle, and so be entirely spoiled.

To Clarify Butter.—Place two pounds, or any quantity of butter required, in a clean jar, and place the jar in a stewpan of hot water; stir until all is melted, and then strain through a sieve, and either use at once for potted meats, etc., or store in small jars, and keep in a very cool place.

Potted Beef.—Two pounds of lean beef, six ounces of butter, one teaspoonful each of pepper, salt, and mace. Free the beef from all skin and gristle, and put it into an earthenware jar, with a gill of water, and cover and place it in a deep stewpan full of boiling water, and simmer slowly for five hours. Take out the beef, mince it very finely, and pound it in a mortar with the above-named seasoning. When smooth, add the butter, which should be clarified by degrees; press the mixture into small pots, pour clarified butter over the top. When cool, tie down, and keep in a cool place.

Turkey and Chicken Patties.—Take the white part of some cold turkey or chicken, and mince it very fine. Mince also some cold-boiled ham or smoked tongue, and then mix the turkey and ham together. Add the yolks of some hard-boiled eggs, grated or minced, a very little Cayenne, and some powdered mace and nutmeg. Moisten the whole with cream or fresh butter. Have ready some puff-paste shells, that have been baked empty in pattypans. Place them on a large dish, and fish them with the mixture. Cold fillet of veal minced, and mixed with chopped ham, and grated yolk of egg, and seasoned as above, will make very good patties.

Veal Gravy Soup.—Garnish the bottom of the stewpan with thin pieces of lard, then a few slices of ham, slices of veal cutlet, sliced onions, carrots, parsnips, celery, a few cloves upon the meat, and a spoonful of broth; soak it on the fire in this manner till the veal throws out its juice; then put it on a stronger fire till the meat catches to the bottom of the pan and is brought to a proper color, then add a sufficient quantity of light broth, and simmer it on a slow fire till the meat is thoroughly done; add a little thyme and mushrooms. Skim and sift it clear for use.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Cakes for Dessert.—Four eggs, half a pound of butter, half a pound of sugar, half a pound of flour. Mix the butter, sugar, and yolks of the eggs thoroughly, then add the flour and mix again, then the whites of the eggs beaten to a thick froth. Grate in a little lemon-rind. Put in little tins, filling each about one-third full, and bake till done.

Egg Cheesecakes.—Twelve eggs, boiled hard and rubbed through a sieve (while hot), with half a pound of butter; then add half a pound of pounded loaf-sugar, half a pound of currants, and a little nutmeg. Brandy may be added, which flavors them nicely; or, if preferred, a few drops of essence of lemon or almonds.

A Plain Plum-Pudding for Children.—One pound of flour, one pound of bread-crumbs, three-quarters of a pound of stoned raisins, three-quarters of a pound of currants, three-quarters of a pound of suet, three or four eggs, milk, two ounces of candied peel, one teaspoonful of powdered allspice, half a saltspoonful of salt. Let the suet be finely chopped, the raisins stoned, and the currants well washed, picked, and dried. Mix these with the other dry ingredients, and stir all well together; beat and strain the eggs to the pudding, stir these in, and add just sufficient milk to make it mix properly. Tie it up in a well-floured cloth, put it into boiling water, and boil for at least five hours. Serve with a little pounded sugar sprinkled over it.

Apple Custard.—One dozen large apples, moist sugar to taste, one small teacupful of cold water, the grated rind of one lemon, one pint of milk, four eggs, two ounces of loaf-sugar. Peel, cut, and core the apples, put them into a lined saucepan with the cold water, and, as they heat, bruise them to a pulp; sweeten with moist sugar, and add the grated lemon-rind; when cold, put the fruit at the bottom of a pie dish, and pour over it a custard made with the above-named proportions of milk, eggs, and loaf-sugar; grate a little nutmeg over the top, place the dish in a moderate oven, and bake from twenty-five to thirty-five minutes.

Sweet Paste.—This is suitable to fruit tarts generally, apples excepted, for which we recommend a puff-paste. To three-quarters of a pound of butter put a pound and a half of flour, three or four ounces of sifted loaf-sugar, the yolks of two eggs, and half a pint of new milk. Bake it in a moderate oven.

All the Year Round Pudding.—Line a pie-dish with paste, spread on this three ounces of any kind of jam (raspberry is the best), then beat well in a basin the following: three ounces of bread-crumbs, the same of sugar and butter, the rind and juice of half a large lemon; add this to the pastry and jam, and bake half an hour.

Rice and Milk.—To every quart of good milk allow two ounces of rice: wash it well in several waters; put it with the milk into a closely-covered saucepan, and set it over a slow fire; when it boils, take it off; let it stand till it is cold, and simmer it about an hour and a quarter before sending it to table, and serve it in a tureen.

Bibaoe.—One pint of cream whipped until stiff, one ounce of isinglass boiled and strained in about one pint of water until reduced to half a pint. Four ounces of sugar, one vanilla bean; stir in the cream when the isinglass gets blood heat. Then mould and eat with whipped cream.

Ambrosia.—Grate a cocoanut, peel a pine-apple, etc., cut it up into small pieces; then put a layer of cocoanut in your dish, strew sugar over it, then a layer of pine-apple, strew sugar over that; continue this until your dish is full. Orange can be substituted for the pine-apple. It must be prepared several hours before it is wanted for use.

Cup Cake.—One cup of butter and three of sugar worked to cream, a half wineglassful of wine, five eggs beat separately, one teaspoonful of soda sifted with five cups of sifted flour, a little nutmeg, and lastly a cup of sour cream; bake in round tins in a moderately quick oven; fruit may be added if desired; frost while the cake is warm, and it will keep some time without becoming stale. This cake is rich enough for any company.

POSITION IN SLEEPING.

It is better to go to sleep on the right side, for then the stomach is very much in the position of a bottle turned upside down, and the contents of it are aided in passing out by gravitation. If one goes to sleep on the left side, the operation of emptying the stomach of its contents is more like drawing water from a well. After going to sleep, let the body take its own position. If you sleep on your back, especially soon after a hearty meal, the weight of the digestive organs and that of the food, resting on the great vein of the body near the backbone, compresses it, and arrests the flow of the blood more or less. If the arrest is partial, the sleep is disturbed, and there are unpleasant dreams. If the meal has been recent and hearty, the arrest is more decided; and the various sensations—such as falling over a precipice, or the pursuit of a wild beast, or other impending danger, and the desperate effort to get rid of it—arouse us, and send on the stagnating blood; and we wake in a fright, or trembling, or in perspiration, or feeling exhaustion, according to the degree of stagnation, and the length of the efforts made to overcome the danger. But when we are unable to escape the danger—when we do fall over the precipice, when the tumbling building crushes us—what then? That is death! That is the death of those of whom it is said, when found lifeless in the morning: "That they were as well as ever they were the day before," and often it is added, "and ate heartier than common." This last, as a frequent cause of death to those who have gone to bed to wake no more, we give merely as a private opinion. The possibility of its truth is enough to deter any rational man from a late and hearty meal. This we do know with certainty, that waking up in the night with painful diarrhœa, or cholera, or bilious colic, ending in death in a very short time, is probably traceable to a late large meal. The truly wise will take the safe side. For persons to eat three times a day, it is amply sufficient to make the last meal of cold bread and butter, and a cup of some warm drink. No one can starve on it; while a perseverance in the habit soon begets a vigorous appetite for breakfast, so promising of a day of comfort. —Hall's Journal of Health.

CONTRIBUTED.

White Sponge Cake.—The whites of ten eggs, beaten to a stiff froth, one tumbler of sifted flour, one and a half tumbler of white sugar, half a teaspoonful of cream of tartar, a pinch of salt. Have the salt and cream of tartar well stirred into the flour. Add the sugar to the whites first, then stir in the flour very lightly and put into a moderate oven immediately. Some may think that this will need soda, as there is cream of tartar with the ingredients, but this is a mistake. Mrs. H. P. M.

DEAR GODDEY: I send you a few receipts which I use, and which, for goodness and cheapness combined, I think cannot be surpassed.

Marble Cake. White Part.—Whites of four eggs, one cup of white sugar, half a cup of butter, the same of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, half a teaspoonful of soda.

Black Part.—Yelks of four eggs, one cup of brown sugar, half a cup of molasses, the same of butter and of sour milk, one teaspoonful of soda, and plenty of all kinds of spices such as suits the taste. Put first black then white, until all is in, then bake. It is very nice.

Sponge Cake.—Four eggs, one cup of sugar, one of flour.

VOL. LXXX.—24

Ginger Snaps.—One cup of lard, one of sugar, two of molasses, one tablespoonful of soda dissolved in one cup of water, three tablespoonfuls of ginger. Mix very stiff.

Potato Stew.—Four quarts of water, six good-sized potatoes, pared and cut fine, half a cup of rice, one handful of finely-cut cabbage, one onion sliced, two tablespoonfuls of salt, one tablespoonful of butter, a little pepper. When nearly ready to serve up beat together one egg and a little flour and water, and stir in. Mrs. J. E. S.

Lemon Pie, Rich.—Five eggs, two lemons, and sugar enough to sweeten; save out a couple of the whites of the eggs, beat stiff with sugar; when the pies are cold, spread over the top. This is enough for two pies.

Lemon Pie, Plain.—One large Boston cracker soaked, a teacup of water, one lemon, sugar to sweeten, grate the lemon, and mix well. This will make one pie. Mrs. J. W. B.

French Loaf Cake.—Five cups of sugar, three of butter, two of milk, ten of sifted flour, six eggs, three small nutmegs (?), one teaspoonful of saleratus, one pound of raisins, one-third of a pound of citron; stir the butter and sugar to a cream, then add part of the flour, the milk, and the beaten yelks of the eggs; then add the rest of the flour and the whites of the eggs; add the fruit as you get the cake ready for the oven; season to taste. This will make four loaves. Bake one hour.

Ginger Cookies.—One cup of molasses and one of lard, one tablespoonful of ginger, three eggs, two heaping teaspoonfuls of saleratus.

Loaf Cake.—Three cups of sweet milk, two of sugar, and one of yeast; stir in flour to make it quite thick, and let it rise over night; in the morning add two eggs well beaten, fruit and spice to taste; let it rise till light. Bake in a slow oven.

Sugar Cookies.—Two eggs, beaten separately, the yelks beaten with the sugar and butter, two cups of sugar, one of butter, and one of sour milk, one teaspoonful of soda; sprinkle white sugar over when put to bake. Bake in a quick oven.

Mrs. A. L. M., Stockbridge, Wis.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Glazing Shirts.—To every quart of starch add a teaspoonful of salt and one of white soap, scraped fine; boil the starch (after adding hot water until you have it as thick as you wish).

Whitewash that will not Rub Off.—Mix up half a pailful of lime and water; take half a pint of flour and make a starch of it, and pour it into the whitewash while hot. Stir it well, and make it ready for use.

To Clean Hair.—Take one ounce of borax and half an ounce of camphor, powder fine, and dissolve in one quart of boiling water; when cool, the solution will be fit for use, and with it you should damp the hair frequently. This wash effectually cleanses, beautifies, and strengthens the hair, preserves the color, and prevents it from falling off. The camphor will, after being dissolved, form into lumps again, but that will be of no consequence, as the water will have been sufficiently impregnated.

To Extract Ink from Colored Articles.—Drop tallow on the stains, and then soak and rub the same with boiling milk. Effectual.

Another Mode: Gather the leaves of the wood sorrel, dry them in the sun, powder them, and sprinkle the powder thickly on ink stains on colored prints, etc. Pour boiling water upon the sorrel, and after lying a short time the stain will disappear.

Editors' Table.

THE LIFE OF MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

THERE are several English authoresses whom we always class together: Miss Edgeworth, Miss Austen, and Miss Mitford. All these, after a life of letters, died unmarried, with no children to keep alive their memory; and left their fame to the care not alone of their countrymen, but of all who prize the union of sagacity and intelligence, and in one instance at least of genius, with the softer and more amiable attributes of her sex. Miss Edgeworth's biography appeared lately in our pages; that of Miss Mitford is now before us; and Miss Austen's we reserve for our next number.

MARY Russell Mitford was born on the 16th of December, 1787, and died on the 10th of January, 1855. Her long life was, in one sense, extremely uneventful. It was spent almost altogether with her parents, in their various homes; there is nothing exciting or romantic in the volumes that narrate her daily history: yet few biographies exceed in interest the series of letters which, with a few connecting links supplied by the editor, portray the quiet existence so well united with generous cultivation of mind and of heart. Miss Mitford's life may be said to have been dedicated to her father. He was, according to the editor, a gay, reckless, and improvident man, upon whom all the gifts of Fortune seemed lavished in vain. He married an heiress, and squandered her fortune in a few years; lived for some time in poverty; then drew a lottery prize of twenty thousand pounds, upon a ticket chosen by his daughter, and contrived, by gaming and bad management, to dissipate that also; leaving himself dependent, for the rest of his useless life, upon his wife's small portion and his daughter's earnings. Yet he never seems to have lost even their respect. "Notwithstanding that gradual diminution, first of their luxuries and afterwards of their comforts, to which his extravagance reduced them, they were never heard to complain of his conduct, nor appeared to love him less, nor seemed to consider any privations or exertions too great which, for his sake, they were required to undergo."

AFTER the loss of this second fortune, the sole dependence of the family was upon Miss Mitford's literary labor. Her first book, "Miscellaneous Poems," was published in 1823; and the applause which greeted it decided her career. She published two other poems, the latter of which met with such harsh treatment from the Quarterly, that she abandoned that style of composition for the drama. Of her four tragedies, Rienzi was the most successful; but all were received with favor, and the proceeds to the author were considerable. Indeed, Miss Mitford's books would have brought the family a comfortable income, had it not been for the extravagance and credulity of her father, who was incessantly losing money in gambling and speculation. In 1832 she finished her series of country sketches, which, under the title of "Our Village," is the book by which she will best be known. The ease, simplicity, and sly humor of her quiet pen have had the fullest scope; and no later writer, save Mrs. Gaskell, has equalled her description of a country neighborhood. In 1833 she published another series of the same sort, "Recollections of My Father's Time," which were her considerable works. She wrote a novel, but it did not succeed; and from this amusing sketch of her own, we can judge of the cause:—

"I began a novel myself once, and got on very prosperously for about a hundred pages of character and description. It was very light and airy, and laughed with some success at my hero and heroine myself, and my readers. I came to a dead stop for want of invention. A lack of incident killed the poor thing. It went out like a candle. In all these hundred pages, not a person had said a single word or done a single thing but my heroine; and she—guess what she had done! Turned the lock of a drawing-room door! After this it was time to give up novel writing!"

The biography is merely a thread connecting Miss Mitford's own letters. Of these there is a great number, and the story of her life is to be found in them. She had many friends, well known to the world, such as Haydn, the painter, and Miss Barrett, afterwards Mrs. Browning; but she wrote chiefly to her parents, and after them to Sir William Eliwood. Her letters are sparkling with anecdote and piquant criticism, and we can do no better for our readers than to make a few extracts from them; recommending them strongly to the book itself. We have chosen rather to quote Miss Mitford's account of her own thoughts and feelings than her criticisms upon others, though of these there is no lack. She had a passionate love of flowers; and after describing a gallery of paintings with great enthusiasm, says: "You will think me picture-mad—and really I do love pictures better than anything else in the world except flowers, and books, and greyhounds, and fresh air and old friends." Here is her description of her garden:—

"I should not omit, when reckoning up my felicities just now, to tell you that my little garden is a perfect rosary—the greenest and most blossom-y nook that ever the sun shone upon. It is almost shut in by buildings; one a long open shed, very pretty, a sort of rural arcade, where we sit. On the other side is an old granary, to which we mount by outside wooden steps, also very pretty. Then there is an opening to a little court, also backed by buildings, but with room enough to let in the sunshine, the northwest sunshine, that comes salant in summer evenings through and under a large elder tree. One end is closed by our pretty irregular cottage, which, as well as the granary, is covered by cherry-trees, vines, roses, jessamine, honeysuckle, and grand spires of hollyhocks. The other is comparatively open, showing over high pales the blue sky, and a range of woody hills. All and every part is untrimmed, antique, weather-stained, and homely as can be imagined—gratifying the eye by its exceeding picturesqueness, and the mind by the certainty that no pictorial effect was intended, that it owes all its charms to 'rare accident.'"

And again:—

"Ben having said that half the parish had mounted on a hayrick close by to look at the garden which lies beneath it (an acre of flowers rich in color as a painter's palette), I could not resist the sight of the ladder, and one evening, when all the men were away, climbed up to take myself a view of my flowery domain. I wish you could see it! Masses of the Siberian larkspur, and sweet williams, mostly double, the still brighter new larkspur (Dolpium Chinensis), rich as an Oriental butterfly—such a size, and such a blue!—amongst roses in millions, with the blue and white Canterbury bells (also double), and the white foxglove, and the variegated monkshood, the carnation pea, in its stalwart beauty, the nemophila, like the sky above its head, the new erysimum, with its gay orange tuft, hundreds of lesser annuals, and fuchsias, zinnias, salvias, goss-niums, past compt; so bright are the flowers, that the green really does not predominate amongst them!"

"I have just finished Mr. Hallam's 'View of Europe during the Middle Ages,' a very masterly work in its way; but makes one long every minute for Froissart's picturesque minuteness instead of the large views and sweeping generalities of the author. I don't like philosophical historians, who make wise remarks and write fine dissertations, do you? Live forever the Burnets and Clarendons! delightful tellers of what they saw! One page of such narrative is worth whole volumes of disquisition."

Miss Mitford was a devotee to the older English writers, and speaks often of her enjoyment of their style and matter. This keen appreciation of their beauties rendered her critical to contemporaries, sometimes even a little caustic; but her remarks are almost surely apt and telling. She pointed out what few apparently have noticed, that Sir Walter Scott's English is by no means good, but stilted and polysyllabic, and that he becomes natural and simple only in vernacular Scotch. Yet she thoroughly liked "Ivanhoe." "I know nothing," she says, "so rich, so splendid, so profuse, so like old painted glass or a Gothic chapel full of shrines, and banners, and knightly monuments. The soul, too, which is sometimes wanting, is there in its full glory of passion, and tenderness. Rebecca is such a woman as Fletcher used to draw."

We insert a specimen of Miss Mitford's poetry. Some of her most striking and beautiful passages are to be found in her poems. We have not space to refer to them in greater detail. She was especially fine in her descriptions of nature:—

THE FISHING SEAT—WHITEFRIARS.

There is a sweet accordant harmony
In this fair scene—this quaintly-floated bower;
These sloping banks, with tree, and shrub, and flower Bedecked; and these pure waters, where the sky
In its deep blueness shines so peacefully—
Shines all unbroken, save with sudden light
When some proud swan, majestically bright,
Flashes her snowy beauty on the eye—
Shines all unbroken, save with sudden start
When from the delicate birch a dewy tear
The west wind brushes. E'en the bee's blithe trade,
Or the lark's carol, sound too loudly here;
A spot it is for far-off music made,
Stillness and rest—a smaller Windermere!

We have now seen Miss Mitford in her domestic, social, and literary character. The womanly element predominates in all; but the religious sentiment that hallows and uplifts the feminine soul and seems its natural expression, is lacking. Yet her filial piety, so deep and self-sacrificing, is the governing element of her character; it prompts her duties, incites her genius, and really sustains her fortitude in the battles of life, that, from childhood to age, she was compelled to meet. She was led by a way she knew not, but at eventide it was light. We thank her biographer for the care he has taken to make plain this manifestation of her Christian faith. In her later letters there are many passages showing that her faith was deepening and her mind opening to the realities of the Christian religion. We give one of these extracts:—

"For my own part, I hold this visitation to have been sent in mercy by that most merciful God to draw me to Him. May He grant His grace that the opportunity be not cast away! I have none of the 'holy joys' that I often hear of, nor even my 'home feeling,' dear friend; nothing but a trembling, fearful, humble hope, and a full sense of my own unworthiness. Nay, I have much to strive against in wandering thoughts which often beset me in prayer. But I strive against them, and, through Christ's infinite love and mercy, I have 'hope.'"

THE HISTORY OF A NINE YEARS' MISSION.*

ONE of the marvels of our country is the opening of Asia to Western civilization. China, that ancient empire, now become almost effete from the pernicious results of isolation, has changed her commercial policy, and thrown open her ports to the trade of Europe and of America; and India, though long under the political control of England, has, we may say, only within a few years opened the doors of her social life to an English-speaking class.

We look back with much gratitude upon the History of our Mission. Nine years ago the Editress first ventured in these pages to lay the cause of Woman's Mission to Woman before the public; and since then she has, through the same channel, frequently called attention to its progress.

The influences of these efforts to educate women are felt throughout India, and in Calcutta the undercurrent of civilization that only comes from Christianity is fast increasing. An educated Hindoo said to Miss Brittan:—

"When our women are educated and taught to know something more than to dress and sleep, then, and not until then, shall we know the meaning of the beautiful English word 'Home.'"

The time has now come when the Editress will lay down her office in the Society. She desires to give a short summary of the results effected, and of the expense attending them; and to ask for her successor

* "The Philadelphia Branch of Woman's Union Missionary Society of America for Heathen Women"

The Cost of Our Mission.

In presenting our sketch of the results achieved by our Society (The Philadelphia Branch), one feature is wanting, viz., the cost in money. In nine years' work we have collected in all—

For our own Mission	$7698 81
For the purchase of the Home in Calcutta	5602 00
	$13200 81
Of this sum we have paid to the New York General Society—
For the purchase of the Home	$6502 00
For the Zennah Teacher	900 00
For the expenses of the Home	300 00
	6702 00
Leaving for all expenses in sustaining our own Mission for the last nine years	$6496 81

With this small sum we have doubled our number of Bible women; we have originated or assisted five schools for girls, in which over two hundred pupils are training, like the class of Mrs. Binney, for Christian usefulness. About thirty women and girls have become communicants, and a much larger number are preparing for Christian duties. The Bible readers have drawn hundreds of women to hear and to love the Word of God. We feel that we have been guided in this new path of duty, and taught by the efficiency of our small means that the Divine blessing rests upon the humblest efforts made in faith and love for Christ.

Now the way is plain before us. Heathendom is awaking to this new manifestation of Gospel light. What shall be for the next nine years the history of the Philadelphia Branch? It has marvellously increased in numbers and in opportunities of doing good. Will not the means be ready for a cause that appeals so powerfully to the sympathy of every Christian heart?

and for the "Philadelphia Branch" the continued assistance and interest of her readers. BOOKS FOR HOME READING.

WE gave in our last number some account of a book of travels, adventures, and descriptions, which would serve at once to amuse and instruct the home circle. We have now two others to recommend. They are more directly didactic than Doctor Hartwig's work, but not less entertaining and agreeable. M. Jean Macé's "History of a Mouthful of Bread" and "The Servants of the Stomach" are written avowedly for children; but there are few of us, except physicians and chemists, who may not learn from them. The titles give but a faint idea of their scope. Take, for instance, the former. The first agent in the history of the bread is the hand which has sown the wheat, built the ships, baked the bread, and finally conveys it to the mouth: the first chapter is therefore on the hand. Then comes the tongue, or sense of taste, which decides whether the food is agreeable or disagreeable; the teeth, which cut it apart and fit it for digestion; the throat, the stomach, and then the various organs and tissues of the body formed and nourished by the food. Then come the incidental topics necessary to explain, such as atmospheric pressure, combustion, animal heat, etc.; and the book ends with a long section upon animals, showing the differences between their nutritive system and man's.

"The Servants of the Stomach" is designed for a higher state of knowledge, though still addressed to a child. It treats of the vertebrate structure of man; the bones, nerves, arms, legs, brain, etc. But no mere account of what the books contain can give any idea of the simplicity of style and abounding illustration, which put the most difficult and complicated subjects within reach of a child. We have looked through the books for a short passage to quote, but the style is diffuse, and clear on account of its diffuseness, and we are compelled to refer our readers to M. Macé himself. The volume first named is translated by Mrs. Gatty, an Englishwoman, who has marvellously preserved the ease and grace of the original. Her preface, most of which is given to the American edition, will be sufficient to attract our readers. There is one more volume yet to come, "The History of the Senses and Thought," which will complete the child's knowledge of her own constitution. A girl who has mastered these books knows more than nine grown people out of ten of practical physiology and anatomy; and has learned it without pain or great effort, hardly realizing that she was being taught. What better course of reading for parents to pursue with their children than one where both are taught and both entertained?

These books are handsomely bound and printed by Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

(To E. L. A.)

BY CLIO STANLEY.

SMILE, little maiden; on thy lip
Sorrow will linger by and by;
The sweet light dancing swift and bright
Will fade from out thy laughing eye;
The reddest roses will grow pale,
The violets lose their tender blue,
And all the world—and all the world
Be touched with grief's sad hue.

Sing, little maiden; in thy soul
Each hour grows bright with cheerful song;
The melody of bird and brook
In thy low laughter runs along;
Thy song will sometime hush itself,
Thy loving breath turn into sighs,
And all the world—and all the world
Be thought a sorry prize.

Love, little maiden; short and sweet
Is life to loving souls like thine;
Thou knowest where the flowers grow,
And where the brightest jewels shine;
The myrtle-wreath will drop away,
Thy sunny brow be marked with care,
And all the world—and all the world
Lie silent, cold, and bare.

Watch on, dear maiden. Oh! watch on;
Pray softly on thy bended knees;
Summer is dying, spring-time dead;
And autumn sighs among the trees;
Yet shines a brighter day than this,
Where song and sunshine melt in one,
And all the world—and all the world
Is but a life begun!

NOTES AND NOTICES.

VASSAR COLLEGE.—Our readers will find an interesting and powerful article in the Book this month entitled "The Two Educations," and recommending that the classical course at Vassar College should be subordinated to the scientific and practical. We do not fully agree with the views of the writer, and may have something to say on the subject. There is one point, however, in which we heartily concur. We hope that the absurd names of Freshman and Sophomore will be banished from the institution. To call a girl a Freshman is truly ridiculous.

AN AMERICAN DOCTRINE OF MEDICINE.—A young American lady, daughter of a New York publisher, some two years ago entered the school of medicine in Paris. Recently she passed an examination with three others, an English lady and two French students. At the close, the verdict was, for the two young men, "Passable," a very low mark; for the English lady a "Bien satisfait," a very high mark indeed, and for the American a "Très satisfait," the highest that is given, and the first time it has been gained this year, 1869.

A VOICE FROM CANADA.—A writer in the Toronto Globe says:—

"The progress which this movement has made in the Old World, especially in conservative Britain, is astonishing. The Universities of London and Edinburgh have recently thrown open their doors without distinction to women as well as men; and at the Universities of Dublin and Glasgow special courses of lectures for their instruction have for some time been delivered. We would like to see the same rights given to women in all our Canadian colleges. They are already conceded in some, but not in those of the highest standing. So convinced, however, is the learned president of one of those colleges of the importance and justice of this concession, that he is endeavoring to throw open the institution to women as well as men. Let it not be said that women are indifferent on this subject. It is not so. Application has already been made by the gentler sex for permission to go up to the matriculation examination of our Provincial University; but, upon what principle of justice we know not, without success. It surely were no perversion or maladministration of the noble endowment of that institution to allow the mothers of the future generation to share the benefits it confers."

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—These articles are accepted: "Watching"—"A Glimpse of Spring"—and "By and By."

These are declined: "Lines"—"Sonnet"—"To my Brother" (we have too much on hand)—"Sunbeams"—"Labor"—"Mother's Prayer"—"Little Maud"—"May-Time"—"A Week in Rome"—"Rain Drops"—"All for Love" (send stamps if you wish it returned)—"To the Bird which sang from an Empty Nest" (the other poem accepted)—and "Mr. Bilberry's Wish."

We have returned the articles of L. O. M.

"Story of a Child." No letter, no stamp.

"Receipts," from Waynesboro, Geo. Pleased to receive them, but there was no letter of explanation accompanying them. Are they offered for publication in LADY'S BOOK, and what is the history of them? Are they old family receipts?

Every MS. must be accompanied with a letter, and stamps to return if desired.

Literary Notices.

From LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

ASKAROS KASSIS THE OOPT. A Romance of Modern Egypt. By Edwin de Leo., late U. S. Consul-General for Egypt. The author of this work has availed himself of the romance and mystery which hang over the Orient to indulge in the wildest license of the imagination. He has made intrigues, abductions, and murders the familiar incidents of the novel. Poison and the stiletto play a prominent part in the story; and being eaten up by a crocodile is one of the mildest means of the author of disposing of an unpleasant character. Nevertheless, the sensational is confined almost exclusively to the incidents. The prominent characters are most of them commonplace enough. The heroine is an American girl who falls in love with a handsome young Oopt, and eventually marries him. The conventional New England spinster figures in the pages; also a snobbish Englishman, the younger son of an English lord, who, through the death of his father and elder brother, finally succeeds to the family title and estates, but who, from first to last is addressed by the somewhat singular title of Sir Charles. There is an exceedingly vicious and cruel viceroy, and a princess, who is not only cruel and vicious, but beautiful and crafty as well. Among the supernumeraries are "hags," slaves, a few Arabian horses, a cobra-di-capello, and a pack of wild dogs.

TRUE LOVE. By Lady Di Beauclerk, author of "A Summer and Winter in Norway." A mildly sentimental and romantic English novel, which was scarcely worth reprinting in this country.

From CLAXTON, REMSEN, & HAFELFINGER, Philadelphia:—

NANNY'S CHRISTMAS. A Story for Children. Next to Christmas itself, we believe little children like to read about Christmas; and this about "Nanny's Christmas" is very prettily written, and very interesting in all its particulars about evergreens and presents.

SLOAN'S ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW AND BUILDERS' JOURNAL. No. 8.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

EOLINE; OR, MAGNOLIA VALE; or, The Heiress of Glenmore. By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz. The Peterson Brothers are issuing a very handsome edition of Mrs. Hentz's works. The present volume is the sixth issued by them.

CHARLES O'MALLEY, the Irish Dragoon. By Charles Lever. This is the initial volume of a new edition of Charles Lever's works, bound in cloth.

From J. P. SKELLY & Co., Philadelphia:—

BEGINNING. By Miss L. Bates, author of "Two Ways of Doing it; or, Evenings with Uncle Ralph," etc. A pleasantly-written and handsomely bound book, pointing out the highest and truest aims in life.

LITTLE JACKIE; or, The Rose Tree. By Rena Ray, author of "Dainty Maurice," etc.

TABITHA TODD; or, Love to do Good. By Rena Ray, author of "Little Jackie," etc.

DAINTY MAURICE; or, Lost in the Woods. By Rena Ray, author of "Tabitha Todd," etc.

These daintily bound juvenile books by the same author, suited for the use of Sunday Schools.

From ALFRED MARTIEN, Philadelphia:—

EDITH VAUGHN'S VICTORY. By Helen Wall Pierson.

A MERE PIECE OF MISCHIEF. By Chas. F. Guernsey.

These are gayly bound little books, suitable for Sunday-School libraries, such as Mr. Martien makes a specialty. Miss Pierson has written several popular little books, and we doubt not this will share their good fortune.

A DOOR OF ESCAPE. By Marion Reeves.

THE SCHOOLBOY HERO. By R. H. Moncrieff.

THE HOSPITAL BOY.

Three more of Martien's excellent books. They are printed in large clear type, and of a size very convenient to carry. All have a religious tendency, and illustrate some lesson of Christianity.

From HENRY C. LEA, Philadelphia:—

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D., assisted by I. Minis Hays, M. D. January, 1870.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., and PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE LIFE OF MARY RUSSELL MITFORD, Authoress of "Our Village," etc. Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. Edited by the Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange. In two volumes. We have read few books of its class more charming than this. It is, in one sense, the inner life of one of England's most highly-gifted and most excellent women—a picture of her thoughts and feelings, of her hopes, aspirations, observations, and experiences. The lover of the exciting will not, it is true, find in it anything to satisfy his appetite; but to those who can appreciate the story of a calm, quiet existence, not altogether without its clouds and sunshine, told in a generally ladylike manner, the book will certainly be a pleasant one. It makes us acquainted with many of the literary celebrities of England a half century ago, and relates many personal anecdotes at once new and entertaining.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By James Orton, M. A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a new Map of Equatorial America, and numerous Illustrations. This is an exceedingly interesting volume, which cannot fail to prove acceptable as well to the general as to the scientific reader. It embodies the experiences and observations of an expedition of scientific gentlemen, made under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institute, which sailed from New York in July, 1867. The general route of the expedition was from Guayaquil on the Pacific coast, to Quito, thence on over the Andes, and down the Amazon and its tributaries to Para, on the Atlantic coast.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By William Godwin, Esq., author of "St. Leon," etc. The present edition of this once popular story seems to have been called for as a consequence of the "Byron Controversy." The character of Falkland, in the unfortunate Caleb's narrative, is generally presumed to be in some respects a representative of Lord Byron.

ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By Annie Thomas (Mrs. Peneu Oudlip), author of "False Colors," etc. A lively and entertaining story, yet one not without its moral, of a woman who thought only of herself, and who consequently was an ungrateful daughter, a heartless coquette, and an unfaithful wife and mother.

T. MAOCCI PLAUTI CAPTIVI, TRINUMMUS, ET RUDENS. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By O. S. Harrington, M. A., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. This volume has been prepared under the impression that works of the class of composition and Latinity it represents ought to have a place in the student's course of classical reading. The three plays forming the text are generally considered the best of their author's comedies. The typographical appearance is excellent. A concise and well-written life of Plautus, prefacing the plays, will add to the student's interest in them.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the author of "Abel Drake's Wife," etc. The latest publication of Harper's "Library of Select Novels."

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

SEARCH FOR WINTER SUNBEAMS IN THE RIVIERA, CORSICA, ALGIERS, AND SPAIN. By Samuel S. Cox, author of "The Buckeye Abroad," etc. This volume—the result of a health trip for "winter sunbeams"—is all that neat typography and binding, abundant and artistic illustrations, and a more than ordinary capacity for graceful, easy, and lively writing can make it. The main object of its author's quest—the restoration of an impaired vitality by means of sunshine, "with its dry, bracing radiance"—having been secured, the book has, aside from its attractions as an extremely pleasant story of travel, principally in Corsica and Spain, two of the least trodden grounds of Europe, the utilitarian merit of being in some sort a guide and encouragement to others with like consumptive tendencies, and who may possibly derive the same benefit from a similar "search for winter sunbeams."

WHAT IS JUDAISM? or, A Few Words to the Jews. By Rev. Raphael D'O. Lervin. Few may be aware that in this country the Jews are divided into two important classes or churches—the Orthodox Jews, who still cling to all the beliefs and traditions of their fathers, and observe all their religious rites and ceremonies; and the Reformed Jews, who are half-convinced that the world has outgrown the Jewish faith and practices. Doctor Lervin is the champion of the latter party, and his volume will, no doubt, possess much interest, not only to the Jews themselves, but to theologians generally, as marking the progress of the times.

THE CONFESSIONS OF FITZ-BOODLE, and Some Passages in the Life of Major Gahagan. By Wm. M. Thackeray. A volume belonging to Appleton's cheap edition of Thackeray's works.

MRS. GERALD'S NIECE. A Novel. By Lady Georgiana Fullerton, author of "Too Strange not to be True," etc.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part No. 10. Price 50 cents.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—
THE EARLIER YEARS OF OUR LORD'S

LIFE ON EARTH. By the Rev. William Hanna, D. D., LL. D. Dr. Hanna has published a new Life of Christ which has met with high praise from no less an authority than the North British Review. This is the first of the five volumes which compose his work. It goes down to the first circuit of Gallilee. Dr. Hanna has had the advantage of a tour through Palestine, and his descriptions have a fidelity and local color resembling Dean Stanley's.

From G. P. PUTNAM & SON, New York:—

THE BRYANT HOMESTEAD BOOK. By the Idle Scholar. This sumptuous volume is a collection of details concerning the life and habits of the poet Bryant, written evidently by an ardent admirer of our great American poet. The publishers have evidently done their best; in paper, printing, and binding there is nothing wanting. The illustrations are in the best style of work. The photograph at the beginning and the etching which represents Bryant as a journalist are likenesses of him which we think every admirer of his genius will long to possess, and the sketches scattered through the book are exquisite. We have rarely seen so handsome a specimen of book-making.

From the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY AND PUBLICATION HOUSE, New York:—

TEMPERANCE ANECDOTES, Original and Selected. By George W. Bungay. "This little volume," says its compiler, "has been prepared for the entertainment of the friends of temperance, with the hope that it may contribute to the advancement of the temperance reform. It embraces a great number of the happiest anecdotes used by our most distinguished advocates of temperance, and many new ones, which have never been published until now."

A BIOGRAPHICAL HISTORY OF CLERMONT; or, Livingston Manor. Before and During the War for Independence, with a Sketch of the First Steam Navigation of Fulton and Livingston. By Thomas Streetfield Clarkson. Published for, and in the hands only of, subscribers. As a contribution to our national history, this account of the Livingston family, so intimately and so prominently connected with our annals, is deserving of especial notice. It is illustrated with photographs of the old Livingston mansion—Clermont—of Judge Robert R. Livingston; of his son, the friend of Fulton, and the first chancellor of New York. We are informed that copies of the work may be obtained of T. S. Clarkson, Tivoli, N. Y.

From NICHOLS & HALL, Boston:—

FLORA'S INTERPRETER AND FORTUNA FLORA. By Mrs. Hale. This book was published in 1831, and has had since then a steady and increasing circulation. From a letter to the editress we quote: "Flora's Interpreter" still keeps its place, in spite of its many rivals. All of them that I have seen are far inferior to it both in plan and execution."

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE OVERLAND ROUTE TO THE PACIFIC. A Report on the Condition, Capacity, and Resources of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways. By E. H. Derby, of Boston.

REVIEWS AND PAMPHLETS.

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF INSANITY: January, 1870. A peculiarly interesting number of the Journal. The article called "Capax or Incapax," and the report of Judge Ludlow's decision, will command the attention of readers.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY CHURCH REVIEW: January, 1870.

A NEW YEAR ANTHEM. By Stephen W. Downey.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

APRIL, 1870.

APRIL has come, and with it we present our friends with a steel-plate illustrative of spring-time. We cannot look around us without being reminded of our picture. The unfolding of the leaves and the flowers, the beauty of the landscape, the fragrant breath of the morning, and the serene twilight of the evening should inspire us with feelings of gratitude for the blessings of the Great Ruler. The scene presented in our plate exhibits youth imbued into new life, busily engaged in gathering flowers that will cheer and shed a fragrance around their homes. May their lives be always a happy spring-time.

"An April Fright" is one of our usual extra wood-cuts. The picture explains itself.

A fashion-plate, embroidery sheet, and extension-plate, with a numerous quantity of styles suitable for all ages also grace this number.

We ought to have published the following ere this, but we had a merry Christmas, and we hope for a continuation of a happy year. Our subscribers have added much to our happiness by the way they have subscribed for their favorite old book. We copy the following from the Expositor, Greenville, N. C.:

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The December number of this unprecedented periodical is before us, rich in beauty, grace, and fashion. We will not pause to enumerate its varied contents, for we wish to have a little chat with dear old GODEY. Do you know, dear Mr. Godey, that the first remembrance of our childhood is of a lovely young mother with your beautiful book upon her lap, pointing out its matchless engravings to our enchanted vision! Twenty years have passed since then, and now a little five-year old darling stands beside us, and clasps her tiny hands in extatic admiration of your book. And in all of these years your dear, delightful book has been growing better and better. No one has served the public more faithfully than has Louis A. Godey for forty years. May you have a merry Christmas and a glad New Year, with fifty returns of the same.

RICHARD GODEY.—Some one, assuming this very respectable name, has been trying to swindle the inhabitants of Napoleonville, La. He claims a relationship. We don't know Richard, and have no relative of that name. Richard is a bad fellow, and we should be sorry to own him. We have no agents for the LADY'S BOOK.

WASHBURN & Co.'s "Amateur Cultivator's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden," an excellent work, and the best illustrated colored engravings we have ever seen in a work of this kind. Washburn & Co., Boston, Mass.

We quote from the McLeansboro Times, who says:—"And we would simply repeat what a leading New York Journal says of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK. No other magazine in the country performs the mission of advancing domestic happiness as does this old favorite."

We believe this truly, for we know that that has been our aim.

LITERARY POISONS.

We fully agree with the remarks of the editor of the Evening Bulletin, quoted below, and give them a place in our columns, knowing that the circulation they will obtain throughout the country will have the effect of inciting the people to devise some means of breaking up the sale of these corrupt papers.

"It will be conducive to improvement in the moral health of the community if some means be adopted to suppress the obscene newspapers with which the city is flooded. New York, the source of most of the filthiest immorality with which the country is afflicted, sends to this city every week thousands of copies of each of five or six flash picture papers, which are devoted to glorification of vice, to illustration of scenes of debauchery and crime, and to lewd representations of the human figure. These sheets are exposed to view in shop windows and upon newspaper stands, and they are studied with absorbing interest, not only by grown persons, but by children of both sexes and all ages. These newspapers pollute the minds of innocent children by revealing to them knowledge of wickedness which older people too often find to be a dangerous kind of wisdom. And this source of corruption is not pent up in narrow boundaries. In a great, broad stream of defilement, it pours across the land, seeking the light of day, disregarding the barriers of the law, carrying its foulness into every household, and creating demoralization, the consequences of which will be seen when the victims arrive at mature years. Every decent and intelligent man has perceived this evil, and deplored its existence, but nobody has thought it worth while to undertake its abatement. It will hardly be claimed for these periodicals that they serve any useful purpose. They are wantonly indecent, and they are issued simply in answer to a demand, which is well known to exist in every community, for impure literature and indecent pictures. But, if the present laws are not sufficient to prevent the sale of these papers, the sooner we have some that are effective the better. There will be no hardship or injustice done in breaking up the trade in this vicious stuff and punishing the offenders. The men who publish it and sell it are trafficking in the purity and virtue of the community, and accumulating wealth from the horrible business. Society has a right to prevent such assaults upon the very foundation of its structure. If it may punish the man who picks a pocket or robs a house, surely it may inflict some penalty upon the literary Fagins who not only teach youth to become pickpockets and burglars, by glorifying crimes of this character, but who present the foulest and most dangerous vices in alluring forms. We recommend this subject to the mayor; and if he finds, upon trial, that the existing laws offer no remedy, we will call upon the legislature to take some special action to meet the demands of the case."

The study of every man should be to see that the minds of those brought within his special influence should have a healthy atmosphere to live in. He should know that the placing of impure literature within their reach is apt to create impressions that affect them throughout life. There is a kind of sensational literature in the community that has been for several years gaining a hold in the minds of the youth of both sexes. The characters depicted in this class of stories are generally bad; but the incidents are woven in the form of an attractive romance, which serves to make the sins and crimes of the hero and heroine appear as virtues to those who become fascinated by the story. A great wrong is done by the publishers of these works. The evil is witnessed to-day in the issue of a far worse kind of literature—the obscene publications spoken of by our neighbor of the Bulletin. It is our belief that the immense sale of these papers is due to the want of a proper training of the young with respect to what they should be allowed to read. Banish, then, from your homes every book and paper that fails to implant in the mind a moral germ that will bloom, and blossom, and clothe itself with beauty.

BENSON J. LOSSING.—An author we have great respect for, and we like the man. He is one whose name will live as long as the country. The following are some of his works: "Field Book of the Revolution," "History of the War of 1812," "History of the Late War," "Views on the Hudson from its Rise to its Fall," "Mount Vernon Illustrated," "History of Vassar College." All these works are historical. All the places represented in this country Mr. Lossing has personally visited. The drawings are made by himself, and each work is a text book for reference. The engravings cannot be excelled, if equalled, in any country. His last work, "History of Vassar College," we pronounce the finest specimen of typography and engraving ever produced in America. The engravings on wood are difficult to distinguish from the finest engravings on steel. His works on the wars should be in every library, not only for their usefulness, but their beauty.

The Rockport Journal says what every editor must feel:—

"On receipt of $2 50 from any reader of the Democrat, we will furnish a copy of the above magazine for one year. We had rather do this than lend ours. Now is the time to send clubs for the new volume."

The editor of the Journal is willing to sacrifice fifty cents to save his own copy. We suppose if an editor will not lend his subscribers his literary exchanges, the cry will be, "Stop my paper!" It is a shame to thus impose upon editors; but it is cheap. You pay $2 for your paper, and get the reading of $20 worth of exchanges.

We find the following going the rounds of the press:—

"During his visit to England, several years ago, Senator Cameron was invited to the House of Lords, and was given a seat at the foot of the throne, which is considered a great honor in monarchical countries."

How one may live and learn! We did not know that when ourself and companion, when on a visit to the House of Lords, were placed precisely in the same seat that it was a great honor. Having now found it out, we return our thanks for the great honor conferred upon us. The fact is, there is no other place to seat you.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY for April.—Every lover of music should send for this beautiful number. The leading feature is a fine quartette covering nine pages of sheet music, composed expressly for the Monthly by Maurice D. Jones. It is called Jesus Lover of my Soul, and contains Solos and Duets for Soprano and Tenor, and two quartettes for mixed voices. This piece alone when published in sheet music will cost 75 cents. Besides this we give in the same number four other pieces of new music, vocal and instrumental, for the Piano, by popular composers. One of the pieces is especially beautiful, the Lyda Polka, by Wilse Richtmyer. To the yearly subscriber all this music costs but 33 cents, or $4 per annum. Single numbers 40 cents, or we will send the last three numbers on receipt of $1 and nine cents in stamps for postage. We hope that every one not familiar with the Monthly as it is now, will try at least three numbers. As the January and February numbers are nearly exhausted, those wishing the year complete should subscribe at once. Address J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

THAT'S IT!—And that is what we are proud of:—

Godey is a universal favorite with people of cultivated taste. The number for February is very rich and beautiful.—State A. with Jackson, Mo.

BREBAN'S INTEREST TABLES.—This work is probably the most complete Interest Table in the world. The correctness of the work is testified to by the President and Treasurer of the Philadelphia Saving Fund, President and Treasurer of the Western Saving Fund, the Secretary of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, by Meyers, Claghorn, & Co., Carson & Newbold, Furness, Brinley, & Co., The Secretary of the Equitable Life Insurance Company, and by most of the institutes and merchants of this city. The Evening Bulletin says: "We are satisfied that it is the best work of the kind yet published, and calculated to do away with the use of all others. The rate of interest may be extended indefinitely, and the amount ascertained with no trouble whatever. It will prove a very great assistant to all business men, and we heartily recommend it. The tables are beautifully printed and bound in a very handsome and convenient volume." We anticipate for this work—which the best authority has already pronounced comprehensive and accurate, and yet simple and easy to consult—a wide circulation among men in every department in business requiring prompt and reliable calculation of interest. We will send a copy on receipt of $4.

The Smyrna Times is emphatic:—

"There is not a department in which women of any class can possess an interest, be it useful or ornamental, that he has not devoted his pages to. There is an originality and gracefulness in every issue that goes far to place it above other publications of a similar character."

A GOOD RULE.—A man who is very rich now was very poor when a boy. When asked how he got his riches, he replied: "My father taught me never to play till my work was finished, and never to spend my money until I had earned it. If I had but an hour's work in a day, I must do that the first thing, and in a hour. And after that I was allowed to play; and then I could play with much more pleasure than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind. I early formed the habit of doing everything in time, and it soon became perfectly easy to do so. It is to this I owe my prosperity."

"BREAD CAST UPON THE WATERS."—If the Great Providence has not literally cast bread upon the waters, He has planted the elements of wholesome nourishment on the rocks, in the shape of Sea Moss, from which the SEA MOSS FARINE is made. This new article has everywhere won "golden opinions of all sorts of people," and the housekeepers of the land generally regard it in the double light of a staple necessary and a delicious luxury; for while its use lessens the expense of living, the exquisite dishes prepared from it cannot be obtained even at an extravagant cost, from any other source. Scientific committees, hotel keepers, professional cooks, ladies who superintend their own kitchens, physicians, nurses, dyspeptics and invalids of every class bear witness of these facts. To this mass of indorsements we unhesitatingly add our own; and, without fear of contradiction, say that the blanc mange, puddings, custards, etc., are the most delicious we have ever tasted.

WE are sorry we cannot comply with the request of the writer. We give the conclusion of her letter:—

BUFFALO.

DEAR MR. GODEY: Please excuse one that has taken most of the modern magazines, but finds nothing to compare with Godey's in fashion-plates, embroidery patterns, and last, but not least, reading matter: it is a rare thing to read a story in Godey's that is not in every sense good. A SUBSCRIBER.

We have received from Mrs. J. Hamilton Thomas, No. 1344 Chestnut Street, a beautiful picture, which commends itself to all. It is entitled "The Home Above."

"Thy Father's House! Thine own bright home!
And thou hast there a place for me,
Though yet an exile here I roam,
That distant home by faith I see!"

A woman clinging to a cross is the subject of the picture. It is well-executed, and of a good size for framing.

FIRST LOVE.—Ask a very young lady what she thinks of first love, and she will tell you that it is the quintessence of all that is ecstatic, compared with which any so-called love that may come after it, must be as sky-blue skimmed milk to clotted cream. Put the same question to an enamored young gentleman of eighteen, and he will vow that it is the Ullquot champagne of human existence, to which all subsequent emotions dignified with the name of love, are mere cider. But the nature of both sexes, in nine cases out of ten, can tell a different story. Boy-and-girl love is but a faint shadow of the intense passion which often overcomes and enthralles the middle-aged. The capacity for loving is not fully developed in the young miss who has just cast aside her doll, nor in the youth whose chin is but newly acquainted with a razor. The enthusiasm in these novices in the tender passion is generally evanescent. Of course there are exceptional cases; but, as a general rule, love does not take firm root in the heart before the age of twenty-five. Professions of undying devotion from young men of nineteen and twenty are not to be trusted. The question which a lady who receives an offer of marriage should consider, is not merely whether she has won the affections of her admirer, but also whether, if won, she can keep them. To have and to hold, are two things.

True words if ever true words were spoken, and we thank the editor of the Brownstown Banner for the truism:—

"GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is in its fortieth year, and it is forty years a-head of any lady's magazine in the country."

FRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—These chromos are the exact copies of originals, some of them of great value. To those whose tastes appreciate the beautiful in art, and who cannot afford the expense of a fine oil painting, an opportunity is here presented of forming a home gallery of choice pictures at a low price. L. Prang & Co., Boston, Mass., have just completed a new picture composed of forty-three impressions from as many colored stories. It is entitled "A Family Scene in Pompeii," and represents the interior of a Pompeian house, wherein a mother is looking with sympathy on her grieved child, whose broken toy lies on the mosaic floor. The rich coloring of the walls, the character and arrangement of the furniture, the dress and ornaments of the woman, and the whole details of the picture are historically accurate. There appears to be no limit to the number of fine pictures that have been presented to the public by Mr. Prang since the introduction of this beautiful art.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK has not only the widest circulation in this country, but probably a larger circulation on the continent of Europe and South America than any other magazine. On our late visit to Europe, we found we were nearly as well known as we were in this country.

SMALL DEBTS.—If we were asked what single act, involving no personal loss, would bring the greatest good to the largest number, we would answer, without hesitation: "Pay your small debts."

There is a large class in the community who, though possessed of ample means, are habitually slow in paying their small trade accounts, who could pay just as well at one time as another, but who fail to consider what great benefit would result from the simple act of justice or paying a small bill. To such the week's journey of a five dollar note would be an instructive lesson. Start it where you will—with the pastor, the physician, the baker, the butcher, the grocer, or shoemaker, or coal merchant—it will be the partial means of paying fifty debts, and gladdening fifty hearts in a week.

Few people have the same opportunity of doing good by geometrical progression as those who owe small accounts. Much misery and suffering are alleviated among the very poor by charity; but there is a middle class, who are able and willing to work, who must work, to whom begging is the alternative next to starvation, and whom charity does not reach. We refer to the careful, painstaking tradespeople—men, women, and children—of our cities and towns. They are not found in processions of strikers, have no political sins to atone for, and are "content with their wages." Let employers remember that it is not only an act of justice to pay them, but to employ them, and that while their honest pride and buoyant hope of better days alike scorn asking or receiving alms, both their inclination and necessity plead for work and pay.

A NEW IDEA.—It occurred in New York:—

"An officer of the Twenty-first precinct this afternoon met a man with a pair of handcuffs on. Thinking that he was an escaped prisoner he took him to the station-house, where his wife called soon afterwards. She stated she had placed the handcuffs on her husband because he was about to go on a 'spreed,' and that she always made a habit of thus handcuffing him whenever she saw premonitions of the periodical blowouts."

VERY TRUE.—Whoever, having learned in school to read Racine and Corneille, or having mastered the exercises in Ollendorf, imagines that he is acquainted with the French language, finds how woefully he is mistaken the moment he lands on the shores of France. He can perhaps read the French newspaper. He can make his wants known to the French inn-keeper. But he is startled by the discovery that in order to conversation, it is essential that one should be able to receive as to communicate ideas. He can express himself tolerably well, but he can by no possibility understand anything that is said to him. The more perplexed he is the more excitable grows the Frenchman, in the vain endeavor to explain a short and simple sentence by long and complicated ones. To learn what ideas certain appearances on a printed page convey is one thing; to learn what ideas certain sounds convey is quite another thing. Even if the traveller has exercised himself in translating the spoken as well as the written word, he is still at a loss; for it is impossible for him to go through the double mental process required in first converting the Frenchman's words into English, and then from the translated phrase receiving the Frenchman's idea. In other words, no one has learned a language until he has learned to think in it. The words must convey not other words, but ideas; not ideas through the medium of other words, but directly.

I MUST say there is no other magazine in America that enchants me like the LADY'S BOOK. B. T.

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

ORNAMENTAL flower beds and designs are becoming so popular, that it may not be inappropriate to furnish a few suggestions. Beds cut out in the grass of various patterns and planted with masses of ornamental foliage plants, or flowering plants in alternate colors, produce a charming effect. This style of gardening is carried out on the most extensive scale in the parks and gardens of London and Paris. The following plants are extensively grown and used for this purpose: Among ornamental foliage plants, the varieties of Achyranthus, Alternanthera, Centaurea, Canna, Coleus, Golden Feather, and the new and beautiful Abutilon Thompsonii, with variegated foliage, Echeverias, Gnaphalium, etc.; among flowering plants, Geraniums, Lobelia, Heliotrope, Lantana, Petunia, Verbena, etc. For sub-tropical effect, Caladiums, Colocasia, Acanthus, Ricinus, Solanums, Japanese Maize. Beautiful effects can also be produced by many of the Annuals, grown from seed, such as Alyssum, Candytuft, for white; Double Scarlet Zinnia, Linum, Phlox Drummondii, for scarlet; Dwarf Marigold, Tagetes Signata pumila, for yellow; Nemophila insignis; Lobelia, and Dwarf Convolvulus, for blue. We have added many new and rare plants and seeds to our collection during our recent visit to Europe, all of which will be found in Dreer's Garden Calendar for 1870, second edition, which also contains a beautiful colored plate of the new Golden Coleus, so popular in Europe, also a colored plate of Ornamental Flower-beds. A copy of which will be mailed to all who inclose ten cents to my address. Our Ten dollar collection of Plants, packed and forwarded by express, contains 100 choice plants and flowering roots. We also send 100 choice varieties of flower seeds for five dollars by mail. Address,

HENRY A. DREER, Seedsman and Florist,
714 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HUSBAND—"Carriage, my dear girl! Consider the expense! I don't see how we can afford it."

Wife—"But, George, dear, Mr. Smith keeps a brougham for his wife."

Husband ("with his logic")—"But she's his second wife, recollect, my dear."

[For the life of her, at that moment, she could not see the bearings of this argument, so she dropped the subject.]

We trust she has seen it by this time. It is an old story that the second wife generally fares best.

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.—Apply to your postmaster for a postal money order. No more losses by mail.

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge shall be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

THE HISTORY OF A HATCHET.—Mr. George Smouse of Waldoboro', Maine, has a hatchet that was used by an Indian in an attack made on the Dutch settlers in that town soon after their settlement in 1749. An Indian approached Mr. Smouse's grandfather and struck the hatchet through his skull, and for some unknown cause left it there, where it was found by his neighbors still sticking in his brain. The hatchet has been preserved in the family. It is an elegant argument, and was used by some chief.

THAT man Childs, of the Philadelphia Ledger, has again been discovered in carrying out one of those nefarious plots which are making his name a household word throughout the country. This time he has had the cruelty to send off to Europe Mr. Richards Muckie, who for thirty-five years has been cashier of the Ledger establishment. Regardless of poor Muckie's feelings, he coolly said to him one day: "Here is an unlimited letter of credit from Drexel & Co.; use as much of it as you want, for all I ask of you is to make the six months you spend abroad as delightful as possible. Don't let want of money deter you from seeing anything, from refusing the best bottle of wine, or from denying yourself the rarest dish." What will this stony-hearted publisher do next?—New York Paper.

We met Muckie in Europe, and he did not appear to be dying of grief, nor was he even a prey to melancholy. And, to the best of our belief, he was fully carrying out Mr. Childs' invitation touching the "rare dish" and the "best bottle of wine." He not only did not refuse the wine, but we think in not a few instances he bought it. There is no better man than Muckie, nor one who could better enjoy and not abuse the confidence of a "stony-hearted publisher."

Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON:

ON the 7th day of August, 1857, I purchased one of your Sewing Machines, which has been used from that day to this almost incessantly. I do not recollect any day except Sundays in which some work has not been done upon it. By far the greater part of the time it has been run from 7 o'clock in the morning until 10, 11, and often until 12 o'clock at night. It has never cost one cent for repairs, and is to-day in as complete working order as the day I bought it. I would not exchange it for a new machine of any other kind. HARRIET A. BELLOWES.

A HINT to those who buy subscribers with premiums. A paper in England advertises to give a bull-terrier male pup for the largest list of subscribers from one county.

BEAVER BRAND MOHAIR.—This article our women folk pronounce the most useful and beautiful material for ladies' dresses to be found in the country, and we have great confidence in their judgment. It is pure black mohair, of the richest lustre, as fine as silk, and will wear out six dresses of other flimsy articles. It is cheap and durable. Inquire for it at your mercer's, and don't be put off with anything but the Beaver Brand. The "Buffalo Brand" Alpaca is another article which we can also strongly recommend. A fashion article from a New York paper says:—

"The 'Buffalo Brand' Black Alpaca, which has gained such a wide and well deserved reputation all over the country, is becoming more and more fashionable every day. We have carefully examined these goods, and can testify and speak from experience of their durability, and for ladies' wear, have no equal in the market. They look well to the last."

These goods are greatly needed for the spring and summer wear, being of the richest and purest shade of fast black, and made of the very finest material; they are absolutely superior to any alpacas ever sold in this country, and are now one of the most fashionable and economical fabrics worn. W. I. Peake & Co. are the agents, 46, 48, and 50 White Street, New York; but they are sold by the leading dry goods merchants in all the principal towns and cities of the United States.

A CORRESPONDENT says:—"By the way, touching waterproofs, I think I can give travellers a valuable hint or two. For many years I have worn India-rubber waterproofs, but I will buy no more, for I have learned that good Scottish tweed can be made completely impervious to rain, and, moreover, I have learned how to make it so; and, for the benefit of my readers, I will here give the receipt: In a bucket of soft water put half a pound of sugar of lead and half a pound of powdered alum: stir this at intervals until it becomes clear; then pour it off into another bucket, and put the garment therein, and let it be in for twenty-four hours, and then hang it up to dry without wringing it. Two of my party—a lady and gentleman—have worn garments thus treated in the wildest storm of wind and rain without getting wet. The rain hangs upon the cloth in globules. In short, they are really waterproof. The gentleman, a fortnight ago, walked nine miles in a storm of rain and wind such as you rarely see; and when he slipped off his overcoat, his underclothes were as dry as when he put them on. This is, I think, a secret worth knowing; for cloth, if it can be made to keep out wet, is in every way better than what we know as waterproofs."

SOME very awkward revelations have just transpired before the Orleans tribunal. It appears that a few years ago a sister-in-law of Queen Isabella II. of Spain arrived unexpectedly at Orleans. The prefect, overjoyed at the circumstance, placed his mansion at the royal visitor's service, and hastily contrived a banquet to celebrate the auspicious event. One circumstance only prevented the distinguished guest from accepting the proffered honor. She had left home suddenly, and had not brought any diamonds with her, without which appearance in public was impossible. "If that is all," said the enthusiastic prefect, "we can easily arrange that." A jeweller was found on the spot ready to lend the required ornaments, and the banquet took place, graced by the presence of the Infanta. Unfortunately, however, the princess took her departure suddenly from Orleans, and forgot either to pay the jeweller for the loan of the gems or to return them. In vain has the too confiding tradesman urged his claim in divers places. After numberless failures, he bethought himself lately of summoning the Minister of the Interior, Queen Isabella, and the Infanta, before the Orleans tribunal, and he is intensely disconcerted at the decision that the only person responsible for the debt is the Infanta herself. The well-known pecuniary embarrassment of the Infanta's husband renders the liquidation of the debt of the utmost improbability.

PUT NOT YOUR TRUST IN LORDS.—It is doubtful if ever the young ladies of metropolitan upper ten-dome of New York will give up their ambition to win a titled husband. During the last ten years the bogus lords, who have succeeded in deceiving some of our fair but foolish butterflies of society into a hasty marriage to be repented of at leisure, have been altogether too many. The latest deceit in this lordly way is that of a young lord, who last night ran away from his wife, not forgetting to take her diamonds, and watch, and a few other valuables. The unhappy girl, whom the fellow married, is beautiful, and her widowed mother is rich.

The impostor was the son of an English livery stable keeper. He was once valet to a French nobleman in Paris, won a few hundred pounds by gambling, came to this country, and captured a foolish girl who was dazzled by his assumed title of "lord." Before the marriage took place, the girl's mother sent a gentleman to Europe to find out about the "lord's" genealogy, and he discovered the impostor's whole villainy. The daughter was informed of the discovery, but clung to the man through all. She is now suffering from brain fever, and is not expected to live.

TRANSPOSITION.—Every student of nouns, pronouns, and verbs, knows the necessity of transposing language for the sake of ascertaining its grammatical construction. The following shows twenty-seven different readings of one of Gray's well known poetical lines, yet the sense is not affected:—

The weary ploughman plods his homeward way,
The ploughman, weary, plods his homeward way,
His homeward way the weary ploughman plods,
His homeward way the ploughman weary plods,
The weary ploughman homeward plods his way,
The ploughman, weary, homeward plods his way,
His way, the weary ploughman homeward plods,
His way, the ploughman, weary, homeward plods,
The ploughman, homeward, plods his weary way,
His way the ploughman, homeward, weary plods,
His homeward weary way the ploughman plods,
Weary, the ploughman homeward plods his way,
Weary, the ploughman plods his homeward way,
Homeward, his way the weary ploughman plods,
Homeward, his way the ploughman, weary, plods,
Homeward, his weary way, the ploughman plods,
The ploughman, homeward, weary plods his way,
The ploughman, weary, homeward plods his way,
His weary way, the ploughman homeward plods,
His weary way, the homeward ploughman plods,
Homeward the ploughman plods his weary way,
Homeward the weary ploughman plods his way,
The ploughman, weary, his way homeward plods,
The ploughman plods his homeward weary way,
The ploughman plods his weary homeward way,
Weary the ploughman his way homeward plods,
Weary, his homeward way the ploughman plods.

THE Chinese are a queer people. Many of them have gone to Texas for the purpose of working on the Pacific Railway of that State, before entering into the contract of hiring, they insisted that a Chinese store should be established near the place of labor. The articles of agreement provide for the establishment of this store, and contain an inventory of the stock that must be laid in. Some of the items, and the quantity to be purchased, are as follows: 5000 quires Chinese visiting card paper; 10 pairs crape suspenders; 10 boxes foo chuck, or bean curd sticks; 50 pounds orange-peel; 100 pounds pak ko; 50 pounds sugar candy; 2000 pounds salt shrimps; 50,000 fire crackers; 40 sets chop sticks and bowls; Jos paper and Jos sticks; 55 pounds dried oysters; 10,000 Chinese cigars; 50 pieces of silk cord, for queue strings; any quantity of salt fish, salt olives, preserved olives, peas, betel nuts, limes, dried melons, dates, mellone, kim quat, crambolo, and peppermint oil.

"A FRIEND" IN NEED FOR THE EMPEROR.—A Paris correspondent tells the following odd story:—

"The other day my servant brought me in a card and a letter of introduction. On the former was engraved Mr. Henry Wiggleton, C— Terrace, Hyde Park. On opening the letter, I found that a mutual friend particularly recommended the bearer as 'a good fellow; but don't let him bother you.' 'Show the gentleman in, John,' said I. There he was, that good-natured, round pink face, with silvery hair, round head, and round body—a sort of Mr. Pickwick's elder brother. What a kind, benevolent expression compared with—. But, never mind, no country but England can produce a John Bull. 'Glad to meet you, Mr. M—. Had some trouble in making out your street; perhaps the coachman was not a Frenchman.' 'Pray be seated, Mr. Wiggleton. You are over here on business, I see. Pray what can I do for you? I hope it is not anything about the Channel passage?' 'Oh! no—no—non-sense. Channel passage; I have something in hand very much more serious than that. Now, look here, Mr. M— (the round, smiling face was trying to look solemn), 'I have always had a great respect, the highest opinion, of your emperor. He's a great man. I used to see him when he was in London going into Gore House, and I recollect saying to poor Crawley: 'He'll be a great man some day.' I stood so near his majesty at the Great Exhibition that I could have touched him.' 'Well, sir, pray proceed.' 'Quite correct—yes—oh!—well—I have a little favor to ask you, Mr. M—. I need not remind you (dare say you know more than I do, so far as that goes), but the truth is, Napoleon Bonaparte is in a terrible mess—I say a threatening difficulty—about his chambers and ministers. Well, he has to get out of it. I've always liked the emperor. I never spoke to his majesty in my life; but somehow I'd do him a good turn if I could. I've got a plan in my head; I could get him out of all his political troubles in twelve hours—I could. Dare say it has never struck him, but I could.' 'Well, sir, and what then?' 'I want, between you and me, to get an interview with the emperor. I know he would see me; he is such a sagacious man. I should speak my mind; I should tell his majesty just what I think. Now, how can I get at him?' 'As this interrogation is not a new one, I was prepared with an answer; but I appeared to think a little before I said: 'I should recommend you to get a letter from Lord Clarendon to Lord Lyons; that appears to me to be the first step. But do you think it is worth while to trouble yourself to give the emperor political advice?' 'Worth while? Yes. If I could do Louis Napoleon a good turn I would. I want him to be happy and out of the Parliamentary muddle he is in. He's a good fellow; did away with passports.' 'Really, I have no other advice.' 'But, Mr. M—, I want to see the emperor on Thursday at the latest. I must be in London on Friday.' Here Mr. Wiggleton took out of his pocket a letter, and, opening the same, placed it before me. 'There, sir, you're a married man, I believe; be kind enough to read that.'

"I obeyed, Mr. W. watching my countenance very searchingly as I read, 'Now, Henry, dear, I tell you what it is, if you do not come away from Paris before the end of the week, I'll run over and fetch you.' Here I observed W.'s little eyes blink and his good-natured, laughing mouth grow rigid. I read on: 'What can you be doing in bad Paris? How can you be such a fool as to suppose that the emperor will see you? Eliza is looking very pale, and Doctor Thornton says that she requires great care. All sorts of fevers are flying about; and we have seen two queer-looking, suspicious men hanging round our house. I am not at all well myself. If you see any good Lyons silk dresses, very pretty and new, buy me one. B. has been wanting to borrow money. He has given me such a description of Paris. Why, my dear, you might be mixed up in a revolution any day and be shot. There are other reasons why I want you to return. I'm unhappy; I'm far from well; I feel afraid. Besides, we're within a day or two of the end of the world, if dear Dr. C—'s prophecy comes true, and I should not like to be alone in the house on such an awful occasion. Remember, Henry, my gloves are No. 84. Now, don't make yourself ridiculous at Meurice's Hotel, where we are known, and come home immediately—Your affectionate Debora.'

"I folded up the letter and returned it to Mr. W., observing that I thought he could not do better than return to London without delay. But it is not so easy to get rid of a man who wants to have a chat with the emperor. It took me nearly half an hour to arrange that he should go home to Meurice's Hotel, and write a letter to his Imperial Majesty, Napoleon III., Tuilleries. I am to know instantly if his majesty sends for Mr. W."

DEAR GODEY: It is thirty years since I commenced housekeeping, with GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK as an assistant. I have found the Book useful in every department of domestic economy.

MRS. J. H. T., N. Y.

WE deem it proper to give place to the following from the Easton, Pa., Free Press, as it is not only a compliment to the teacher but also to the scholars:—

"We heard of an incident concerning the alarm at the school building the other day, which so well illustrated the noble part of human nature that we give it publication. In one of the schools there is a young girl who is a cripple. It is the custom of the teacher to allow her, when the scholars are dismissed, always to pass out first, in order that she may escape from the confusion attendant upon the dismissal of so many children. On Monday last, when the alarm of fire was sounded, all the school-rooms were at once emptied of their contents. While in all of them they rushed out in dismay and fright, in some cases leaving everything behind, in the one where the lame child was there was perfect quietness and order. All the scholars, notwithstanding the noise and apparent danger, remained quietly in their seats till their lame companion had gotten safely out, and was secure from the rush, when they with a bound cleared the room. They thought of her safety before their own; neither fright nor selfishness induced them to provide for themselves until they saw her secure from peril. Such a display of consideration and kindness we have not heard of for many a day, and, when we remember that it came from children, it becomes all the more touching and beautiful."

AMERICAN LITERARY GAZETTE, published by Geo. W. Childs, Philadelphia. How useful this work must be to book publishers we can imagine, and we know that they cannot do without it. To us it is valuable for its English and French correspondence. We appreciate them.

A FRENCH paper mentions an incident which caused a good deal of amusement at the Paris criminal court lately. M. X—, a prominent advocate of the French bar, was walking in the Tuilleries gardens. A girl of about sixteen or seventeen accosted him, and begged him to direct her to the Rue du Bac. The gallant advocate, struck by the damsel's pretty face, showed her the way himself, chatting as they went along. Arriving at the terrace near the Pont Royal, the young lady thanked M. X— for his politeness, and then ran at a smart pace over the bridge. The advocate a minute afterwards perceived that his watch and chain had vanished. However, the best part of the story is to come. The next day M. X— met the adventuress on the boulevard, and gave her in charge at once. It transpires that the sharp-witted damsel, having learned meanwhile that she had operated upon a celebrated advocate, has found out his name and address, and retained him to conduct her defence for the theft. The question whether M. X— is legally entitled to refuse the brief is warmly debated in Parisian legal circles.

By way of novelty, some inquiring minds have just discovered a relationship between the Empress of the French and Robinson Crusoe! Certainly one's mind fails to seize any trait of resemblance existing between the august and elegant mistress of the Tuilleries and the man of many adventures generally presented to our imaginations through the medium of a conical hat, a palm-leaf umbrella, and a parrot; but it seems that the Dumfries man named Selkirk, from whom both Daniel Defoe and Saintine in his book called "Seul," derive their Robinson Crusoe, belongs decidedly to the Scottish families to which the Empress is closely related; and so you see we must believe it.

SUBURBAN RESIDENCE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 436 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

THIS ornamental suburban residence was designed for Mrs. Fahnestock, and it is to be built nine miles from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. It will take part in beautifying this already highly-improved locality. There is no risk of ugliness when we make the detail drawings for our designs, as almost every locality over this vast country fully proves; and the amount of patronage we receive from the districts in which our designs have been used fully attests their merits.

The difficulty that formerly existed of a want of knowledge and appreciation of good proportion is being fast removed. Few persons heretofore have been able to discriminate between good building and the design, or to know how much beauty and grace should be obtained from a given quantity of material and labor; the credit lying in the one case with the architect, and in the other with the mechanic. If a mass of enrichments were placed in a museum, taken in the light of the intention they would afford pleasure to the most cultivated connoisseur, and they would convey the same idea as a library of literary works, each object being a distinct subject for contemplation. But a homogeneous mixture or medley kind of work in an architectural design will not do, for, when the thought is one to live a century or more, how different must be our handling of the ornaments, and the adjustment of quantities; every point must be well considered. Styles may change, fashions grow out of date, different ideas become more prevalent, but common sense and proper adjustments can never be disregarded while civilization exists. In this country we want original designs, guided by principles that admit of no failure. Too much memorizing belittles the mind. Franklin was wrong when he stated that a good copy was better than a bad original; for the truth is evident that the works of the first architects, Assyrian, Egyptian, Grecian, French, or English, are better than the most superb copy ever made by a copiest. The want of originality spoils our music, it spoils our fashions, and our painters, our sculptors, and all who throw the forces of the human mind upon the aid of the memory alone, soon lack judgment, and refine, and refine, until all the energy, worth, and life that the original possessed are lost.

We have blank copies of specifications and bills of quantities printed so fully that they require but little written matter to render them perfect for any building. We will send a blank copy of each to any person who incloses us a postal order for two (2) dollars. Persons desiring to build without the assistance of an architect would do well to obtain these blanks, as by them no part is left unnoticed, each part being brought distinctly to the mind. By them may also be avoided those disagreeable lawsuits or other losses.

Description.—A vestibule; B hall, 8 feet wide; C parlor, 14 by 22 feet; D dining-room, 14 by 20 feet; E sitting-room, 14 by 16 feet; F china closet, 7 by 10 feet; G pantry, 7 by 10 feet; H kitchen, 14 by 14 feet; I back porch; J wash house, 10 feet 6 inches by 10 feet 5 inches.

EUGENIE'S OLD CLOTHES.—Empress Eugenie, who sets the fashions of the civilized world, has a sale of cast-off dresses every year, and, as she rarely wears a dress twice, the number sold is always very great. A Paris letter-writer gives a graphic account of a sale just terminated. He says that the custom was established by the royal families of the Tuileries long before the great Revolution, acceded to by the Empress Josephine, continued under the Restoration, maintained by the Princesses of the House of Orleans, and kept up with great spirit under the present reign. A long gallery, which runs along the basement story of the palace, looking into the garden just opposite the Prince Imperial's winter walk, is fitted up from one end to the other with oak wardrobes. This is called the De Froque of the palace. It is here that the refuse dresses and the cast-off apparel of the royal and imperial ladies who have succeeded each other for the last hundred years in the occupation of the Tuileries are invariably borne, when rejected from the floor above.

These wardrobe cupboards, numerous and extensive as they are, get generally well filled during the year, and when the four seasons are considered thoroughly over, a sale is made of the whole, where every article is priced beforehand, and visitors are admitted to view and purchase without the observance of further ceremony than the presentation of an invitation card from one of her Majesty's attendants, to whom the privilege of granting them belongs. The sale of the regal wardrobe at the Tuileries is conducted on the strictest principle of equity. The shutters of the long gallery are closed, and it is lighted from one end to the other with lamps and candelabra, so that the light is stronger than it would be were the daylight admitted, as the ceiling is low, and the windows sunk deep into the wall. Every article is ticketed, and, of course, no deviation from the original decision can possibly be allowed.

A long line of stretchers are placed all down the middle of the gallery, the doors of the wardrobes on either side are flung open, and the visitor, walking slowly down on one side and returning on the other, makes choice of what may suit her taste, and, inscribing the number it bears upon a card, hands the latter to the attendant in waiting at the door, and departs. The stretchers are occupied by the shawls, and the wardrobes by the dresses, the shelves by the under linen, while a sort of counter at the further end of the gallery is filled with the champignons, on which are exhibited the bonnets and headdressed. The white satin dress, most splendidly embroidered in silver, with the tunic of bouillonne gauze and silver mouches, confined by bands of ponceau velvet, in which her Majesty went to the opera with the King Consort of Spain, was not quoted higher than the nankeen-colored dress and jacket, braided with green, which was recognized as the uniform invented by the Empress for the drive at Fontainebleau.

To be sure, the buttons were of malachite and set in gold, but the material of the dress could scarcely be considered as bearing any value whatever. The shawls were principally of French manufacture, and mostly for summer wear; the cloaks and mantles, deprived of their lace fur, are unattractive. The utmost exaggeration seems to exist in the prices put upon the bonnets. In the first place the article itself is out of fashion almost as soon as seen; in the next, it possesses no resources whatever, and, above all, it is liable to a greater deterioration than the dress. The habit of leaning back in the carriage, which has become so general, destroys the bonnet immediately, and renders it shabby in form, even while still bright and fresh in color. The proceeds of the sale are generally brought up by the valets and women of the wardrobe, who dispose of what remains unsold to the great dealers of Paris, who again sell them to their customers at immense prices.

STATISTICS OF IOWA.—Iowa is probably making as rapid progress as any State in the Union. The assessment for 1869 contains the following items: The comparison is made with the statistics of 1867. New houses built 26,565; increase of whites, 138,144; increase of colleges, 381; increase of acres inclosed, 947,194; increase of acres cultivated, 669,470; increase of bushels of wheat, 3,990,000; increase of bushels of corn, 16,600,000; increase of bushels of oats, 3,000,000; increase of bushels of potatoes, 3,000,000; increase of pounds of butter, 2,900,000; increase of pounds of wool, 2,900,000; increase of tons of hay, 2,000,000; increase of hops, 270,000; increase in value of coal, $1,500,000; increase of bushels of coal, 1,400,000.

TRUE HEROISM.—The following anecdote, extracted from the unpublished memoirs of a French nobleman, may, it is hoped, serve as an example well worthy of being imitated by all who desire to be thought truly brave and courageous. It records an instance of a victory gained by a man over his own passions—a victory more glorious, more honorable than any that has ever been purchased with fire and sword, with devastation and bloodshed:—

"Two noblemen, the Marquis de Valaise and the Count de Meric, were educated under the same masters, and were regarded by all who knew them as patterns of friendship, honor, and sensibility. Years succeeded years, and no quarrel had ever disgraced their attachment, when one unfortunate evening, the two friends having indulged rather freely in some excellent Burgundy, repaired to a neighboring hotel, and engaged in a game of backgammon. Fortune declared herself in favor of the marquis; he won the game, and in the thoughtless glee of the moment laughed in exultation at his unusual good luck. The count lost his temper, and once or twice upbraided the marquis for enjoying the pain which he had excited in the bosom of his friend. At last, upon another fortunate throw made by the marquis, by which he gammoned his antagonist, the infuriated count threw the box of dice in the face of his brother soldier.

"Every gentleman present was in amazement, and waited almost breathlessly for the moment when the marquis would sheathe his sword in the bosom of the now repentant count.

"Gentlemen," said the marquis, "I am a Frenchman, a soldier, and a friend. I have received a blow from a Frenchman, a soldier, and a friend. I know and acknowledge the laws of honor, and I will obey them. Every man who sees me wonders why I am tardy in visiting with vengeance the author of my disgrace. But, gentlemen, the heart of that man is entwined with my own; our education was the same, our principles are alike, and our friendship dates from our earliest years. But, Frenchmen, I will obey the laws of honor and of France; I will stab him to the heart!"

"Upon this he threw his arms around his unhappy friend, and said: 'My dear De Meric, I forgive you if you forgive me for the irritation I have occasioned in a sensible mind by the levity of my own. And now, gentlemen,' added the marquis, 'though I have interpreted the laws of honor in my own way, if there remains in this room one Frenchman who dares to doubt my resolution to resent even an improper smile at me, my sword is by my side to punish an affront, but not to murder a friend for whom I would die, and who sits there a monument of contrition and bravery, ready with me to challenge the rest of the room to deadly combat if any man dares to think amiss of this transaction.'"

The fine folks who went to the Suez canal opening took along with them other Parisian luxuries beside the striped silken tents. There is the portable fresh butter churn, made out of cut crystal and mounted on silver feet. It is provided with a silver rod which revolves swiftly in the cream and presents a pat of butter in three minutes. The fruit refrigerator is made of plated silver. There is a hollow in the centre of it for raspberries, for instance; all around them rise a wall of artificial ice; the fruit is covered with some chemical preparation which adds savor and congeals; after a rotary turn or two the raspberries are frosted.

At the recent Imperial ball at St. Cloud, the Duchess de Mouchy wore a white gauze train robe, marked with silver, over which is a square bodice and skirt tunic, red currant color, kept on the shoulders by diamond straps or epaulets. On the right shoulder began a scarf of silver foliage which draped the bosom and fell crossways down the left side all over the skirt. The duchess wore $300,000 worth of family diamonds on her head, ears, neck, and arms; the diadem and ear-rings were mounted with pear-shaped pearls hanging from diamond clusters.

JEAN MARIA FARINA, the "genuine" Cologne manufacturer, is dead, leaving seventeen other, but fraudulent Jean Maria Farinas in Cologne to survive him. Laura Farina, worth $2,000,000, marriageable, and but twenty-one, succeeds him in the cologne business.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

THE THREE WISHES.
A FAIRY TALE DRAMA.

BY M. F. E.

Characters.

DAME DISCONTENT.

JOHN, her husband.

ELLEN, their daughter.

EDWARD, a young farmer.

REDNOSE, an elf.

ROSEBUD and BLUEBELL, fairies.

Costumes.

DAME DISCONTENT. Dress of common brown stuff. Heavy cloak and hood. In the face of her hood appears the large white ruffles of a cap worn beneath it.

JOHN. Long gray coat, knee breeches, black stockings, and buckled shoes. A short clay pipe in his mouth.

ELLEN. Short red dress, looped overskirt of gay chintz, black bodice, white apron, slippers, and white stockings; bow of ribbon in hair.

EDWARD. High white hat, decorated with ribbons; blue coat, with large brass buttons; scarlet vest, buff breeches, gray stockings, and shoes with huge buckles.

REDNOSE. Suit of black, short cloak, cap with white plume. The performer of this part must be small, wear one of those masks with a large red nose, obtainable at the toy stores, and stuff something under his cloak to appear humpbacked.

ROSEBUD and BLUEBELL. Dresses of pink and blue-angled gauze; wands covered with gilt paper and decorated with rosebuds and bluebells.

SCENE I.—Inside of a cottage. A dresser containing crockery; a table and two chairs. ELLEN at the table peeling potatoes.

ELLEN. There goes Edward past the window. I know he must be coming here, because he has on his best suit. Oh, dear! I wish I had time to put on my striped gingham. (Smooths her hair hurriedly.) Here he comes. (Knock is heard.) Come in.

Enter EDWARD, with a very large nosegay.

EDWARD. Good-morning, Ellen. Busy as usual, I see.

ELLEN. Good-morning, Edward. Won't you take a chair? (ELLEN hands him one, upon which he carefully places his hat, and remains standing. ELLEN seals herself upon the other.)

EDWARD. (Looking around uneasily.) Is your father or mother at home?

ELLEN. Oh, no! This is market day, you know, and they have gone to town to sell the last batch of butter which I made.

EDWARD. I wish that I were a pat of butter.

ELLEN. Dear me! what a strange wish. Why?

EDWARD. That I might be patted by your fair hands.

ELLEN. (Looking down and playing with the corner of her apron.) Oh! la!

EDWARD. The truth is, Ellen, I knew your parents were out, and I came here to see you, to ask you the question which you promised to answer by harvest time. Harvest time is past. Is it yes or no? Will you take this nosegay, and in taking it consent to become my wife? (He offers the nosegay, which ELLEN bashfully accepts.) (Joyfully.) It is yes. (Advances to ELLEN, and seizes her hand, is about to place an arm around her waist, when

Enter DAME DISCONTENT and JOHN.

JOHN. (Taking pipe from his mouth.) Bless me!

DAME. (Starting back.) Well, I never!

EDWARD. (Leading ELLEN forward, she hiding her face.) Master and Mistress Discontent, as I love Ellen, and Ellen loves me (ELLEN nods, still keeping her face covered.) we ask your consent to our marriage, and your blessing upon it!

JOHN. As far as I'm concerned—ahem—hem—wife, tell 'em what we think. I'll agree to whatever you say. Speak to 'em, do.

DAME. I shan't say a word. No, not one word. I'm dumfounded at the idea of such a fool as you, John Discontent, giving these two foolish ones advice. (JOHN shakes his head negatively.) It was advice, I say. What right have you to speak while I'm here to tell 'em! Who's mistress, you or I? And you, young man, ain't you ashamed of yourself to come here after my daughter! What have you to support a wife on? Ellen has not a cent, and I suppose you've the same.

EDWARD. I haven't much money, to be sure, but I have a cottage and—

DAME. (Contemptuously.) Our Ellen marry a man with only a cottage! Well, upon my word, you have impudence. A cottage, indeed!

EDWARD. And an acre of land and a cow.

DAME. (Turning to JOHN.) John Discontent, are we to be insulted because we're poor? Why don't you knock that beggar down, with his cottage, his acre of land, and his cow!

EDWARD. It gives more milk than any two cows around.

DAME. (Mournfully.) O John! It's easy seen you don't belong to my family. A Pollywinkenses—I'm proud to be a Pollywinkenses—would never stand this. To hear this person talk about a cottage, an acre of land, and a cow that gives more milk than any two cows around in connection with our Ellen! (Energetically.) Young man, you shall not marry her. You had better go; you are not wanted here, and (EDWARD, in consideration, sits down on the chair which contains his hat) the sooner you go the better. [Exit EDWARD, leaving his crushed hat on the chair.]

ELLEN. (Sobbing.) O mother!

DAME. Stop crying, girl. Don't be a fool. I'd never be contented with such a poor son-in-law, and it's easy seen you are not of my family. A Pollywinkenses—

ELLEN. (Interrupting.) O mother! he has left his hat. He'll drown himself (sobbing), or catch the influenza, or something, without his hat. Do let me take it to him. (DAME D. takes the hat and nosegay, and throws them from the window.) [Curtain falls.]

SCENE II.—Same as Scene I. Two candles burning on the table. DAME D. and JOHN seated on each side of the fireplace.

DAME. Dear, dear, what a life this is! Oh! I wish we were rich. All our neighbors are richer than we except Edward. I let Ellen go over to Jones'; I hope she will not meet him coming home. I do wish that girl had more of my spirit. But I'll go to sleep, John, I am tired of your talk.

JOHN. I haven't spoken one word the whole evening.

DAME. Don't tell me! (Leans back in her chair and snores; JOHN follows her example, pipe still in his mouth.)

Enter ROSEBUD and BLUEBELL.

ROSEBUD. (Gazing at the sleepers.) How discontented these mortals are! This woman was just wishing for riches; I wonder if she would be happy if they were given to her!

BLUEBELL. I do not know. I think, however, that her daughter would be rendered happier, for the obstacle which prevents her union with Edward, the young farmer, would then be removed. Here is Rednose. Perhaps he can tell, for these elves know everything.

Enter REDNOSE.

REDNOSE. (Skipping towards them and bowing.) Hall, lovely ladies! You seem deeply engaged in conversation. May I inquire the cause?

ROSEBUD. Good-evening, Rednose. We were just wondering if Dame Discontent would be happy were her wish for wealth gratified.

REDNOSE. No, indeed. She would be far more miserable, for riches would bring in their train desires and cares from which she is now happily free.

BLUEBELL. But, most wise Rednose, do you think she would consent to Ellen's marriage?

REDNOSE. Pride would then prevent her from allowing Ellen to wed with one so poor as Edward. However, fairies, it is easy to try the experiment; it may teach her that contentment is better than wealth. I will grant her a wish.

ROSEBUD and BLUEBELL. And we will each grant one to John.

REDNOSE. Rosebud shall announce to them their good fortune. I will awaken them. (REDNOSE here sings any song that may be deemed appropriate. DAME D. and JOHN accompanying him by snoring loudly.)

DAME. (Yawning.) How the wind roars. [Exit BLUEBELL and REDNOSE, ROSEBUD stands centre.]

JOHN. (Seeing fairy and looking frightened.) Speak to it, wife.

DAME. Speak to what, you dunce? (Sees ROSEBUD.) O beautiful lady, I—

ROSEBUD. Silence, woman! To you, mortals, three wishes have been graciously ordained to be gratified. Two of these are accorded to you, John Discontent, the other is given to your wife. Think well, both of you, before you wish.

John. (Rubbing his eyes.) Am I awake!

[Exit ROSEBUD, waving her wand.]

Dame. Of course, you are, though you are as stupid as usual. I can't imagine why one wish is given to me, while you receive two. At any rate, I'll have to make the best of it. What shall we wish for?

John. For great wealth, isn't it best?

Dame. I used to think so. But a great many people are rich; and now that I have the power, I shall wish for something more rare. I wish we had a yard of black pudding; it would make us so comfortable while we are thinking. (A yard of black pudding falls to the floor.)

John. (Angrily.) Now you've done it! I don't often get angry, but I have good reason now. I do wish that pudding fast to your nose. (DAME D. screams, and the pudding ascends until it reaches the tip of her nose, where it hangs.)

(A thin cord should be attached to the roll of cloth or silk, which represents the pudding. This cord should be passed through a loop in the front of Dame D.'s hood. The performer must pull one end until the other, to which the pudding is joined, is on a level with her nose.)

Dame. Oh! take it off. O husband, wish it off! (Pulling at it.)

John. (Soothingly.) We have only one more wish. I will wish for wealth, and then we will have a gold box made to cover it. You shall be the richest lady in the world, and everybody will be wearing gold cases to their noses when you have set the fashion.

Dame. Oh, no, no! Wish that it may fall to the ground, or I shall certainly kill myself.

John. Well, then, may it fall to the floor. (Pudding falls.)

Enter EDWARD and ELLEN.

Ellen. Dear father and mother, I met Edward coming home—

Edward. (Interrupting.) And I insisted, notwithstanding the denial I received this morning, in coming again to ask your consent and blessing.

John. I agree, if your mother does, Ellen.

Dame. I have learned this evening that it is best to be contented with what we possess, therefore, Edward, though you are poor, I receive you as a son-in-law. Bless you, my children.

John. Bless you, and be happy. My children, you had better be married to-night (aside), for fear the old woman may change her mind. [Exit DAME D. and JOHN arm-in-arm, EDWARD and ELLEN follow.]

Enter REDNOSE, ROSEBUD, and BLUEBELL.

Rednose. (Cutting a caper.) Are you satisfied, ladies?

Both. Perfectly. Good fortune to the happy pair!

Rednose. So be it. Adieu, fair ones. I hope to meet you at the queen's ball on St. John's Eve.

CURIOUS CEREMONY.—In 1794 an old lady died in London, and was buried in the vaults of one of the churches. When her will was read, it was found that she had bequeathed a considerable sum to the church, the proceeds of which were to be annually distributed to the poor of the parish on the 28th of January, her own birthday. The condition attached to the bequest was that her coffin should be carefully dusted every year on the day in question. In case this operation should be omitted on a single occasion, the entire principal of the bequest was to pass to the authorities of the adjoining parish. Of course, the officials of the church have always been careful to perform this interesting ceremony, and it was done this year for the seventy-sixth time.

"ONE of the Spiritualist Home's newest feats is to make brandy disappear from a glass tumbler. However novel and wonderful this may appear to the people of Paris and London, it is nothing but a vile trick, which is most dexterously practised by thousands of persons in this city every day."

We have frequently seen brandy disappear from a tumbler. The person who held the glass simply put it to his mouth.

A NEW DOCTOR-IX.—We have a few female doctors and also apothecaries in our principal cities, and as we call the doctors Esculapi-Anns, why not call the druggists Ipecacu-Hannahs!

AN IRISHMAN'S friend having fallen in a slough, the Irishman called loudly to another for assistance. The latter, who was busily engaged in cutting a loaf, and wished to procrastinate, inquired, "How deep is the gentleman in?" "Up to his ankles." "Then there is plenty of time," said the other. "No, there is not," rejoined the first. "I forgot to tell you he's in head first."

"MOTHER, I'VE COME HOME TO DYE!"

A GENTLEMAN, giving a lecture to some boys, was explaining how no one could live without air. He then said: "You have all heard of a man drowning—how does that happen?" The ready answer was: "'Cause he can't swim."

It has been said that the difference between a carriage-wheel and a carriage-horse, is, that one goes better when it is tired, and the other doesn't.

Germanatown.—Filoselle is the thick floss so much used now for zephyr work.

L. P. K.—We cannot give the desired information. Rosebud.—Decidedly wrong.

A Bon Vivant.—The following is the order, but this is only observed at the more expensive dinners: Oysters are generally served, on the half-shell, as an appetizer, when the guests sit down; and in this case a glass of Sauterne is usually handed to each guest. Sherry is served with the soup; sometimes both sherry and Madeira. Champagne comes on after the fish is removed and when the meats, etc., appear, and continues to be served till the dessert. At large dinner-parties, hock, Madeira, and claret are also served with the meats, according to the taste of the guests. Some people drink but one kind of wine: in this case, find out, if you can, what they like, and give it to them; but where all kinds are served, they are sure to get what they prefer. At the best tables, salad and cheese are offered just before the dessert, and in this case a glass of port wine is handed around at the same time. After dessert, give a glass of Curacao, Charterreuse, or other cordial, and subsequently coffee. If you have any very fine hock, Madeira, or claret, it is to be drunk after the dessert.

possible; some little article, not purchased, but worked by your own hands—a little picture from your pencil, or a trifle from your needle; there are various little things can be worked that, in themselves, cost comparatively nothing, but as being the offspring of your gentle skill, will claim a priceless value from the receiver. All presents should be made with as little parade as possible, not offered formally, but in an indirect way.

"E. S. If you will write and send a stamp, we will inform you of a good surgeon, but we decline taking the liberty of publishing his name.

Mertie.—Orange blossoms are the emblem of chastity. There is no other reason that we know of for their being worn by brides.

M. T. R.—We cannot make any new engagements this year. Perhaps next.

Emily G.—Decidedly too young.

Minnie, La.—Go with your husband of course. Your mother has nothing to do with it. Cannot answer your second question.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The Publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE.

Fig. 1.—Robe walking dress of purple Foulard silk, made with one skirt and Polonaise forming an upper skirt. The skirt is of purple, with a border around it of purple and white stripes; the edge is finished with a ruffle of purple. The Polonaise is of the striped material, with a cape; sleeves and pannier puff of purple. Purple bonnet, trimmed with violets and green leaves.

Fig. 2.—Visiting dress of Axof green silk, made with two skirts. The lower one is cut in Vandykes, trimmed with white lace, with a plaiting of a darker shade coming below them. The upper skirt is cut open in the front and puffed in the back, trimmed to correspond. Plain corsage, with lace bretelles. Bow of lace in back. Coat sleeves. White lace bonnet, trimmed with green flowers.

Fig. 3.—Black silk dress, made with two skirts. The lower one is trimmed with one ruffle, headed with a box-plaited quilting. The upper skirt is trimmed with wide thread lace, headed with scarlet velvet. Plain corsage, with cape pointed in the back and front. Coat sleeves, with puffs at top. Wide velvet sash. Black straw hat, trimmed with scarlet velvet and feather.

Fig. 4.—Dress of light Havana brown silk, spotted with black, made with one skirt trimmed with box-plaited ruffles a quarter of a yard long at the sides and the front. Overdress of black silk, cut with deep points in front, and rounded in the back, trimmed with a ruche of silk. Plain corsage, cut heart-shape. Brown sleeves. Black lace bonnet, trimmed with gay flowers.

Fig. 5.—Evening dress of blue silk, made with a short skirt trimmed with a point lace flounce in front, and a puff of white silk divided by blue satin bows. Court train, scalloped on the edge and bound with white silk, and a piping of white silk going above it. The sides are ornamented with point lace and blue satin bows. Low square corsage, from which depends long scarf ends in front, finished with fringe. Point lace forming sleeve, and on neck. Hair arranged in puffs and curls, with pink rose at the side.

Fig. 6.—Suit for boy of four years, of light brown jasper serge, made with a skirt trimmed with three rosettes at side. Jacket cut in Vandykes and lined with scarlet. Straw hat, trimmed with scarlet and black.

DESCRIPTION OF EXTENSION SHEET.

FIRST SIDE.

Fig. 1.—This dress can be worn either in the street or house, as the skirt barely touches the ground. It is made of gray silk with two skirts, the lower one trimmed with two ruffles cut in small points and edged with narrow fringe, headed by a plaited quilling. Upper skirt out apron front, pointed at the side and puffed in the back, trimmed to correspond. Plain corsage, trimmed with the quilling; loose sleeve, with tight sleeve under it.

Fig. 2.—Black silk suit, made with one skirt, trimmed with two plaited ruffles, headed by a fancy gimp of satin and cord. Casaque puffed in the back and trimmed to correspond, waist trimmed square; coat sleeve, with cuff. Black lace bonnet, trimmed with feather and blue aigrette.

Fig. 3.—Walking dress of lilac silk poplin, made with two skirts, the lower one trimmed with one ruffle. The upper one cut in deep points, and trimmed with a narrow ruffle, headed by a band of velvet of a darker shade. Cape, with deep ends back and front, of velvet edged with a ruffle of the poplin. Hat of lilac straw, with lilac flowers, and gauze veil brought around the throat.

Fig. 4.—House dress composed of two skirts; the lower one of blue silk, trimmed with ruffles; the upper one and waist of black silk; the skirt is trimmed with narrow plaited ruffles, and looped at sides with velvet bows. Plain corsage, with velvet fichu forming a basque in back; coat sleeve, with velvet cuff.

Fig. 5.—Suit of water-proof cloth, made with one skirt, trimmed with three plaited ruches. Tight-fitting basque, with a large box-plait in back, with buttons at the waist. A pointed collar of silk around the neck. Black Neapolitan bonnet, trimmed with black lace, and green ribbon, and grass.

Fig. 6.—White piqué apron cut with shoulder-straps; the skirt is scalloped and trimmed with white braid. Pockets, trimmed with braid and bow on one of the material.

Fig. 7.—Pinafore made of white Nainsook muslin, lined with embroidered muslin insertion and trimmed with tucks in the muslin.

Fig. 8.—White piqué apron. This apron is intended for a girl, and can be made either in white piqué or black silk. It may be braided either in scarlet or black if piqué is used, and with white soutache if black silk is preferred.

Fig. 9.—Princess dress for a girl of three years, made of white piqué spotted with scarlet; it is trimmed with scarlet and white braid.

Fig. 10.—Square open collar, composed of borders of English embroidery. The Vandykes of the embroidery are ornamented with satin rosettes, with one end appearing from the under part of the Vandyke.

SECOND SIDE.

Fig. 1.—Pelerine looped up with a bow. This pelerine can be worn either over a dress or over a tight-fitting paletot, and is made of the same material. Our pattern is of gray batiste de laine, lined with gray silk, and edged with deep gray silk fringe. It is gathered and looped up in the middle of the back under a bow of wide gray ribbon, made up, as seen in illustration, with three long lappets, the two longest of which have fringed ends.

Fig. 2.—Low bodice and pannier tunic for evening wear. This pattern is one of the latest novelties from Paris, and can be made up in a variety of styles—in white tarlatane, with satin braces of some bright color, and edged with blonde; in silk, with velvet braces; or, again, in velvet, with lace braces. In one and all of these materials it looks remarkably well. It consists of five pieces—three for the bodice and two for the tunic. The front and back and one brace form the pattern of the bodice; four braces will be required, as there are two in front and two at the back. The braces may be either cut in one piece for each back and front, or joined on the shoulder, as most convenient. Two pieces for the tunic now remain. The front is the smaller one; it turns back with a revers. The edge of the side of the pannier is to be gathered and sewn to the side of the front. The back is to be bunched up according to the illustration, and a short wide sash added over it. Ruches, plaited ribbon, lace, feathers, and fringe may be used for trimming; the selection to be ruled by the material used.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Little girl's toilets. Fig. 3 wears a dress of gray summer poplin and a blue flounced mantelet. A pointed pelerine, terminating with a tassel, is simulated on the latter with a frill, and the lower edge is bordered with worsted fringe. The skirt is trimmed with three flounces. Fig. 4 wears a striped blue poplin skirt, and a white piqué overdress, trimmed with ruches and buttons.

Fig. 5.—Suit for a boy of six years, made of blue poplin, with a blouse trimmed with satin pipings.

Fig. 6.—Dress for little boy of gray poplin, trimmed with blue and black striped satin.

Fig. 7.—Infant's circular cloak of white merino, made with a hood, lined with white satin. The edge of cloak is finished with a narrow vine of embroidery.

Figs. 8 and 9.—Loose paletot for girl. It may be made either of cloth, silk, or of the same material as the dress. It is trimmed with a cross band and loops of velvet.

Fig. 10.—Overcoat for boy of ten years, made of waterproof cloth, bound with braid.

Fig. 11.—Saque for girl of twelve years, made of black silk, cut in scallops around the edge, and trimmed with narrow fringe, fancy braid, and buttons.

Fig. 12.—Cravat of muslin, trimmed with narrow lace; the tabs are broad and ornamented with squares of Valenciennes.

Fig. 13.—Overdress of white muslin, to be worn over colored dress spoken of in Chitchat for last month. It is trimmed with lace, insertion, and satin ribbon bows.

Fig. 14.—Dress for girl of ten years, made of blue silk, trimmed with two ruffles, headed with a band of blue and white plaid silk. The waist has revers of plaid silk. The sleeves are trimmed to correspond with skirt.

Fig. 15.—Crinoline with tournure. This underskirt, entirely made of white horsehair, shows the shape of modern crinolines. The tournure is entirely formed of puffs, which are continued at the sides in the lower part. The front is quite plain.

Fig. 16.—Waist of white cashmere, trimmed with blue velvet, embroidered with gold thread.

Fig. 17.—Bertha, with epaulettes made of illusion, satin ribbon, and Valenciennes lace.

Fig. 18.—Dressing jacket. This is richly trimmed, and would serve for an invalid jacket as well as for a combing one. It is made of white cambric, either checked or plain. It is ornamented at the top, so as to simulate a pelerine, with bouttonnés of plain muslin, separated by embroidered insertion. Each radiating section terminates with a point, and there is a rosette in the centre of each point. A Valenciennes lace terminates it.

Figs. 19 and 20.—Tight-fitting casaque of black silk, trimmed with cross-cut bands of black satin. A fichu, edged with fringe, commences half down the back, crosses in front, and falls in two lappets on the skirt. Coat sleeve, trimmed with satin and fringe to match. Fig. 20 shows the back of casaque.

NEW STYLES OF ARRANGING THE HAIR.

Fig. 1.—Coiffure of chataine braids and curls. The front hair is rolled up, and ornamented with a pink rose and foliage; the back with a large bow and ends of pink ribbon.

Fig. 2.—The hair is arranged in plaits coming up high in front, where they are finished with a round tuft of curls. Long curls at the sides. Bows on top and back of head of blue satin ribbon.

Fig. 3.—The front of hair is arranged in puffs; the back in loose coil, falling low on the neck. Half wreath of ivy leaves and berries.

Fig. 4.—Hair arranged in finger puffs all over the head and low down on the neck. Wreath of leaves, with bird at one side.

CHITCHAT

ON FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

THE first importations of spring goods show no abatement in beauty from those of former seasons. Although each year it seems as if the skill of the inventor could not produce anything more beautiful, yet, when it becomes our pleasant task, as the seasons roll around, to note the new goods seen, we always find something new, something beautiful. Perchance the patterns we have seen before. If so, the ground, texture, and colors are entirely different, so that, comparing the pattern in the old and new, no one would trace the slightest resemblance.

First we notice cotton fabrics; percales, piqués, French chintzes, lawns, and the common calico. Many percales are of plain solid colors; écru buff, pearl, gray, dove, and soft Quaker drabs. These can be made up and trimmed with the same, or gay borders or fancy braids. Prevalent among the percales and all wash goods are small chintz figures, cheeks, delicately-pencilled stripes, and suit patterns, similar to those of last season, with perhaps less trimming of borders and ruffles. French chintzes have delicately-tinted grounds, on which are white dots with a gay chintz figure in the centre. We saw one piece with autumn leaves, instead of a figure, over it. The effect was very pretty of the many-colored leaves; perhaps not so appropriate for spring goods, but nevertheless pretty. A new material for wash dresses is satin jean, all cotton, of as firm body as piqué, but finely twilled, and with a gloss like satin. The ground is white, with polka dots of gay color; or else inch stripes of Polka blue or green, with rosebuds on the white stripe between. Lawn robes and suit patterns have two grave shades in stripes, or alternating with a chintz stripe. In calicos we see white grounds with small colored or black stripes and figures. Most of these have a border along the selvedge. A calico wrapper is indispensable for a housekeeper, who takes an active part in her housekeeping, for early morning wear. The shape mostly worn is the Polonaise wrapper, snugly-fitted to give the appearance of a gored dress. The skirt should just touch the floor. The sleeves are coat-shaped. A turned-over collar of the same is around the neck, with a narrow white frill worn above. A separate belt of the calico is made over muslin. It is fastened up the front with buttons. It is best to leave the waists of wash dresses unlined, merely strengthening the arm-holes and seams under the arms by facings of muslin. Striped wrappers are prettiest scalloped and bound with worsted braid, or with a bright-colored Chambery cut bias. For small figured prints without bordering, red worsted braid, serpentine and with rough surface, to imitate coral, is used for trimming; or else wide braid is stitched on, with colored braid beneath, showing at each edge like a piping. All worsted braids should be scalded in hot water before using.

In finer goods there are twilled foulards of better quality than any before imported. These have light grounds with dashes, sprigs, tiny crosses, and many new patterns in prettily contrasting colors. Pearl-gray is dotted with violet, écru with green, and tea color with bright blue. These will make beautiful and serviceable house dresses for the spring. A new material for suits is called jasper serge. It has distinct twills of white and blue, white and green, or purple. This can be trimmed with the same or with silk of a solid color. The wiry cotton goods called Japanese linen, a pretty and inexpensive material, appears again in cheeks and double cross bars of clear apple green, blue, brown, or black and white. In materials for suits, we see any variety of shades of gray, ashes of rose, and different shades of light brown. These are made up with ruffles of the same.

Black silk is by no means discarded, no lady considering her wardrobe complete without at least one black silk walking suit. Several different costumes can be made of this by colored underskirts or overskirts to wear with the black.

We must not forget to speak of the ever useful and ladylike waterproof suits, so very necessary in travelling. The cloth comes in black and white, black and gold, and black and green, also in brown plaid. The latter, according to our taste, is excessively ugly. A good model for a suit is of the gold and black cloth, made with one skirt, trimmed with three bias folds, scalloped on one side, and bound with worsted braid. A tight-fitting jacket, trimmed to correspond. A garment suitable for early spring, to be worn with a suit made of the same material or of black gros grain, is made to partly fit the figure in the back, with a loose front open, with a vest of contrasting color, with velvet bands crossing over the vest. Coat sleeve open on the back. A belt with a bunched-up bow in the back. When worn in the house, the vest can be omitted, and a chemise of white muslin worn.

The bonnets, as far as the styles are decided, are very much the same as those which have been worn, higher than they have been, if that is possible. A novelty, in vogue abroad for carriage wear, is a capulet or veil bonnet. This is merely a bandeau over the forehead, from which falls a large veil, that is not arranged by the milliner, but is draped about the head by the wearer. This style of bonnet will, no doubt, be adopted here later in the season.

The grotesque appearance presented by some of our would-be fashionables in regard to crinoline presents the very natural inquiry, has crinoline been discarded? We are happy to say, so far, it has not, nor is there any prospect of its disappearing. Skirts are worn smaller in many instances, but the comfort of the hoop skirt is far too great for it to be given up. We can hardly remember a time when something was not worn as a substitute for the hoop skirt, and with far less comfort than is now experienced. The very great weight of the number of skirts before necessary to be worn is obviated, which is a great item in the health of the wearer. The coming warm weather makes the hoop skirt a necessity, and we hope it will long continue to reign with all and more than present popularity. The fashions will change (as what fashion will not?) but that will only add new interest to the manufacturers who have given such a great boon to woman-kind. So our readers need not feel alarmed when they notice what they suppose to be the discarding of the hoop skirt.

For the benefit of the fond mammas who desire their infants fashionably attired, we will devote a short space to the description of some articles of their clothing. Infants' dresses are not worn as long as they have been. The newest christening robes measure but a yard from shoulder tips to the skirt edge, and are made of white Organdy over white silk slips. The low, full bodices, tiny sleeves, and tablier fronts are entirely of embroidery and wide Valenciennes insertion in lengthwise stripes. Box-plaited frills edged with lace surround the skirt, and curved frills descend from the belt at the sides. A ribbon rosette is in each curve, and the whole is effectively finished by a sash of wide white watered ribbon, knotted at the right side. Under slips of blue, mauve, or pink silk, display the lace on such robes to advantage, and are worn, except at the christening, when all white is as much de rigueur as for a wedding. Other dresses less elaborate and far more durable, are of fine French nainsook edged with fluted frills, headed by puffs and bands of cord like tucks. Quite a pretty little dress is made of soft mull, with a single cluster of tucks in the skirt, crosswise puffs and Hamburg insertion on the body, and narrow Valenciennes around the neck, sleeves, and sash. Many of the dresses are now made high neck and long sleeves, these obviate the wearing of a zephyr sacque in cool weather. Infants' cloaks are changed in shape. The round upper cape is smaller than has been worn of late, measuring only five-eighths behind, while the cloak proper is straight, with square corners, and is attached to a yoke with sleeves. White merino embroidered, and a satin quilting or fringe around the cape, describes the handsomest cloaks; for warm weather the cape alone is worn, or else a circular cloak of white piqué, with embroidered ruffle and braiding. White is the prettiest dress for a child until three years of age, all the year round. To be comfortably worn in winter, the underclothing must of course be warm. Colored sashes, and color on cap or hat, relieves the plain white and makes the dress effective. New lace bibs to be worn over the cloak are square, like the Marie Theresa collars for ladies.

Soft quilted bibs with embroidered edges and an initial or "Baby" in the centre are also worn. For children in their first short clothes, low bodices and full skirts of white muslin are made. Also little slips with high necked yokes, into which the full skirt and waist are gathered. A sash of the material tied behind confines the slip at the waist. A pelisse of merino, with sleeves and a cape is the best wrapping for a child just done with long clothes. If this is made ample every way, and long enough to barely escape the floor, it will serve from the time the child begins to walk until it is three years old. For boys of a year or year and a half old, the blouse dress is worn, for morning wear confined at the waist with a belt. But little difference is noticed in the general style of their dress except the hat, and less elaborate trimming on their dresses. Piqué is much worn for summer dresses, braided and trimmed with fancy colored braids or needlework ruffles.

How to dress girls just in their teens perplexes many mothers, as they are too old for children's fashions and too young for the elaborate costumes worn by their elder sisters "in society." A certain air of jauntiness is compatible with the tasteful simplicity for these demoiselles. Their skirts should be short enough to disclose the ankle of their high Polish boots. This is the regulation for all occasions, even demi-trains are not for school girls. The lower skirt is trimmed to the knee with flounces, braid, or bands of silk. The upper skirt should be but slightly draped, that it may not be very bouffant, and the edge should be Vandyked or out in squares, as frills are soon crushed when sat upon. The corsage is a short close-fitting basque, made with one dart or two as the figure may require. It is curved over the hips or else each seam is turned back en revers. The neck is hollowed out low and finished with a sailor collar of the same. Coat sleeves, or the sabot shape. No belt but a sash bow behind. A sailor jacket of the same color as dress, a hat of dark straw, with a long ostrich feather. Kid gloves with two buttons at the wrist, a linen collar edged with lace, and a little useful jewelry, such as a brooch, sleeve buttons, a watch, and the souvenir locket attached to a black velvet necklace, completes the toilette. An overskirt and bretelles of black silk, and a tunic of white muslin, all puffs, tucks, and ruffles will give variety to day and evening dresses. A pink rosebud and black velvet loops festoon the white tunic. Entire dresses of white muslin elaborately trimmed, are worn over colored silk slips, or else with white skirts with gay plaid and Roman sashes.

The newest fans for ladies are deeper in the centre, and appear pointed when closed. In some styles the ivory sticks extend outside of the satin, and have a very pretty effect. Black silk embroidered with gold, with gold sticks over the silk, tinted plush, entire pearl and ivory fans carved like lace, gold open-work over black silk, and pointed ivory, are among the latest importations.

Chrysoprase is the jewel fancied at present. Its variety makes it esteemed more than its pale opaline green tint, which shows two shades—sea-green and a deeper tint. Its rarest color is like a pearl melted in sea-water. Oblong square shapes of precious stones are fancied. A rich set was shown in heavy solid setting, pierced with cameo figures on the face. The brooch was Diana with her bow; the square sleeve buttons bore the head of Mary Stuart. A cinque-cento design, with setting of Roman and bright gold, with brilliant twinkling in the rims, and pendants as beautiful as dew jewelry. Black onyx and gold are fashionable, cut in light forms with pendants, cross pieces, and bars. They are appropriate for home toilettes. FASHION.

MAUD GALOP,

COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

BY B. S. BARRETT.

Published by permission of J. STARR HOLLOWAY, 811 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia.

PIANO.

The musical score is written for piano and consists of five systems of music. Each system contains a treble staff and a bass staff. The key signature is one flat (B-flat) and the time signature is 2/4. The music is a galop, characterized by its fast tempo and rhythmic patterns. The first system starts with a treble staff melody and a bass staff accompaniment. The second system continues the melody and accompaniment. The third system features a repeat sign in the treble staff. The fourth system shows a change in the bass staff accompaniment. The fifth system concludes the piece with a final chord in the bass staff.

POOR AND PROUD.

BY MARION HARLAND.

"Is this the house?" asked Miss Irene Tilton, in surprise, as her coachman checked his horses in front of a block of two-story buildings in a quiet street.

"It is." Her brother leaned past her to unfasten the door of the carriage. "I told you they were in very moderate circumstances, you recollect, but they are gentlefolk for all that." He said it bravely; but there were deprecation and entreaty in his eye, as he helped her alight and walked with her up the half-dozen wooden steps of the porch. He was young, and thought his sister's opinion on any subject worthy of respectful consideration.

She replied, as if the appeal had been verbal: "You need not be afraid, Edgar. I know what is due to myself and to you."

"To her, also!" he added, hastily, as he heard some one approaching from within.

The door was opened by a girl of fourteen in a school dress of worsted plaid and white apron. She was neat in person, with pleasant eyes and ruddy cheeks, and smiled recognition at sight of Mr. Tilton.

"Good-morning, Annie! Are your mother and sisters at home?" he said, cordially, shaking hands with her.

"Yes, sir. Will you walk in?"

"This is my sister, Miss Irene Tilton," Edgar remarked, informally, following the ladies to the parlor door.

Annie bowed somewhat awkwardly. Irene inclined her head very stiffly, and neither said a word, but the supercilious curve of the latter's lips was sufficiently expressive. She swept her eye-glass around the parlors, when the portress had gone to announce their arrival, taking an exact inventory of all the appointments of the small rooms, from the well-served carpet to the one portrait and half-dozen engravings that ornamented the walls. There was a piano—but what mechanic's house was without one in this day?—and the back room was lined on two sides with book shelves. "The books were picked up second-hand at auction and wayside stalls," guessed the observer, noticing that none were new and handsomely-bound. The window curtains were plain white muslin; the sofa and chairs covered with black hair-cloth, that grimmest of all upholsterial abominations. "Fancy work, too," continued the mental commentary. "Leather and cone-frames, embroidered ottomans—that is, boxes covered with worsted work—and a silk patch-work sofa pillow! It is not contemptible to be poor; it is to be tawdry."

Edgar answered, as if she had spoken out her thought: "The other room is Cherry's territory. The older sisters have charge of this."

"There are two older than herself, did you say?"

"Yes, and two younger."

"No brothers?"

"None."

An arch of the eyebrows and a plaintive little sigh replied. Then there was a pause, until a light step, but not a quick one, came down the stairs, and Cherry Browne, for whom their call was especially intended, entered.

She was twenty years old, of medium height, neither a brunette nor a blonde, with gray eyes, a spirited mouth, a nondescript nose, broad forehead, slender form, rather thin as yet, but straight as an arrow, and she looked the stranger directly in the face, not boldly, but without a tinge of embarrassment. Her dress, as the other discovered before she was quite in the room, was dark blue merino, with linen collar and cuffs, and her abundant hair was arranged simply about a shapely head. Miss Tilton felt and looked queenly in her royal purple—silk robe, velvet mantle, hat, and gloves—as she arose to acknowledge the introduction. She did it with her most superb air. Remembering her promise to be courteous, she saluted the young lady with punctilious civility; but her glance was freezing, her voice the reverse of genial.

"I am very happy to meet one of whom I have often heard my brother speak," was in word a fair welcome. Tone and countenance made it less than nothing.

"Thank you," was all Cherry said, then gave her hand to the brother with quiet self-possession. She was not yet "put down" by her august visitor, for she addressed her next remark to her. "I must ask you to excuse my mother from coming down," she observed. "She was quite sick last night, and we persuaded her to keep her room to-day."

"Which is, being interpreted, that she is in the kitchen," reflected Miss Irene, "or that the dutiful daughters are ashamed to present her." This, while her lips uttered a starch-polished condolence.

In five minutes more Miss Amelia Browne tripped in—a high-colored, high-featured spinster of thirty, in a green silk dress and cherry ribbons, an elaborate construction of black net and cherry chenille surmounting her chignon. She talked very fast, and laughed more than was necessary or sensible. Irene met women like her every day in her own circle, and tolerated them. This specimen she chose to regard as the legitimate product of ambitious poverty, of audacious parvenuism, that lacked the double gilding of wealth. She was not illiterate, nor was she silly—except as affectation is always more or less ridiculous—but her fussiness set off to advantage, unsuspected by her, unexpected to Miss Tilton, the gentle dignity of her sister's bearing and address. Cherry sat still, and spoke without action or animation; but all she said was singularly pertinent; her voice was agreeable in key and quality.

"But she has not a symptom of style," mourned the reluctant sister-in-law—that-was-likely-to-be. "And, without beauty, dash, or money, it will be hard work to make society take hold of her. Her connections are wholly unrepresentable. O my poor brother! to what unaccountable infatuation are you a victim? I shall have the pleasure of receiving a call from you before long, I trust," said Irene, aloud, civil to the last, when the half-hour was over. "Our number is 94, Wilmot Square."

Cherry did not remind her of the extreme probability that she was familiar with Edgar's address. "Thank you," was again her response, and Miss Tilton was sure that Wilmot Square would not be troubled by her visits very often, if she ever so much as left a card at aristocratic 94.

Amelia was not invited, but the omission was ingeniously covered. "Pray present my love to your mother, Miss Browne," said the retiring duchess, "with my hopes that her indisposition may be merely temporary."

"This is lecture night, remember," Edgar was saying, aside to Cherry. "I shall call as usual."

She smiled, and Irene, glancing back in time to catch the passing illumination of her face, was startled into a modification of the judgment she had given a minute before. The girl might have capabilities, but were they worth improving, when the cost of the chance of doing this was so fearful?

"I will not take your verdict just now, Irene," said her brother, when they were again in the carriage, "for your aspect is not propitious. I can see that you have confounded the impression produced by the lady I took you to see with that left upon your mind by her surroundings and relatives. You will do her justice in time; I can wait, so certain am I of this."

"He shut my mouth entirely," Irene confessed to her married sister, Mrs. Leonard, at whose house she was set down instead of at her own door. "When he assumes that grave elder-brotherly manner, and condescends to overlook my foibles, I am powerless. But, Maggie, this is a deplorable business. Right here in the city, too, so that we must either affiliate with them or cut them. There is no such thing as glossing over the ineligibility of the connection, should Edgar marry her. Four sisters, a mother, and father, belonging to the least desirable type of shabby gentility."

"Who are they? And how came he to be mixed up with that sort of people? When did you first hear about it?" queried the matron. "This has fallen at my feet like a thunder-bolt."

"And at mine," sighed Irene. "That is because we were away all summer. Although he has been acquainted with these Brownes for a year, he tells me. He met this Cherry—her real name is Charity (think of it, my dear, Charity Browne!)—at a charade party given by Mrs. Doctor Patton, who is not half-careful enough whom she invites. This Cherry was a school-friend of her second daughter, Mary, and they see a great deal of one another still. She took a conspicuous part in the performances of that fatal evening, and was much noticed by the company. Mrs. Patton said a complimentary word of her to Edgar, and introduced him. That was the beginning. If you ask me how she went to work to fascinate him, I am as ignorant as yourself. She is not 'taking' in any sense of the word, almost ordinary in physiognomy, and with no manner whatever. Her father is a retail dry-goods storekeeper in Canal Street—a sort of haberdasher, I fancy. Edgar says he is an intelligent man, and ought to have been in prosperous circumstances, but has suffered heavily through the failures of others."

"Of course, that is always the cry of the unsuccessful," interposed Mrs. Leonard, whose husband was a dashing stock-broker. "Are they absolutely engaged?"

"Virtually. He has committed himself, but she had the grace to hesitate, through doubt of the reception we might give her. Edgar came to me with this story yesterday, and dwelt so strongly upon his determination to marry her, in spite of any objections we might raise, that I saw my wisest policy was to feign submission. I offered on the spot to call upon his Dulcinea, and he has been in fine spirits ever since. It would break my heart to be estranged from him," continued Irene, the tears springing to her eyes. "And mamma will not have him contradicted in anything on which he has set his heart. She says he has been the best of sons to her, and she will not interfere with his happiness, repugnant as is the idea of this match with a nobody, when she had hoped he would form a brilliant or, at any rate, a suitable alliance."

"Estrangement is not to be thought of," said Mrs. Leonard, who was the oracle of the tribe. "These family feuds are disagreeable and vulgar. Should this calamity seem inevitable, we must meet it with a decent show of fortitude. I am more than mortified at Edgar's conduct. I had hoped to do him a good turn this winter," lowering her voice.

"I comprehend," Irene nodded. "The same idea had occurred to me. They would make a splendid pair."

"But," pursued the elder sister, impressively, "I do not absolutely despair. Cups nearer the lip than is this often fail to reach it. We must combine our forces for strategy, not open opposition. We know Edgar too well to show fight. Better throw him off his guard by seeming to acquiesce in his plan. I tell you what," with sudden eagerness, "we will take her up forthwith and bring her out—not as his fiancée, that would make retreat difficult, but our protégée. As a preliminary, I will give Pauline a party. Nothing is more proper and natural, and I shall call forthwith upon the divine Charity. Next week, when my cards are issued, she and her sisters—the sprightly Amelia, at least, shall be invited. Edgar will be soothed and flattered by our prompt attention to his wishes. The state of his mind, when he sees his dowdy darling contrasted with the elegant women of his own circle, is a matter for which we are not responsible. He is fastidious, and, if we bring her forward with kindly officiousness, the effect must be striking."

"Maggie, you are a feminine Napoleon!" Irene laughed, then was sober and dubious. "It would be a terrible trial to her, if she is sensitive, and I fancy she is. I wish there were some more merciful way."

"She courts the lesson by aspiring to Edgar's favor," said Mrs. Leonard, magisterially.

"Moreover, if she has any sense of the fitness of things, she will not invite rivalry by entering society to which she is unused, and for which she is unfit. The penalty of presumption must be borne by the forward. One thing is sure. We cannot do worse than let this affair follow the course it is now taking."

Mrs. Leonard was an energetic—her enemies said an unscrupulous woman. Cherry returned from a walk, the following day, to find Amelia in a semi-ecstatic state engendered by a call from the noted leader of ton—the best dresser and most popular hostess in her clique.

"One of the most affable persons I ever met!" she cried, in her thinnest treble. "And so disappointed at not seeing you! She had listened to her brother's and sister's praises of you until she could no longer resist the temptation to call in person upon one she hoped to know so intimately in days to come. Mrs. Patton has been eulogizing you, too, it seems, and she—Mrs. Leonard—has great respect for her opinion. She would talk of nothing except you and our family matters—your taste for belles lettres, music, and drawing. And she fairly forced me to produce your portfolio!"

"Amelia!" Cherry's cheeks justified her name. "How could you?"

"She made me do it, as I told you, child, and where was the harm? I was right proud to show that you had talents for something higher than dress and gossip. She admired your touch, and finish, and subjects—every part of your pictures."

"She could not but say so." Cherry endeavored to speak unconcernedly. "She has seen too many really excellent ones to care for my sketches."

In her own room, she sat down to think over the visit and Amelia's communications with chagrin that nearly brought the tears to her eyes. She was not ashamed of her lowly home, or of those who shared it with her. Her sterling sense and sturdy independence upheld her appreciation of what was really estimable and of value in life. She honored her parents as truly as if their years of labor and self-denial had brought for their children wealth and its privileges. In one respect they had not stinted their offspring. Their educational advantages were far above those enjoyed by the majority of girls in their circumstances.

"It is all I shall be able to bequeath to them," Mr. Browne had reasoned when his acquaintances accused him of extravagance. "When I am taken from them they can support themselves. Or, should circumstances render this unnecessary, their education will fit them for any rank. It is, for man and woman, the good part which cannot be taken away."

Sensible Cherry, biting her lips and pinching her fingers in annoyance at the indiscreet frankness that had, she doubted not, furnished matter for the rich worldling's mirth, yet knew that her father's position was correct—that she could hold her own in higher circles than that of which Mrs. Leonard was autocrat.

"But she would not acknowledge this, nor would her compeers. Had I the wit and genius of De Staël, I could not shine in her saloons unless my toilet were handsome and fashionable. Miss Tilton, who is a commonplace woman of medium intelligence, threw me into the shade by her showy attire and the assured manner familiarity with the customs of polite society and the consciousness of looking well give even a silly person. As Cherry Browne, in such garments as my father can afford to buy for me, I must always be at a disadvantage in my intercourse with such people. Is it false pride, I wonder, that incited me to give music and drawing lessons secretly in order to procure a passable trousseau—in case I should need it?"

She had not been able to withhold from Edgar the answer he craved on the "lecture night" succeeding Irene's visit. There was really no apparent cause for keeping him longer in suspense. Armed with the sanction of mother and sisters, he presented himself triumphantly and took her consent for granted. Yet she had misgivings, and grievous ones. He was his own master, so far as age and means went, and she could not gainsay his declaration that his friends had offered no opposition to his dearest wishes. Irene's call, and, now, Mrs. Leonard's, set the seal upon his asseveration, but, for all that, Cherry trembled at heart; held long parleys with herself, and looked grave when her sisters—Amelia, especially—congratulated her upon her prospects.

"I am afraid I should feel like a candle in the wrong-socket," she had said playfully to Edgar when he urged her not to delay her call to Irene, and represented his mother's anxiety to know her.

"A bright light you will be anywhere," was his answer. "It shall be my care, one day, to provide a worthy place for my prize."

"He may be nearer right than I," mused Cherry, putting away discouragement with the thought. "I have said to myself a thousand times that all I asked of Fortune was a chance to prove what is in me to be and to do. Shall I be so faint hearted as to turn back now? Moreover," a warm flush tinting her face, "I love him! If he wants me, he shall have me—and never be ashamed of his choice!"

This was Friday, and on Tuesday arrived Mrs. Leonard's invitation.

"The understanding is, I suppose, that the party is given in honor of her husband's sister, Miss Pauline Leonard, who is spending the winter with her," said Amelia, proud of her knowledge of the great lady's household affairs. "But I have my own notion as to the reason why it comes off just now," looking at Cherry, who, with a very serious visage, was studying the thick satin sheet, surmounted by the Leonard monogram and crest.

"If you mean that it is in any way connected with me, you are mistaken," she returned, decidedly. "The very idea is preposterous."

Amelia was, usually, more good-natured with this one of her juniors than with the rest, and of late had petted her beyond her wont. "Ah, well!" she answered, indulgently. "We won't discuss that point, but let events decide who is in the right. We had better get tarlatane for dresses. It is more dressy than any other inexpensive material. I will wear blue with puffings of the same on skirt and waist, and you white with box-platings of rose-colored satin ribbon, double skirt and sash, with broad ends, trimmed in the same manner. Nothing could be prettier or more girlish. Then, Hannah, here, has such taste in hairdressing, that you won't need any other ornament than a few bright flowers. Jennie will lend you the laced handkerchief Aunt Jane gave her at Christmas, and mamma has several yards of real old lace, which we can work up into berthas."

"Tarlatane is not very cheap, after all, although it costs less than any other stuff used for party dresses," objected Cherry, in nowise elated by the picture of her costume, so cleverly sketched.

"Do not trouble yourself about that, my dear," said the mother, kindly. "We will manage to get it in some way. Papa may have some in the store that will do. If not, I will save the cost out of my housekeeping money. We are all willing to contribute to your enjoyment."

"Papa gave me money for a pair of new gloves, this morning," interposed Annie. "But I can mend up the old ones to last for another month. So there are your white kids, Cherry."

"And since I made over my merino, last week, I find that I do not want the de laine I had laid aside five dollars to buy," chirped Ellie, next in age to Cherry. "That will get the ribbon."

"I have no money, but I will make the dress, satin quillings and all," said Hannah, the swiftest seamstress of the quintette, "besides begging the flowers from old Mrs. Carmichael, who can refuse me nothing since I have fallen into the habit of reading aloud to her every Thursday afternoon."

"Could anything be more beautifully arranged?" Amelia beamed complacently upon the group. "That is the blessing of a large family. They can help one another."

"It is a blessing to be loved by so many—loved so truly and generously," replied Cherry, with a smile that flickered strangely with all its sweetness. "But I cannot accept your sacrifices, my dear sisters. I shall not attend this party, so there will be no need of them."

The tumult of astonishment and dismay bursting about her ears kept her from speaking again directly. Amelia had twice begged to know what she meant, and what construction she imagined would be put upon this gross violation of common courtesy, before Cherry thought it safe and wise to reply.

"I question if Mrs. Leonard really expects to see us," she said then, gently conciliatory of her senior's displeasure. "These are, I fancy, merely complimentary cards, for which we should thank her in our 'regrets.' She is sufficiently acquainted with our circumstances to understand the impossibility of our dressing as the majority of her guests can do, without encroaching unwarrantably upon funds which are needed for daily and practical uses. I have heard enough of the character of her famous assemblies to convince me that we should be blots upon the fair scene, if we were to appear in the dresses you have described, Amelia. They would do nicely for a 'sociable' at Mrs. Patton's, or a wedding among our present associates, but they would be voted mean and tawdry in the Tilton 'set.' And if the price of your gloves, Annie, and your dress, Ellie, could bedeck me in satin and pearls, I should sacrifice my self-respect by letting you despoil yourselves. The question then settles itself. I will not go where I shall be accounted an inferior, or be the subject of invidious remarks, on account of the plainness of my attire. It would be discreditable, because dishonest, were I to assume as fine feathers as those of the gay birds about me. Therefore, I hold fast to mine integrity by remaining at home."

"I cannot believe that you are in earnest," said Amelia, with forced calmness. "You talk of wilfully throwing away a golden chance of entering the choicest society the city affords—society from which nothing but our limited income has hitherto barred us, as if it were a question of no moment whatever. For my part, I do not fear comparison with more richly-dressed people so long as I respect myself. True merit will make its way."

"Granted, dear—if it can gain and keep the field long enough to display its true character. But party-goers are in chase of pleasure, not merit. Don't think that I account my station as really lower than Mrs. Leonard's. Only the world does, and holds that I forfeit, not earn respectability when I would force myself into company where I am not wanted or expected. And, if others did not suspect that I was sailing under false colors, I should know it, and suffer in my own estimation. One should not lose ground there, whatever may be the general opinion concerning her."

"Your engagement with Edgar Tilton is a charming illustration of your high-flown theories!" retorted Amelia, now thoroughly out of patience. "When you are married to him, shall you stay hiding in the chimney-corner when he is invited to the houses of his old friends, and meekly decline to be introduced to his mother lest she should take offence at your plebeian presence?"

Cherry's eyes flashed, but she held her voice in well. "The wife takes the husband's rank. He lifts, or lowers, her to his place, and holds her there. When the time you speak of comes, I shall dress as do my associates."

"My child!" exclaimed the mild mother, whose feelings lay perilously near the surface, "we—your father and I—have given you such clothing as we could afford. Our aim in life has been our children's happiness"—

"You have secured it, darling mother!" interrupted Cherry, dropping upon her knees and putting both arms about her parent's neck, her great, love-lit eyes looking into hers. "I only hope that my heart will beat as lightly and warmly under my 'silk attire,' as it has done under calico and de laine. Don't urge me to depart from the honest, straightforward road in which I have been trained to walk. Is it worth my while to obtain—supposing that I could—under false pretences, such gilded baubles as the notice of heartless, frivolous people who do not know you, and don't care to; who would not admit my noble father to their parlors and tables, and who would sneer more cruelly at pretension than at undisguised poverty? I am so safe here—so sheltered by our obscurity, so warmed by love and content! Let me stay while I am Cherry Browne."

Amelia kept her room for the rest of the day with a nervous headache.

"It is a genuine disappointment to her," said Hannah, compassionately. "She had always a hankering after the pomps and vanities. Yet I do believe you have acted wisely, Cherry. It is always safe to be consistent."

But the temptations of the stanch little democrat were not over. Mary Patton, her prime ally and confidante, ran in, late in the afternoon, brimfull of a promising scheme she had concerted with her mother since the arrival of Mrs. Leonard's card. She had several party dresses, one of which—a pink silk—had never been worn in the city which was her home. It would fit Cherry nicely, and the two girls—with Amelia, if she wished to go—could have Mrs. Patton's carriage, and make the entree of the halls of mirth in company. Cherry's resolute lips unbent somewhat as she listened. Her pride did not revolt at accepting favors from Mary. And if Amelia really panted for such social distinction as she fancied awaited her in Mrs. Leonard's mansion, it was unkind to keep her away. The combined resources of the family could fit her out quite creditably, if the price of the two tarlatanes were expended in the effort. It would be very pleasant, Cherry owned in her candid heart, to meet, on terms of apparent equality, Edgar's relatives and friends; to anticipate, by a few months, the justification of his choice she was confident would come in her day of opportunity. Did she not owe it to him to silence annoying rumors of her unfitness for the station to which he had elected her? And how could this be done more effectually than by the plan Mary proposed? The fancy sent the young blood tingling and brisk through her veins. Already she trod the soft pile of velvet carpets, breathed the delicious air, warm, fragrant, and throbbing with music and laughter; leaned upon Edgar's arm, and felt his eyes rest in happy pride upon her, nor dreaded the scrutiny of the curious throng.

"Pink is so becoming to you," Mary was saying, "and this is trimmed with point lace."

"Hush!" begged Cherry. "Let me think it out for myself." She pressed her fingers upon her eyeballs, as if to shut out the enchanting vision, and in the darkness reviewed the points of attack and reply, Mary sitting by, hopeful yet solicitous.

"Verdict for the defendant," said Cherry, at length, glancing up affectionately at her companion. "Don't be vexed, Molly. Consistency is a jewel I can't afford to lose, even to please you—and myself. The plumes would only be pinned on the jackdaw, and, if she could manage them so dexterously for one evening as not to be detected, people would be wondering how she got them. And on the morrow, and day after to-morrow, on every day, and holidays, she must appear in her rightful garb. I cannot do it. I have always detested and condemned the policy of keeping up appearances; starving six weeks in order to afford one company dinner, and carrying the meat and butter of six months upon one's back when she is 'got up' for exhibition to people who, after all, may not give the famished tortoise a second look. The poor ought to be proud—too proud to stoop to the meanness of trying to dissemble the truth, ostrich fashion, by hiding a little bit of it in the sand, while the bulky, uncomely body is exposed the more by the shallow trick. I'll be honest through and through. Comfort is better than glitter. I am just as much obliged to you as if I had accepted your offer, and more, for my gratitude is not tempered by shame."

Edgar was ordeal No. 3. He was in gay good-humor that evening; pleased with his sisters for their hearty approbation of his choice, with himself for having won the treasure, more than all with Cherry, whose attractions, he verily believed, had carried the Gibraltar of prejudice and ambition in the minds of his relatives. She came down to him in the blue merino, a pretty little cravat of buff and black ribbon joining her collar, a bow of the same in her hair. She had a wondrous knack of twisting silks and ribbons into bewitching little bows, and in all her attire was an air of exquisite neatness, approximating elegance, if it did not belong to a higher order of charms. Before long he began to talk of the ball.

"I shall come for you, of course, and bring your bouquet," he stated, as if the thing was settled beyond cavil or recall.

"You are very kind," faltered Cherry. It was harder than she had expected to cast a shadow upon the happy, loving face, to her the handsomest in the world. "But," very humbly, "do you really think I had better go, Edgar?"

"Go! What a question. Why, Irene told me to-day that the party was really in celebration of our engagement, although Pauline Leonard's visit is the pretext. It is, in effect, a public announcement of the relation we sustain to one another—a betrothal feast. I shall be proud to present you, queenie; how proud you cannot imagine."

"The name would sound like an absurd misnomer to everybody there," said Cherry, trying to laugh. "For the cloth of gold, and the ermine, and glass slippers are lacking, and are likely to be to the end of the chapter. That is the unvarnished truth. I don't see why I should be so much afraid to tell it to you. You know we are neither rich nor fashionable, but that is no reason I should advertise the circumstance in Mrs. Leonard's drawing-rooms. Miss MacFlimsey's predicament is really mine."

"What is the matter with the dress you have on?" queried Edgar, in man-like simplicity, whereat Cherry laughed outright.

"Nothing, I hope, for it is the only new one I have had this winter, and must serve me on Sundays and week days until spring. But does your sister wear dark merino to balls? You were her attendant last evening; how was she dressed?"

Edgar was first thoughtful, then disconcerted. "I am not an adept in describing feminine toilets," he demurred.

"You have a general idea of this one, I see," said the relentless inquisitor. "Don't be disingenuous, or I shall draw my own inferences."

A few more searching questions, and she extracted the information that Irene had "sporting a light-colored silk—lilac, or moonlight-on-the-lake, or mauve, or some other fashionable hue. It was shiny and heavy, with a train several degrees in length, besides being be-flounced and be-furbelowed astonishingly."

"With corresponding jewelry and laces," added wise Cherry. "Now," rising to put herself where the light would fall strongly and directly upon her, "look upon your mental picture, then upon this."

"You are a thousand times prettier, a million times dearer."

She pushed him back with both hands when he would have emphasized the decision.

"Prettier in your eyes, here and now. Dearer I trust I would be anywhere and always. But, for that very love's sake, you would not see me utterly eclipsed—blinded and borne down by more glittering lights? You will understand and agree with me on the evening of the party, if not before."

He did not agree with her now. So far was he from confiding absolutely in her judgment, that he combated her resolution artfully and earnestly for a while, and, when she stood firm, spoke more strongly of his disappointment and her obduracy and shortsightedness than either would have thought possible an hour ago, and left her with the equivocal hope that she would never have occasion to regret her failure to meet his desires in this one particular.

"I shall not introduce the subject again," were his last words, "but I wish you to understand that I do not consider your decision final or binding. Should you change your mind, my services as escort are entirely and joyfully at your disposal, even up to the eleventh hour. You have only to intimate a wish to avail yourself of them. Good-night!" He started off, aggrieved and magnanimous, and poor Cherry carried a tear-stained face and bruised heart up to the bed she shared with Hannah.

"It may be safe to be consistent," she thought, recalling her sister's aphorism, as she undressed cautiously, and swallowed her sobs, lest the sleeper should be aroused, "but it is not always pleasant. This single-handed battle is wearing me out."

Tired and worn she looked next evening when Edgar paid his accustomed call, although she met him with a loving smile, and led the conversation to sprightly topics, never suffering an allusion to their first difference of opinion. Very weary were face and attitude when he unexpectedly appeared before her on the gala-night, as she sat alone and pensive in the library. He was in evening dress, and his salutation was lively as tender.

"A coup d'état. Mary is outside in the carriage, my pet, with the regal robes. I make confession and petition in the same breath. I did not deliver the neat envelope you intrusted to me for Mrs. Leonard, because I surmised what was the import of the document. There is nothing to prevent my queenie's coronation except her own mistaken notion of expediency. I shall be miserable without you. Do you refuse to make me the happiest of my sister's guests? Come, love."

"Edgar, Edgar," moaned the tempted child, laying her head upon his arm, as he kissed her, "can't you, won't you, believe that principle, not caprice; duty, not wilfulness, hinder me from pleasing you? You may love me a trifle less now because I do not yield. I could not endure this, were it not for the firm persuasion that you will respect me the more one day for what you call my obstinate unkindness."

It was such a little thing to be heroic about, that Edgar and Mary were hardly censurable for the moody vexation that filled their minds on their way back to Mrs. Patton's.

"Take that," said Mary, curtly, to the servant who opened the carriage door, passing out the box containing the rejected pink silk. "I never want to see it again," she muttered, falling back in the carriage.

"Drive on," ordered Edgar, savagely, to the coachman.

After that his silence was so ominous, that his accomplice took alarm. "Cherry believes that she is doing right, Mr. Tilton," she ventured.

"I suppose she does," and she could elicit nothing more satisfactory.

He was very attentive to her that night, but he was oftener beside the belle of the evening, Miss Leonard, and Mary could not help feeling uneasy that this was so. If Cherry had only come, he would have had no eyes for the newer face. Pauline's aplomb, graceful dancing, ready repartee, her ringing laugh, and adroit flatteries, but, most of all, her Parisian toilet, made her the Cynosura of the brilliant throng. Her white satin train, crimson velvet bodice and tunic, trimmed with silver fringe; her diamond necklace and the narrow tiara incrustated with minute jewels, bearing in its front a solitaire of marvellous size and lustre, drew all eyes, and were the theme of every tongue.

"The most superb costume I have ever seen in America, take it all in all," remarked a critic of note to Edgar, sure of an attentive listener. "It is remarkable, even in this assembly, where taste and beauty are the rule. If you will watch the crowd for awhile, you will be surprised at the small number of even indifferently-dressed women, and the profusion of recherché toilets. Each lady present seems to have regarded it as a solemn duty to study æsthetics in apparel for her own and her hostess' sake, and the effect of the friendly rivalry is extremely pleasing."

Edgar opened his eyes and his understanding together, and stared about him.

"It is like a court ball, you see," continued the other, encouragingly. "If there had been a censor of costumes stationed in the ante-room, few would have been turned back. A thin sprinkling of dowdies heightens the charm of the tout ensemble. That girl with the limp muslin, for example, or she of the flimsy tarlatane. It looks like mosquito netting. No woman who has any self-respect wears tarlatane if she can beg, borrow, or buy any other material. It is the staple party-gear of factory girls and penniless pretenders to fashion."

The auditor's senses had not been trained to such fine powers of discrimination as were possessed by the critic, and he could only take in the leading characteristics of the variegated billows heaving and whirling about him. But the family resemblance of one bird of Paradise to another and to all the rest was not to be mistaken; and he thought, with heart-ache very near skin to remorse, and yearnings he could not define even to himself, that Cherry, in home-made mosquito netting, or uncomfortable in her honest soul while bedecked in the borrowed pink silk, would have been utterly out of her element here—only a shabby dove to be hawked at by merciless creatures of her own sex, pecked and wounded by wicked beaks, torn to pieces by a hundred talons. Not that he would not have gloried to stand beside her, and share her pain when he could no longer protect her. Had she followed his suggestions, and made her début in the blue merino, he would have loved her all the same, but the mere fancy made him hot and faint.

"I would not desert her were she condemned to the pillory, but I am nevertheless glad she is not," he meditated. "The author of the proverb about the duty of visitors to Rome was a true philosopher. Thank Heaven! my queenie is not 'butchered to make a Roman holiday.'"

"She didn't know enough to send me a regret," said Mrs. Leonard, within three feet of him. She had floated on the rainbow tide to Irene's side. "It is unfortunate that she has been too bashful or too cunning to show herself here. Fancy her by Pauline's side. Is not she magnificent? Le fiancé is evidently captivated to some extent. If his fair Charity had borrowed Amelia's green silk and red turban, or washed up one of her school-examination muslins, and entered the lists, she would have made the most admirable foil. The tableau would have been worthy of Punch. And there are so many connoisseurs present."

Edgar tapped the bare white shoulder with a sealed envelope. "I ought to have delivered it five days ago," he said, coolly, regardless of her start of consternation, "but I held it back with a purpose. Miss Charity did know enough to send a regret, you see. I hoped she would change her mind at the last minute and accept my escort. I am delighted, now, that she 'knew enough' to deny my foolish request."

He took his bride abroad the ensuing autumn for a year's travel. Returning to their home when the talk of the mésalliance had died into an occasional whisper of discontent, he set his candle in a socket befitting its value. A discerning public discovered, without loss of time, that there was no better-educated or bred woman in the "privileged class" than Mrs. Edgar Tilton; furthermore, that her taste in dress was irreproachable. She was the fashion before her first season was over.

"And this," said Mrs. Leonard, playfully, as the sisters-in-law stood grouped in Mrs. Tilton's drawing-room, awaiting the arrival of the guests bidden to an entertainment given by the last-named lady in honor of the newest bride—Mrs. Tremaine, née Pauline Leonard—"this is the shy girl who wrote me a regret because she had nothing to wear?"

"Less shy than proud," Cherry glanced up archly from the bracelet her adoring husband was clasping on her arm. "My excuse was truthful as my heart was sincere."

"As I am not look stylish in anything," pursued Mrs. Leonard, whose tongue was supple as ever. "You must always be queenie in any garb. Isn't that so, Edgar?"

"An eaglet is the king of birds, even in his callowness," rejoined Cherry, amiably forgetful of the past; "but, until his wings are grown, and his eyes can bear the glare of day, the nest is the place for him."

SLANDER.

BY REV. F. S. CASSADY.

—The jewel, best enamelled,
Will lose his beauty; and though gold 'bides still,
That others touch, yet often touching will Wear gold; and so no man that hath a name,
But falsehood and corruption doth it shame.

SHAKESPEARE.

HUMAN nature discovers its deep moral virus in no one thing more than its fearful capability of slander; and on the record of its actual moral obliquity this vice is undoubtedly its deepest and darkest stain. Slander lives by feeding on human character; and no marvel is it that its despicable agent is considered the world over as a monster in human flesh. And yet in almost every community the slanderer is a literal fact; he takes bodily shape before our eyes, and is seen in all our walks in life. Representatively, at least, he is ubiquitous, and, therefore, absolutely unescapable.

In the analysis of slander several vices are found to enter into its composition. Its first element is falsehood. A man can never be slandered by the truth, however much he may be damaged by it. As his reputation should never be more than his real character, he must stand of right on his personal record; and if the truth hurts in that case, the fault lies at his own door. But not to speak of the sheer fabrication frequently invented by the agents of this vice, it is very patent to any mind of ordinary perception that the truth itself may be so represented as to convey an actual falsehood. Nor is the tongue, the ordinary instrument of slander, always necessary to a lie: indirection is often the most efficient method of accomplishing this result. SWIFT portrays to the very life this species of slander in the following lines:—

"Nor do they trust their tongues alone,
But speak a language of their own;
Can read a nod, a shrug, a look;
Far better than a printed book;
Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down;
Or by the tossing of a fan,
Describe the lady and the man."

Another essential element of slander is theft. The moral enormity of the slanderer is seen in what he steals or attempts to steal; and judged by this standard he is the meanest kind of a thief. What is more valuable or precious to a man than his character? Is it not his life in a sense most important, and as such worth everything to him? Life, without that honorable recognition which character gives to a man, is hardly worth the possession; and yet it is after this precious jewel, his very life, that the slanderer hunts. Here is a keen edge and pungent truth in the oft-cited words of SHAKESPEARE:—

"Good name, in man or woman,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls.
Who steals my purse, steals trash;
'Tis something, nothing; but he
That filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him!
But makes me poor indeed."

The slanderer, whether successful or not in his desperate work, is always a thief in motive and design. Often there is not elasticity enough in the bow to send the arrow to the mark, but that is not the fault of the archer. If the slanderer fail to wrest the diadem from the brow of virtuous merit, it is from sheer impotency that his purpose miscarries. He aimed to do so, and is, per consequence, a moral highwayman. The limitation of his influence, as expressed by HEVVEY, is not without its comfort to every true character:—

"Slander, that word of poisons, only finds An easy entrance to ignoble minds."

Another vice which enters largely into the character of slander is malice. "Malice is a disposition to injure others without cause for mere personal gratification," says Webster. If these terms describe the character of a slanderer, how despicable, beyond all utterance, is he? To be capable of hating virtue and of seeking to wrong moral excellence—and all this from pure malevolence of heart—argues a spirit that better befits pandemonium than the pale of human society! And yet there are such spirits abroad all over the face of civilization. Where are they not, reader? Who has not seen them? In his portraiture of the DIABOLUS of detraction, the great bard has forcibly as truthfully said:—

"Slander! Whose edge
Is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose Breath rides on the frosting winds, and Doth belie all the corners of the world:
Kings, queens, and States, maids, and matrons,
Nay, the secrets of the grave, this viperous
Slander enters."

We complete our analysis of slander by remarking, that, in addition to falsehood, theft, and malice, by which it is ever characterized, its animus is essentially mean and dastardly. The most despicable of all cowards is the slanderer. He needs to wrap about him the investiture of night before he can essay his demon-like work. Not unfrequently, under the sacred name of friendship, does he covertly aim a blow at the virtue and purity which stamp him by comparison with villainy. He does not take the responsibility of open opposition; but must needs strike, coward-like, in the dark, as the serpent bites in the grass. When most a friend in profession, then is he most a fiend in reality.

His love is that of IAGO to OTHELLO—RUIN! Pope throws the character of the dastardly slanderer in true colors upon the canvas, when, in speaking of the method he observes in doing his work, he says of him:—

"He damns with faint praise, assents with civil leer,
And, without sneering, teaches the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hints a fault and hesitates dislike."

But the real man—that man who rears the superstructure of character high enough for the world to gaze upon its noble proportions—will have enemies. It cannot be otherwise. The excellencies and virtues which adorn his character are in themselves a silent rebuke to the ignoble and vulgar herd; and that which cannot be imitated will be most certainly traduced by them. So it has been all along the history of the ages, and so it is now. These human cormorants follow in the wake of manly excellence and virtuous merit,

"As ravenous fishes do a vessel follow
That is new trimmed; but benefit
No farther than vainly longing."

ELEONORE.

(Translated from the French of Parry.)

BY JOHN L. COLLINS.

"Parry was sent to France when quite young to be educated, and he pursued his studies with honor at the college of Rennes. It is said that in his youth he had taken the resolution of leading a monastic life, and even passed some of his time with the Brothers of 'La Trappe'; but some obstacles determined him to leave the cloister and enter the military service. At the age of twenty he made a voyage to the Isle of Bourbon, where he saw and loved a young creole (Eleonore B—), about fourteen years old. She, however, married a rich colonist, and the poet was much affected by her loss. He remained faithful to his passion all his life, and the name of Eleonore will live with his own."

LADRYED.

ALAS! the time has come, Eleonore,
For youthful dreams to vanish all,
And we must dry the tears forever
That vain regret would fondly call.
The days are past that once permitted
Youth's foolish sighs and tender play,
And since the times have changed so sadly
We, too, must change as well as they.
The pleasures long we both have cherished
Have fled, no more to wreath the face,
And since our love is now forbidden,
Let friendship try to fill its place.
I leave thy lovely isle in sorrow,
The spot alike of hope and loss,
And then the ocean placed between us
Shall be the gulf that none may cross.
'Tis meet that we should part forever,
And duty is my law—adieu;
I know my life shall be more tranquil
For having breathed love so true.
Though destiny should mark my pathway
Henceforth through life away from thine,
Apart, should thy sweet life be happy
The sacrifice may sweeten mine.
Still with me ever shall thine image
In memory live, till life be o'er;
No longer when it cheers my vision,
Then, only, love, I live no more!

LITTLE GRETCHEN; OR, AN EVENING AT THE "SCHUETZENFEST."

BY L. S. C.

"AH, doctor! I am glad I met you! We are getting up a party to attend the Schuetzenfest, and want you to join us." This was the manner in which my friend Captain B— accosted me one morning, a few days since, as I was stepping into my carriage to make my accustomed round of visits. I replied that I had not time, as there would probably be patients who would need my attention. Then followed a short, persuasive argument, and we parted with the understanding that I was to try and go up in the course of the day.

After my numerous visits, in which every one was fortunately doing well, I took my way to the grand festival of my German friends. It was six o'clock before I reached the enchanted realm, and not seeing the captain, I made up my mind to look round. Nothing had been spared to render the place inviting and picturesque. The many stands for lager were set off by festoons of the American and German flags, with here and there a banner belonging to this particular association. In among the trees, which skirted the many walls, was a sausage stand, ornamented by a most ludicrous picture, representing the man who ate sausages, and the man who did not. To my mind, the enormous size of the former was as painful to reflect upon as the skeleton proportions of his companion. Further on, were arbors for such refreshments as soda, cream, cake, etc. The two pavilions of flying horses were also well adorned by flags and evergreens, while the whole was enlivened by merry groups and promenaders, whose happy faces seemed never to have known a care. The men, with their neat suits and graceful plumes; the women, in gay holiday attire, held a great interest for me.

There were also pavilions for dancers, and a "concert band," which performed most beautifully in another part of the grounds for the benefit of those who were fond of opera. In the centre of the park was erected an inclosed canopy, under which was displayed the various prizes. The first was an elegant gold-mounted rifle, then gold medals, sewing-machines, China sets, silver service, clocks, watches, ornaments, etc. I saw nothing there I should have valued at less than ten dollars. Presently I saw a small crowd approaching, and, upon nearer inspection, found it was the king, in other words, the one who had been the most successful in shooting—the winner of the highest honors. Attendant upon him was a man carrying an enormous bottle some three feet long, which had once been filled with Rhine wine, but was now two-thirds empty. Following this man came a boy bearing a goblet that corresponded in size with the bottle. All were in high glee; the king's broad, merry face was lighted by the jolliest of smiles, and, catching sight of me, he ordered some of the wine to be passed to the stranger. Forthwith the immense goblet was held under the mouth of the mammoth bottle, and half filled with superior wine; this was presented to me with great ceremony by the lad, and I drank to the health of the king a good draught, returning the glass; his majesty thanked me, and drained it.

By this time the shades of night were falling fast, and soon the grounds presented a most dazzling appearance. Wherever I turned the grove was a-blaze with numberless lamps and brilliantly-tinted transparencies, with here and there a flashing star formed of torches, or an arch of rainbow-colored lights.

As I wandered about, I saw a crowd collected at one extremity of the grounds, and directed my course thither to learn the cause. It was presently apparent; upon a tight-rope stretched some sixty feet high, from tree to tree, was a man who moved cautiously yet gracefully forward, risking life and limb, for a hundred dollars a night. It was a giddy sight, and, as I gazed, another flashed across my mind another grove, another tight-rope, another gay throng gathered at a Schuetzenfest, and my heart grew sick within me. I turned away, to sink weak and trembling upon the seat of a deserted arbor. Bowing my head upon my hands, I passed again through all the horrors of that "long ago."

Five years had not taken one pang from the thrilling incident. Again I saw the brightly-illuminated park, the tight-rope, the gay throng. I noted again a heavily-built, pitiless-looking man holding by the hand a delicate child, dressed as a dancer. I saw the great tears in the blue eyes, and heard the piteous cry of "O father! I cannot! I cannot dance to-night! My head aches! it is so dizzy! Oh, I will dance all day to-morrow! I will go without my supper. I will do anything! but I am afraid to!" The child was interrupted by a rude shake and oath from the brute who held her.

"You shall go without your supper and dance too," he growled; "now don't let me hear another word from you. If you fail, I will beat you until you are black and blue!"

The child's head sank upon her breast, and she was led passively forward. I had been really stunned by the terrible brutality I had overheard, but pressed through the crowd, in time to see the child step upon the rope, holding her balance pole. The rope was some twenty-five or thirty feet above the ground; she stepped upon it timidly, advancing slowly to the centre, while the band played a lively march. She seemed to gain confidence as she proceeded, and I hoped all would be well. The people were loud in their applauses, as one after another of the daring feats were accomplished upon the trapeze which was suspended from the centre. At length the child stood again upon the rope, this time without her balance pole; she walked quickly forward, with the evident intention of again executing some risky gymnast. When a few paces from the centre, she raised her hand to her head, swayed an instant, uttered a shriek, and fell. The second she had remained upon the rope gave some of the more present-minded opportunity of springing forward to save her. I had been on the alert, and was the first to start. I was in time, she fell in my arms, and both of us, by the concussion, were brought to the ground. In a moment I was upon my feet, but she lay insensible upon the grass. My medical knowledge was now called into requisition. I had the child conveyed to the nearest house and laid upon a sofa; then I worked over her for half an hour, while the father, in a rage, paced the floor, muttering to himself. When others were in the room, however, he counterfeited deep anxiety, and even forced a few tears, through his hypocritical lids.

I could have hung him with good relish, and more than once turned round with the intention of knocking him down, but desisted for little Gretchen's sake—that is what I had heard him call her.

At last she revived, and, ordering my carriage, I accompanied her to the poor house in which they lived. It proved to be only a square from my own residence, where I kept bachelor's hall. They had but one small room, with a bed and a few chairs. Gretchen's mother came forward to greet me, as I carried her child from the carriage to the room, way up two flights of rickety stairs, and laid her on the hard bed.

The woman was very slender and pale, with many gray hairs in the light tresses that were neatly brushed and twisted at the back of her head. She turned much paler as she saw my burden, but her husband's look sealed the bloodless lips that had framed a cry of agony. I did all I could, and when at last I turned to go, I said I would send some broth for the child, and come again in the morning. The mother looked the gratitude she dared not utter, while the man growled out, "he didn't think there be no need for me to come ag'in." As I passed out, I spoke to a kind-looking woman who was at the door, and asked her to look out for the child, also to come for me if she grew worse, backing my request with two dollars. I was perfectly infatuated with the little invalid and her mother, besides having a most intense desire to shoot the man.

It was half-past twelve when I threw myself upon the lounge in my study and fell to thinking, intending to go to bed in a short time; but the hours rolled on, and I was chained by Morpheus to the realm of chimerical phantoms. Suddenly I was roused by a furious ring at the door bell. Springing to my feet, I rushed out. The servant had already opened the door, and before me stood the woman I had requested to keep me posted. Gretchen had been my first thought upon waking, and I was prepared to hear the words: "O sir! Gretchen is!"— I waited for no more. Hatless, coatless, and in my slippers, I hastened out, telling my boy to bring my portable box of medicines.

In advance of the woman I entered the house of poverty. It was about seven o'clock. Up, up I sped, passing into the room of my prodigy without any prelude. The man was not there; but the mother sat up in bed, with wild eyes and loosened hair, her night-robe still on, while beside her lay Gretchen very still. I pressed to the bedside, and took the little sufferer's hand, expecting to find it burning with fever. I no sooner touched it than I started back with horror. It was cold and stiff in death. I could not mistake that icy pressure; and, yet, I threw aside the scant covering that partly concealed the face, and placed my ear to the heart in the vague hope that I was mistaken. But no! she had passed from this world, beyond pain, beyond recall. Congestion of the brain. I had not been prepared for this; and, strong physically and mentally as I was, I was obliged to take a chair, and bow my head upon my hands for several moments, to regain my self-possession. Then, for the first time, the mother spoke. I raised my head and watched her, as she smoothed the hair from her child's brow, and looked down smilingly into her face, saying: "Poor little Gretchen! how long she sleeps. She is tired, very tired. She said 'Good-night, mamma,' and then she went to sleep on my arm, and has slept so nice ever since. My poor, tired little Gretchen." Then, after a pause, she said, in a tender voice, "Gretchen, dear, father will come soon and beat you if you ain't up. Gretchen, Gretchen," then with a shriek of frenzied agony she threw up her arms, crying, "She's dead! she's dead! O Gretchen! Gretchen!" And then she shook the lifeless clay, pressed it close to her, and covered the cold, still face with burning kisses, in the frantic hope that she could wake her child to life.

The woman was crazed by this new sorrow, and required my most active attention for the next hour. I had her removed to my own house; and, after giving directions for her comfort, went again to the little room where lay the corpse watched by my boy. The father had not yet returned; and, with the assistance of the landlady, I got the child into a pretty coffin, which was also conveyed to my house and set in the parlor.

I saw plainly the child had been dead for some hours; in fact, she must have died about one o'clock that morning, and the poor mother had slept since that time with this precious clay upon her heart, never dreaming but that the pulse beat as regularly as in the day's past. Truly "God works in a mysterious way His wonders to perform."

I avoided an inquest, and had the child buried quietly in a Christian church-yard. The father had been dumb with awe and anger when he stood beside the bier of his little daughter, and raved like a madman because she could no longer be a source of profit to him. Then I turned and told him that if he did not leave the house and city immediately, I would deliver him to the authorities as the murderer of the child. He slunk away without a word, and I never saw him again.

The mother lived for three days, never once having a lucid moment; then, with the name of "Gretchen" upon her lips, she died, and we laid her beside her child. * * * I lifted my head, and saw that part of the ground in which I sat was nearly deserted. A full hour had passed 'mid these terrible scenes of memory. The schuetzenfest had lost its charm. I shuddered as I passed the coil of rope that had so recently supported a human being, and as soon as possible left the park with a heart made heavy with the sufferings of others.

I approve the schuetzenfest, and have enjoyed it, but can never attend another while memory holds her sway.

THE FAY OF THE HEARTHSTONE.

BY MAGGIE LUTE SULLIVAN BURKE.

'Twas a cottage, I remember,
Brown with age, and quaint in style;
Climbing roses at its gables,
Flinging back the sunbeam's smile;
Clean the hearth was swept and garnished
In the golden summer tide,
When we decked its empty cavern
With the maple like a bride;
And a cricket in the shadow
Merry music nightly made,
Chirping benison to bless us,
As our father, kneeling, prayed.
But that hearth, its crowning glory,
Snatched from winter's grudging hand,
As the red blaze spread a halo
O'er the bright heads of our band;
While through mystic eve we lingered
Cracking nuts beside the hearth,
Tracing pictures in the embers,
Dancing wintry hours to mirth;
And the cricket in the shadow
Chirped in time with merry feet,
Giving joy a fuller measure
In youth's fleeting hours so sweet.

I have found earth's pleasures hollow,
Thirst for fame an empty dream;
I am weary, oh! so weary,
Of the loves that only seem.
Then, have pity, Time, have pity!
Knock upon that humble door!
I would rest for one brief moment
In the scenes so loved of yore;
Though the cricket in the shadow
Chirps alone upon the hearth,
In my heart the old-time measure
Still will echo youthful mirth.

Ah! Time's feet turn never backward,
Dust and mould sit on that hearth,
Where the green bough and the yule-log
Ere made bright each new joy's birth.

On the hill-side, 'neath the willow,
Creeping o'er two lowly tombs,
Every year the gable roses
Scatter all their wealth of blooms;
But the cricket in the shadow,
As it chirps the olden song,
Hath again invoked my childhood,
Silent 'mid life's cares so long.

Our bright band is scattered sorely,
Yet the olden hearthstone shines;
For that Fay, who guards its portals,
Weaves her spell o'er newer shrines;
And, although we've built our altars
With the distance wide between,
She has spanned its weary measure
With a bridge of golden sheen;
And the cricket in the shadow
Keeps the toll-gate, where we pay,
When we turn our footsteps thither
With a sigh, the right of way.

A GLIMPSE OF NATURE.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

Shut up within the city's heart,
I longed for fields and meadows green;
What joy could crowded streets impart?
The roots had stirred with sudden start;
The skies above me shone serene;
Old earth was gay
In fresh array—

Spring wore a tender, gracious mien.

A happy chance fell in my way—
I caught a glimpse of Nature's face;
How bright the country looked that day!
I breathed the balmy air of May,
Not bounded by a given space
Of brick, and lime,
And dust, and grime,
But fresh and pure from spring's embrace.

A shadow faint the young leaves cast,
And trembled as with vague delight,
When fragrant winds went hurrying past;
The tiny sprouts shot upward fast,
And buds unborn, far out of sight,
With rapture filled,
Awoke and thrilled
Beneath the sunshine, warm and bright.

Nor was there lack of dainty bloom;
The lilacs scented all the air
With breaths of subtle, rare perfume;
Shy violets peered from out their gloom,
And stainless gleamed the snowballs fair;
With footsteps light
Each flower-aprile
To various blossoms gave her care.

The fields, through winter bare and dead,
Now wore a dazzling emerald hue,
With wavy spikes of grass o'erspread,
Not yet profaned by mortal tread.

Was Eden fairer to the view
On that bright morn
When man was born,
And this old world was fresh and new?

The vision faded like a dream;
The city's din assails my ear;
But, ah! how sweet that transient gleam
Of scenes where Nature reigned supreme.
It may be dull and dingy here,
But fancy still Recalls at will
Those trees, and fields, and skies so clear.

ALICE MARTIN.

BY MRS. HOPKINSON.

ALICE and Ellen Martin played with their dolls in an attic room in Pleasant Alley in Boston. Pleasant Alley is unpleasant enough now, and was then, being a narrow lane leading out of Pleasant Street. Probably the street once deserved its adjective; but, like many other streets, where the houses are large and handsome still, it gives token of the advancing tide of emigration, and that the original proprietors have been washed away by the dreaded wave. In the very house where these two children played, a lieutenant-governor once held his social court, and in the large parlors, now occupied with huddled poverty and wretchedness, at no very distant day crowded beauty and fashion in silks and satins through the mazes of the cotillon.

Mrs. Martin and her two little girls were one out of sixteen families occupying the stately residence, at the back of which ran the alley, and where they had to their three selves two decently-sized attic rooms, lighted by sloping windows. If they looked out of one window, they saw the chimneys on the opposite side of the alley; and from the other they had, in clear days, not only a good view of Dorchester Heights, but also of the blue harbor, and the bluer hills of Milton in the distance. For this reason Mrs. Martin had so arranged her furniture that the southerly and holiday aspect should seem to fall on the leisurely table and two chairs, which betokened a parlor, rather than on the form and two tubs, which expressed active occupation quite inconsistent with the picturesque. She had, as it were, two lives within her little domain of twenty-four square feet. One of labor and vexation of spirit, which she confided to the northerly portion; and one of cheerful imaginings at the other end, where she rested herself in the chatter and smiles of her girls, and the still blue air of the heaven around her. She was aware of a house full of noisy families below her; but she had rented the whole of the attic floor that she might be secure from turbulent intrusion, and she had been able thus far to live in comparative comfort and quiet. Very little furniture encumbered Mrs. Martin's apartments. She wished very often for more, not having learned Thoreau's consoling maxim, that the more you have, the more you must look after.

In her parlor are her bed, her bureau, and the two chairs each side of the little table. The Bible, with the family record of births, deaths, and marriages through the last fifty years, rests on the table, which, indeed, is consecrated to this purpose; and above hang a pair of shears and a holder of red and black flannel diamonds, just as it used to look in the old keeping-room at home in Barton. Mrs. Martin has a kind of mournful habit of looking at these reminders. She would not but have them, though they give her some pain; and she groans over the past, though it was no better than the present. Comparing herself and her lot with that of people she meets on the sidewalk, or in hacks, who don't seem to have any washing to do, she frequently grumbles at being obliged to carry home packages and baskets. At such times, she forgets to be glad that she has sufficient employment and liberal payment. Indeed, she rarely takes that view of the subject. Being of New England blood, pure and direct from the pilgrims, she has that discontent with present surroundings, and that sense of deserving the best there is going, which lies at the root of the Yankee character, and is oftentimes the spur to gloomy and continuous effort. The other room is devoted to cooking and washing, and has its implements accordingly. The stove and dresser for the few dishes, the cupboard below, and the tubs in full operation, fill all the vacant space; while a door beyond opens into a dark unfinished closet, in which Mrs. Martin keeps all the things which she never expects to use again in her life, but which she cannot endure to give to the rubbish-man. They are piled closely in the dark room, where, in time, they will collect sufficient moth and mould to loosen the tight hold they now have on Mrs. Martin's heart. There is such a dark room in every house, holding old memories, old trunks full of that past which will cling to us painfully and tenderly, but which we cannot remove without making a callus that we dread even more than the laceration.

A curtain of faded patch is drawn across one corner of the parlor, and behind it Alice and Ellen play with their clothes-pin dollies. Doubtless, they also have the discontent which the poet says is immortality, and have their views touching wooden or even waxen dolls. They have every opportunity for being uncomfortable, when they walk out, for the cheap store at the corner abounds in dolls. Nevertheless, being still young and hopeful, they enjoy their little possible in the shape of clothes-pins, where they have picked out two eyes with a pin, and are joyful over the first shapings of the art instinct within them. Some ribbon ends, which a kind-hearted milliner gave them once, suffice to glorify the baby-house, and furnish the two little girls with gorgeous material for the imagination. They are never weary with dressing and undressing the patient clothes-pins, which, however, seem also capable of great misconduct at times, for Mrs. Martin distinctly hears Ellen disciplining an unruly one, with the terrible addition, "Not a word!" Little despots they are behind their curtain, and Mrs. Martin says to herself she will remember to tell Miss Harly, when she comes in, about Ellen's emphatic directions.

Mrs. Martin washes vigorously, and thinks of nothing at all but the clothes, and how like the furies they are boiling on the stove. The steam goes out in a close column through the open window before her. She can see the ends of the bars on which she will presently hang Mrs. Elwyn's clothes. There is a hot sun and a good breeze, and they will have a clear drying. Thinking of Mrs. Elwyn's clothes brings Carrie Abbot to mind, Mrs. Elwyn now, Carrie Abbot that was. Goodness gracious! To think of the ups and downs in this world! That stupid girl—always at the foot of the class in the town school—she used to rub her cheeks with beet-juice to make them red. Kept a little milliner's shop in Brighton, and now—to see the Valenciennes on these underclothes! It is the misfortune of her doing Mrs. Elwyn's washing that it will keep Carrie Abbot so in her mind.

"And I might have had Eben Elwyn forty times over. A fellow that don't know enough to go in when it rains. Much good she gets of him. How such underwitted people come to live in Beacon Street and ride in carriages beats me."

This she thinks, half-regretfully, half-disdainfully, as her memories keep time with the rhythmical motion of her hands on the rubbing-board, and an uncomfortable tune sings itself in her now busy brain. How she would have started if any spirit of good had whispered in her ear, "This is envy, my dear, and of the devil." In fact, if there was any feeling she abhorred, and felt herself incapable of, it was, indeed, this same one of envy. Many a time had she thanked God that she envied nobody.

Mrs. Martin has never known what it was to have enough; in that respect resembling Mrs. Elwyn herself and most other people, though they may count hundreds of thousands; yet she is better off now than at any time during Mr. Martin's lifetime. Steady at his carpenter's work, honest in his dealings, pleasant in his family, what a treasure of a husband he must have been! And, indeed, so he might have been, but for a certain thoughtlessness and selfishness, which underlie most characters, even such as are called very good. This man gave to Indian missions, and was sorry about the women in zenanas, who see nobody all their lives. He even set apart twenty-five cents a year for charities, mission-work, and Sunday-schools. He obeyed a certain vague sentiment of duty to the unhappy world at large in this annual outlay; but he obeyed a strong instinct of pleasurable habit in his daily pipe, his constant quid, and his comfortable glass of rum three times a day. Any one, who can count, may see that these innocent little satisfactions, which cost him nothing in the estimation of the community, nor even in his own family, must prevent his having many other pleasures: such, for instance, as better sized, better furnished, and better located rooms; such pleasures as an occasional drive into the green sweet country with the wife and children; or even that of a sum laid by in the savings bank out of his weekly wages in case anything should happen to himself, such as death, for instance. But no one ever dreamed of calling Mr. Martin thoughtless or selfish. Nevertheless, as the poet saith, "we do receive but what we give," and so it came to pass that when Mr. Martin departed this life, the tears of the widow and children were on the outside of their faces, where they flowed decorously, and were dried easily. How could they break their hearts over a person with whom they had no pleasanter associations than eating, drinking, and smoking, and not a recollection of a single happiness conferred through his thoughtfulness or self-sacrifice? When the funeral was over, and the expenses paid, Mrs. Martin saw herself a destitute widow, with two children to provide for, and only five dollars in hand. However, it did not occur to her to blame anybody for her destitution, least of all Mr. Martin. Besides, she had health and two hands.

Mr. Martin, at the opening of this story, had been dead two years, and his widow is far more comfortable than she had ever been during his life. This condition she had attained by taking in washing, which Miss Hardy suggested as an excellent business, paying well and requiring a small amount of capital. And it is through Miss Hardy the carpet-woman that Mrs. Martin obtained Mrs. Elwyn's nice laundry-work to do, which of itself gives her almost a decent support. In the last two years Mrs. Martin has dressed the children prettily, and sent them to school; she has a good balance at the savings bank, and in case of sickness could command over a hundred dollars. She has health and a quiet mind; and if it were not for the Mordecai sitting at the king's gate in the shape of Carrie Abbot, Mrs. Martin would be almost happy.

Not the sort of happiness that comes from a better nature and better character than her own small faculties and limited growth can furnish; not the kind of noble happiness that Miss Hardy has; who living for others always, and for herself not at all, has seen the work of her life prospering under her hands, and enjoys in the love of many the pure pleasure which no selfish satisfaction could give her. The poor carpet-woman was reared in abundance and even luxury, and found herself at eighteen the elder sister and guardian of four orphan children, like herself destitute, and, unlike herself, delicate in health. She has lived to see them all, through her own labor, well settled, with their children happy around them, and an abundance of this world's goods. Why, then, does she keep on making carpets now that she is forty years old and more? Mrs. Martin wonders. But that is a secret. Perhaps Miss Hardy has some other benevolent object in her head. Perhaps she likes to work, having worked so many years; and possibly the brothers and sisters who are scattered here and there, but always on the highest seats—for Miss Hardy's daily toil ground out the means of advancement for them all—these brother's wives, perhaps, or these sister's husbands, may not have liked to furnish their parlors with anything so homely and old-fashioned as Aunt Martha. This much is certain, she never visits Harry in New York, nor Samuel in Albany, nor Maria at Newport. But every week she passed a comfortable evening with Mary Martin, and she always spoke of Harry, and Samuel, and Maria with the greatest tenderness, and of their children with overflowing love. Mrs. Martin did not see how much more thoroughly Martha Hardy enjoyed a chat in the garret than a drive on Newport sands; perhaps because she had not like Martha tried them both.

Miss Hardy is not a piece of perfection, otherwise she would be intolerable to Mary Martin. She is excessively fond of detail, vulgarly called gossip, and as she has a thousand opportunities of observation in the different families whose carpets she makes, mends, and nails down, she has a certain relish in serving up to the attentive ear of Mary Martin all manner of family scandal. Both of these good women have the same sort of delight in the revelation of the daily and real events of life that many others have in the wonderful stories that come out in the New York Ledger. Neither of them like to read; but human nature is an interesting book, open to all who have opportunity or skill, and, having bound Mary Martin to secrecy, Miss Hardy has a real delight in telling over the things that keep happening in families, but which are inaccessible to the newspaper reporter. Thus, from Miss Hardy, who made, and darned, and turned and twisted Mrs. Elwyn's carpets, until they were sent to auction, a wonderful specimen of darts, Mrs. Martin knew as well as any outsider could, all about the house in Beacon Street and everything that went on in it. Both knew better than the mistress of it, how the master of the house, being laughed at in the streets, and snubbed and overridden in the house, had taken to solacing himself with private liquid consolations; and both of them were highly amused with the small economies which are so usual and so astonishing in large houses.

Over her tub, this morning, Mary Martin recalled some of these petty scandals; nor thought, while she vexed herself inwardly at the delicate lace she was squeezing out, that already the messenger of fate to her and hers was on the way. Nearer and nearer it came to the unconscious scrubber; it opened the lower door and ascended the stairway, then another, and another, and still Mrs. Martin kept on squeezing, and muttering, and envying the wearer of such beautiful Valenciennes lace. A quick, decided rap, and then the door opened from the impatient fate outside. It would seem as if the little twelve-foot room had never expected so many frounces and ruffles, so much parasol and bonnet, and such a sparkle all over as now entered; for it seemed to shrink into itself, as if it would be glad to cover itself up in its occupying tubs and its thick vapor, or fly away out of the window. When Mary Martin looked about for a place for her guest to stand or sit, there was literally none, and, wiping her smoking arms from the hot water, she hastened to lead the way into the recess beyond, that stood for a parlor. Seating herself on the one chair while her guest occupied the other, she waited, wonder-stricken, for the cause of Mrs. Elwyn's visit.

"I saw your children on the sidewalk, yesterday. They told me who they were. I was struck with the looks of one of them. Where are they? What a dreadfully hot place you live in!"

"It is hot," answered Mrs. Martin, wiping her face, down which the vapor was streaming.

Mrs. Elwyn had met Mary Martin several times before, but she never recognized in her a juvenile or schoolgirl acquaintance; she was simply her laundress; and when Mrs. Martin looked on her employer, she saw no longer the girl, Carrie Abbot, the heroine of her envious and angry meditations. She saw, as it were, a splendidly-bound photograph album, all beclasp'd and bedizened, instead of the common pamphlet she had been wont to handle daily and speak slightly of; and to-day Mrs. Elwyn was got up regardless of expense. Her hoops alone so filled the house of Mrs. Martin that there was no room for the resident family, and she was exceedingly awful in the might of her adornings. Mrs. Martin remained dumb, and the children behind their curtain ceased to chastise the clothes-pins.

"And why do you live here, Mrs. Martin?" inquired the bright apparition, as she drew from her pocket the most glittering of fans, and threw back from her shoulders the Frenchiest of lace mantelets, "I should think even the cellar itself would be cooler at least," she added, insultingly.

What a close, mean, miserable place it was, to be sure!

Now, if Mary Martin had had coolness, or self-possession, or dignity, or any of that sort of quality that is good to defend one's self with; but she hadn't a particle. She could not look Mrs. Elwyn in the face and say, quietly, "Was that what you came to see me about?" She could only say, meekly, being so overborne and overwhelmed by this much-dressed woman—

"It is healthier here for the children. The air is good, though it is warm. They would hear a great deal, lower down, I don't want them to—swearing, street talking, and such!"—

"Where are your children?" said Mrs. Elwyn, interrupting her.

"Come out here, girls!" said the mother. The little twins crept from under the curtain, and stood bashfully by their mother's side.

"That is the one I mean," said Mrs. Elwyn, pointing to Alice, who had half hidden her face. Ellen was more self-possessed, and was furtively taking an inventory of the visitor's flounces. "Come here to me, child," said Mrs. Elwyn, smiling down benignantly at Alice. "Now do you see, Mrs. Martin! Look at her eyes! Why, don't you see they are the very counterpart of mine? Upon my word, she looks enough like a niece of mine to be her own sister! She has our family eyes. Yours are black, like the other one's. How came she by these Abbot eyes? Blue eyes with dark brows and eyelashes. Why, don't you see yourself, Mrs. Martin, they are precisely like mine, and not the least atom like yours? Isn't it queer?"

"Well, I must say they are like yours," said Mrs. Martin, half pleased and half angry. The whole manner of Mrs. Elwyn irritated her almost beyond bearing. The fine lady held the child by one hand, while she stared fixedly into the blushing face and fell into a reverie. It seemed a long time before the reverie was broken. Mrs. Martin opened the stove-door and poured water to the baking beans, and Ellen, who had finished her catalogue of Mrs. Elwyn's finery, stood rubbing her pretty dimpled arms against each other and lifting her wondering brown eyes to the meditative face of the lady.

There was a marked contrast between the twins, and, as sometimes happens, one seemed to have absorbed, to a great extent, the vigor which should have been the fair portion of both. Ellen was tall, full, large of her age, with brown hair and eyes, such as Mary Martin's had been in her youth; while Alice was delicate, frail-looking, and with the light hair of her father's family. But with those Abbot eyes, it seemed quite unfair for her father's family to claim a likeness. A century or two ago and she might have been thought a changeling, so unlike she was to any of her connections.

At length Mrs. Elwyn spoke, and she had evidently considered and arranged her speech so as to produce a decided effect. "Mrs. Martin, you have two children; I have none; give me this little girl. I will adopt her; I will bring her up as my own daughter. She shall have every advantage in life that wealth can purchase; every happiness and enjoyment that I can give her. I feel sure that I can make her happy. I don't believe you will raise her, if you keep her. She looks far from strong; she needs the sea-air. I am going to Newport this week, and will take her with me if you say so. Don't decide at once; think it over. Think whether you have any right to refuse comfort, respectability, and health itself to your own child."

Here Mrs. Elwyn stopped, for she knew better than to weaken her cause by many words. She had presented it in the strongest manner, and had appealed to the mother-love and ambition which she supposed to be uppermost in Mary Martin's heart. Being also a shrewd observer, with an intuitive perception of character, she easily read in the lines of the mouth, and the unfixed expression of the eyes, that irresolution which was the habit of Mary Martin's life. She saw plainly enough that if left to herself, she was as sure a victim to the policy of the stronger mind as the fly in the merciless spider's web. Looking now at the flushing and anon pallid face; at the worried eyes, that sought even the children's, as if there they might receive help and direction, Mrs. Elwyn felt that she had not long to wait. So she continued to play with little Alice's fair curls, and to slip on and off the delicate finger a flashing diamond ring. This ring, like an evil fairy, filled the poor room with delusive brilliancy. Besides captivating Alice's eyes with its many colors, its glitter and sparkle spread a glamour over those of the tired mother. She glanced at those white, delicate hands, loaded with jewels; then at her own, sodden and swollen with hot water and hard labor. If she should die, what was there before Alice but the same hard labor and perhaps harsh usage?

Now, a mother's love is very unselfish; but, to say the truth, it was not all pure mother's love that acted on poor Mary Martin. People must be as they are; that is, by nature, and by nature she had not a strong mind nor a clear perception. Then, again, she had a weak, foolish love for finery and luxury. Besides, like most people who have never tried it, she exaggerated the pleasure of wealth, and she identified wealth with liberality. How many times she had thought that, if she were only rich, she would do so much good. Like Becky Sharp, she thought it would be easy to give flannels to the poor if one had five thousand a year. Once, when Mary Martin was coming away from Mrs. Elwyn's with a basket of linen, she had seen that lady stepping into her own carriage, and she saw that it was lined with blue silk as blue as the upper sky. It is odd how some little scene like this will cling persistently to memory as the representative of possibilities or expectations. But it is a fact, that on one of the little nucleated cells, which composed Mary Martin's brain, was ineffaceably photographed this heavenly-colored chariot; and now she saw, as in a vision, her own little Alice lying languidly and luxuriously back on the soft silken cushions, or leaning from the tasselled window shades to look at the dirty and footsore crowd below. It would be unjust to Mary Martin to think that for a moment she confounded herself and Ellen with that crowd. On the contrary, an indefinite future of brightness and ease spread itself, like a golden glow, over all their future lives. How it was to come, in what shape they were to be benefited, she did not curiously inquire; but certain haunting prophecies of the "Asylum for Destitute Children" or the "Orphan's Home" for her little ones, in case of her own death, would be set at rest forever by this new dispensation. It took only a minute for a great many conflicting thoughts to strike sometimes harshly against each other as the mother's eye glanced tenderly to her children. How to live without Alice, and how could Ellen support the solitude, she, who had no other playfellow, and to whom the gentle four-year old companion had been all sufficient? And she herself, how could she part with her pet and love-bird? She could easily earn enough for them all; after all it wasn't much they needed, and there was a pretty little bit in the savings bank. Her eyes filled with tears.

Now, Mrs. Elwyn was a person who wanted a thing after she had once said so much more than before. She felt herself pledged to obtain her expressed desires. Also, she was in the habit of having her own way in everything, so she was not likely to give up now. A kind of fate sparkled in her steel blue eyes, as she fixed them magnetically on both mother and child. They felt limp and helpless before her strong will. Quite ignoring the weakness of maternal affection, she appealed at once to its strength, and to those lower motives which she intuitively felt she could successfully address. "You see, Mrs. Martin, my husband has always felt as I have, so disappointed that we have no children, and he has teased me often to adopt one from the 'Home' or the 'Asylum.' But, the fact is, I can't bear the idea of taking up with nobody knows who's child and nobody knows what!"

This was said with an inexpressibly contemptuous drawl. Mary Martin felt more than ever what a dreadful alternative the "Home" would be.

"Now, I know all about you and your family, and that it is perfectly good, respectable blood, and that makes all the difference in the world. Your little girl seems already to belong to me, and I'm sure I shall be extravagantly fond of her. If I like people, I like them to some purpose; I do everything for them. And it will be so with Alice, you may be sure of that. I already feel quite a property in her, I assure you." Here Mrs. Elwyn stooped over the little girl's forehead, and kissed the Abbot eyes so like her own. A stranger would have taken them for mother and child.

Strange enough is the mingling of good and evil motives, sometimes in even what we call our good actions. Carrie Abbot talking about blood! The vivid recollection of the old tobacco-shop on Marlboro Street, where Carrie used to visit and stay till she learned the milliner's trade! The Abbots in Boston! Goodness me! Then, again, the chariot. And surely Alice Martin had as good a right to a carriage and high-stepping bay horses as any Abbot that ever grew. So she consented.

Before night the papers were made out and duly signed by which Mrs. Martin released all title to her own child, and she was made over to the guidance and direction of a woman whom the mother disliked and despised. But, like the rest of mankind, "half dust, half deity," she was unconscious of the weakness or even baseness of her motives. She became impatient to finish the signing and sealing. She longed to feel that Alice was already in the process of being beautifully dressed, of driving in the silk-lined carriage, of going towards the cool sea, and to the health and vigor of the salt winds and bracing surf. She longed to have the few summer weeks over, when once more she should press in her arms, and gather to her bosom, her precious pale girl, and see her blooming and fresh, with red cheeks and more flounces and diamonds than Cinderella herself.

On the evening of the day when Alice departed forever from her sheltering attic, Mrs. Martin felt a little loneliness creep over her. The reaction had come after the excitement of the day, and now a thousand reasons for not doing what she had done presented themselves in mocking array. For once in her life she had decided something important without leaning on a dozen different opinions, while obeying at last the strongest one. She had done this now, in effect, having, indeed, not much choice against the iron will of Mrs. Elwyn; but still she wanted to talk it all over with Martha Hardy, and to be confirmed by her in the wisdom of her decision. So, when Miss Hardy appeared with the confectioner's pie, which she always brought, and which was Mrs. Martin's semi-weekly realization of luxury, she was welcomed with more than even the usual heartiness.

Miss Hardy began, abruptly: "You needn't tell me nothing about it. I was there at the house when she came, and know the whole. I ought to be here and stood by you, Mary, and then you'd never done it. But it's done, and can't be helped now. Best to make the most of a bad bargain."

"But do you really think it bad? Don't you think she'll do as she promised by Alice?" the mother then asked, in a trembling voice.

"Oh, law! yes. She'll do as she says about it. But, deary me, woman! so would the devil when he took our Saviour up into the high mountain, I suppose. However, it is no use talking. The thing is done, and the child looks like a poppet. I was standing by the basement window with Mr. Elwyn when she drove up with the child, and heard her tell him what she had done. She'd been to the needlewoman's with her, I expect, for she was fixed up like a picture from top to toe, and stepped out from the carriage with her little bronzed boots as topping as if she had been born to it!"

Mrs. Martin smiled and was consoled. "And how did Mr. Elwyn like his new daughter?"

"Law! he's as innocent as a child unborn of all her proceedings, wise or foolish. Little she minds what he likes or lumps. But I shouldn't wonder if he liked it; and anyhow, she'll have all their money now when they die, if that's anything," concludes Miss Hardy, who has lived long enough to know it isn't much. Besides, what's done is done.

The evening is cool after the hot day, and the two good friends eat their pie and enjoy the hour.

Only after Miss Hardy is gone away, and the mother looks at the little vacant pillow where the golden curls were wont to lie, do the tears, which are not all painful, pour down her perplexed and worried cheeks. She wishes again that already the weeks had gone by, and that the soothing emollient of Time were laid on her sore heart. But unless she could change herself, she will never be comforted that way. On the contrary, she has already begun the race of irresolution and indecision, though without goal or object, and henceforth she will never be of the same mind five minutes together, whether or not she has done a good thing. Miss Hardy will steady and encourage her somewhat; but for the most part, she must be now as always the sport of coming events.

As she cannot sleep, she recalls Miss Hardy's account of Mr. Elwyn's first good fortune. How by a blunder as stupid as the celebrated Lord Timothy Dexter's, who sent a cargo of warming-pans to Cuba, he had sent vessels to South America into one of their republics that had just sprung into a blaze. How the folly which should have lost him all, came, unexpectedly, to give him success in a new quarter, and a purchaser for all his stores. Whether it was Paraguay, or Uruguay, or Bolivia, or what, Miss Hardy couldn't remember, only that Fortune turned all his warming-pans into sugar lads, as skilfully as she did Lord Timothy's.

"But such good luck wouldn't happen often, and Mrs. Elwyn, when she found out how narrowly he had escaped being a bankrupt, through his own ignorance and folly, gave him no peace till he threw up business and put his money into Life Insurance stock, and such sort of safe investments. Now he's nothing to do, poor shote, but set with his hands in his pockets. She always rides him down with her tongue if he speaks, and he does really mortify her to death if he opens his mouth before folks. That comes of marrying for money." So said the observant Miss Hardy.

Though Mrs. Martin had entertained as usual with these harmless details, she already felt her own life-threads somewhat entwined with Mr. Elwyn's, and did not quite like to hear him called a fool. Sometimes she wished she had some more intimate friends of whom to take counsel in the great little affairs of her life; but in truth, with the exception of some half dozen persons to whom she smiled and bowed in the church portico, Mary Martin knew nobody. Even the old clergyman had followed the new fashion of listening for a louder call of duty, and another and new one reigned in his stead; one who had not yet found out where all his flock were folded. As for the Good Shepherd who is known of his sheep, Mary Martin had heard of him in sermons, and she read of him in that old family Bible; but to her he was a great way off, and could by no means understand her difficulties.

Mrs. Elwyn left her husband in the Beacon Street house to take care of the windows and fires, while she and a great many other fine people drove on the Newport sands with the lovely Alice. Pretty enough by nature, thrice pretty by reason of muslins, laces, and the skill of her maid; all Mrs. Elwyn's acquaintances congratulated her on the beauty of her daughter, and the extraordinary likeness to herself. No one wondered at her sudden appearance, each mother having enough to do to think of her own darling pet, without considering whether Mrs. Elwyn had one child or a dozen. The fresh air and the variety brought roses to Alice's cheeks, and though she talked often of Ellen and her mother for the first week or two, yet her head was so crammed with new impressions, that she soon came to forget about the old doll-house. After the season was through at Newport, Mrs. Elwyn joined a party to the White Mountains and Saratoga, finishing off her summer with a little fashionable quiet at Lake George.

By the time they drove up to the house in Beacon Street, Alice was eager only to see the new room that her kind mamma had furnished for her, and to take in the important facts of a hundred pretty knick-knacks, which Norah, her maid, was to keep in order. As the brain and heart cannot be more than full, and as Alice's had been filled all summer long with novelties, it will not be thought strange that the old life was crowded out and passed away like a tale that is told and forgotten. Such a graceful, supple little Alice! Papanti pronounced her a prodigy. It seemed a thousand pities that she wasn't a "professional," and that such a capacity for springing into the air and back on the points of her toes should be lost in the enforced quiet of a fashionable drawing-room. Such a touch for the piano! Such a wonderful talent, if, indeed, it were not a peculiar gift. And so on. Mrs. Elwyn congratulated herself on her good luck, and admired the Abbot eyes more than ever. Somehow, she had almost forgotten that Alice had belonged to any one but herself. At all events, should she be annoyed, which was not probable, she had arranged a stage effect, which she had no doubt would relieve her from all embarrassment.

The weariful hot summer had passed, and not without its pleasures to the dwellers in attics. It is well known to philosophers that there is really no difference in the enjoyment people have; that the kitchen is as well off as the parlor, the toad in the gutter as the eagle on the wing. So, though Mrs. Martin and Ellen were half roasted in the daytime and the weekday, yet they keenly enjoyed the rest of the Sabbath, and the evening walks on the Common and public garden. They relished as much as did Mr. and Mrs. Waddles the peeps into the shop windows, where were temptingly arranged in all the glitter of gaslight the pretty things they meant to buy when they became rich; for somehow, through Alice's connection with Mrs. Elwyn, Mrs. Martin habitually felt the coming presence of that possible prosperity that was to gladden and refresh them all. How and when she knew not, guessed not. But that it must be was inevitable. Had she not paid the price—full payment, pressed down and running over? Did she not feel it day by day, while her heart ached for her absent little treasure, and while she held down her impatience with the thought of the healthy firm-knit body that was meantime inhaling the strength-giving winds? Ellen's notions on the subject were more definite and practical than her mother's, for she was sure of real dolls in the bright future, while of diamonds she had also an unexpressed hope. Her summer, though lonely in some respects, had not been uneventful, and she had received a certain enjoyment in complaining of her solitude to her school companions, and in relating the reasons therefor. Being naturally of a fanciful turn, she came in time not to be embarrassed by the facts of the case, which, indeed, transcended her comprehension; but she related, with great eclat to the scholars, that all day long Alice rode about in a silk carriage full of sugar-plums, and that she had free access to a barrel of raisins. Having thus glorified her absent sister in her daily talk, Ellen hardly knew what to expect when she should really see her. However, much candy and doll's clothes were inevitable.

Miss Hardy had brought the news the night before of the arrival of "the family," for so Mrs. Elwyn was called, and Mrs. Martin had been looking out for the coming chariot all day. As none came, however, and as sleeping another night without seeing Alice was quite out of the question, the mother and child set off in the twilight to seek her.

The public garden, then hardly redeemed from unsightly masses of earth, and only laid out in the minds of the City Fathers with prospective beauty, looked upon the lonely Back bay and on the star reflected in the water. No one who walked by the bay at that twilight hour dreamed that in a few years a massive city would spring up where the water was then rippling. There was no Commonwealth Avenue, with its stately palaces; no Arlington Street, no lake, no statues, and no churches. Only the evening star shining after the sunset on the bay.

The two walked rapidly on towards Beacon Street, Ellen asking a hundred questions which her mother was unable to answer, her heart so stuck in her throat.

The wit who said that "Good Americans when they die go to Paris," might have added that while they lived they liked to have their dwellings in Beacon Street. And, indeed, Mrs. Elwyn's house, as Mary Martin and her child stood on the stately stone steps, seemed to them almost a gate of Paradise. While they waited an answer to their modest ring, they turned to look at the still rich verdure of the Common and the deep green of its shaven grass. The still heights of the Park Street houses, where the evening glow still lingered from the sunset; the pond lying like a great carbuncle set in emeralds under the same reflected glory, and the long vista of lamps already lighted on the mill-dam, and stretching away as far as one could see in the distance. It was a fairy-like scene of splendor.

When the door at last opened, and the black man stood in the marble-paved hall, it was only a shifting of scenes equally wonderful and not nearly so familiar. Mrs. Martin made out to ask to see Mrs. Elwyn, and to send word that it was she herself, Mary Martin, that desired that privilege. But the man only led the way to a small reception-room, and left them to solitude. There they stayed, and wondered, and repined. They took an inventory of the furniture, and admired the gas burners, the curtain, and the pictures; but, as that occupied them only five minutes, the twenty minutes more that elapsed before their sable guide appeared seemed twenty hours. Bells were rung in the distance, but no other sign of life appeared, and Mrs. Martin would not dare to touch the embroidered bell rope any more than she would rub a magic lamp to summon an Afrite.

Thackeray says if you want to learn all about yourself and your family affairs, listen at your own kitchen door. If Mrs. Elwyn ever tried that way, she certainly learned much that was true of herself. Even the new set of servants, who formed her present domestic staff, knew everything already concerning her own affairs that she had fancied confined to herself. She would to-night have heard Susan tell the cook that Mary Martin and her little girl were waiting all this time in the reception-room, while madam got up her theatricals; and that Jupiter had gone for the carriage, and sent off Miss Selford with Alice. Some mischief was in the wind somehow. Afterwards Susan came giggling down stairs again, to say that she had got all the gas lighted in the parlors and the child's chamber, and that "the old lady" was rigged out in all her top-knots.

"I helped her claw off her old wrap," said this disrespectful Vermonter, "and got her into her sprigged silk in no time; now she's a putting on her crown. When she rings, I'm to lead them two poor creatures in beyond. She couldn't scare me with her fine things. I know all her hooks and eyes. But what is the woman up to, now, I wonder?"

However, Susan kept her wonder to herself, and only preceded Mrs. Martin and Ellen to the parlors, where she asked them to wait a minute, and Mrs. Elwyn would come down. The parlors were a new astonishment to the impatient waiters. It had never come to the lot of Mary Martin to behold the full splendor of upholstery under such advantages. Carpets she had seen hanging at the shop windows, and furniture in the waterrooms; but such a wondrous combination of richness and luxury had never before met her eyes as now in these solitary and palatial halls. In fact, such a wilderness of pictures, statuettes, mirrors, alabaster, and China is not often collected within the four walls of a private dwelling. Hixon had outdone himself in his carvings and his divans, and the twelve moons of subdued light softened even the splendor of fact into a dreamy enchantment.

For full ten minutes did these travellers in a strange country grope timidly among its wonders; staringly, hesitatingly, lest with too rude a touch they should demolish the glittering fragilities about them, and with a vague fear lest the fairy roses should turn to dead ashes in their hands. Every instant their hungry eyes were attracted to the door by which they had come in, if haply the loved little form might enter. She, who lived all day long in this palace of beauty! She, who dared touch and handle every glittering vase or mysterious ornament! She, who might penetrate even to the library beyond, where, by the light of wax candles in silver sconces, gorgeously-bound folios lay readably open on the library-table, and little velvet and carved wood cases held wonderful pictures. The silence was so complete on the soundless carpets; every object was so separated from its familiar use in their experience, that the two timid explorers retired to the farthest corner in the fear that their movements, however gentle, might injure something. Already Alice seemed a being of a different sphere from their own. Far, far remote from them. They sat still in a hush of expectation. Then Susan was at the door, asking, softly, if they "would please walk up stairs to Miss Alice's room?" Indeed, they would! How gladly they would "please," indeed!

Though Mrs. Martin's heart beat tumultuously, she followed more in a dream than ever over the thickly padded staircase, that wound broadly to the upper hall; past a Hercules, which held a burning torch in his right hand; past the Graces, entwined in sculptured loveliness in a crimson-lined alcove; then, turning short, Susan opened the door of a large and splendidly furnished chamber, where a low fire was burning on the hearth. The dim light showed a gleaming phantasm, composed of flowers, of curtained windows filled with fairy lace, of a recess, where was a tent-shaped drapery of blue silk covering a little white bed, and of a thousand graceful ornaments and images scattered profusely over the mantle and beneath the great mirrors. The heavy perfumes from the hot-house plants, the reflections mysteriously repeated of their own figures from the long mirrors, with the obscurity and the strangeness of the place, bewildered them more than ever. They drifted farther and farther every moment from the Alice to whose chamber they had thought themselves going.

"Sit down, please," said Susan, and thereupon departing.

But where were they to sit, pray? Not on that brocatelle lounge of blue? Not on that great lolling chair, big enough and deep enough to swallow them? Not on that blue and crimson velvet little chair, which was Alice's very own; nor even on the blue and crimson divan by the door, though by that they might escape on an emergency? No. They both stood stock still near the door, and tremblingly waited for Alice.

Then entered Mrs. Elwyn, like a princess in a theatre, by the other door; and, for as much as she was more gorgeously got up than when she appeared in the attic of the washerwoman, so now she filled and glorified with her hasty but effective toilet her present more impressive surroundings. She seated herself without scruple in the great lolling chair, and, turning the gas up a little, put out her sparkling feet to the fire. She was as one possessed of all the glories of the earth, a being to whom furnishings and ornamentation were but instruments of daily dalliance and amusement. She took no notice of any one being in the room at first. Presently she looked up and nodded slightly to the two silent figures. Then she pointed to the divan by the door, saying, distantly:—

"Were you wishing to see me particularly, Mrs. Martin?"

"Alice?" was all the poor mother could utter.

"Oh! Alice is gone to a children's ball." She touched a little silver bell that stood on a little Japanese table at her elbow. Susan came in. "Has Miss Selford gone?"

"Yes, ma'am, half an hour ago."

"That's all. You see, Mrs. Martin, Alice is gone with her governess. Permit me to ask—what—did you want of Alice?" And here, for the first time, Mrs. Elwyn faced round so as to command a full view of Mrs. Martin and Ellen. She was a merciless woman, this Mrs. Elwyn, no more feeling in her than the stone mantel before her.

And poor Mary Martin, who had all her life done as she was bid, always at the mercy of the last speaker, who had married Mr. Martin because of the advice of her friends, who had always respected and obeyed him until death did them part, and afterwards taken the advice of Miss Hardy whenever she was by, what is this defenceless lamb to do in the grasp of the tiger?

To say that Mrs. Martin felt the effect of all the carefully arranged scenery, which the shrewd woman before her had successively presented, is only to say she was human. Why else do we build thrones, and put men on them, and then fall down and worship the men, nay, die for them gladly? It is a law of our natures to transcend and transfigure the ordinary scenes and objects of life, and, having given them, by the vividness of our own fancy, a glory and completeness of their own, to worship the ideal which lies at the core of all we see. Mrs. Elwyn had counted on the "omnium ignotum," which, she well enough knew from her own experience, would make it all seem "magnificum." Did she not distinctly remember the gorgeous effect produced on her own mind, not so very long ago, at a similar spectacle of light, lace, and general festooning? So she kept quiet, and let her bird struggle in the snare set in her very sight.

But Mrs. Martin did not even know she was in a net, until she tried to speak, and found she could not utter a word; that her heart beat hard and fast, and her throat was dry as dust. It seemed an hour since Mrs. Elwyn had asked her the question. Still, the cold blue eyes lay on her face, and with a terrible effort, like one in a nightmare, she gasped out:—

"Oh! can't we see Alice?"

It was no use waiting longer whetting the knife. Mrs. Elwyn used it at once, and with the dexterous severity of long habit. Speaking in a low, slow tone:—

"Once for all, Mrs. Martin, you cannot! Unless you fully understand this, and that no communication whatever can be kept up between you and Alice, she must return to her former life! She can no longer be my daughter! Decide now, and finally!"

At these awful words every limb in Mrs. Martin's body shook with vague agitation. The stern woman before her, an embodied will, bore down and crushed this timid nature, that had never in life decided the smallest doubtful point, and was not likely to begin now. She only gasped out again:—

VOL. LXXX.—28

"I'm sure—I don't want to be in the way of my own child! oh!" and so tottered into the great entry and to the head of the wide winding staircase.

Mrs. Elwyn touched the silver bell again, and told the ready Susan to show Mrs. Martin out, saying, in a clear loud tone, which rang like a fate in the mother's ear:—

"I consider your decision a very wise one, and should expect it from a person of your excellent sense and discretion. You see yourself there is but one right way to do!"

And so ended Mary Martin's dream of reflected splendor and prosperity. So was kicked over, by a few sharp words, this basket of eggs which, Alnaschar like, she had hoped and expected would be so soon transformed into diamonds. She sobbed all the way home to Pleasant Street, and so did little Ellen, but the tears were not all bitter.

This is a free country. And no Mrs. Elwyn that ever grew could keep Mrs. Martin from seeing her own child, or Ellen from seeing her own only sister. This was Miss Hardy's suggestion; the good friend whom the weary tearful pair found by their fireside when they returned. She had anticipated the result of their visit, and was ready with her consoling plea and her sympathy. Miss Hardy laid the matter out, and told her just how to do.

So it came to pass that every fine afternoon on the Beacon Street Mall, where cats as well as kings can walk, Mrs. Martin and Ellen, in their neat if poor and plain clothes, sat and watched from the garden seat, until the fateful moment came. Just an hour before dinner, which Mrs. Elwyn held at the genteel hour of four o'clock, Jupiter opened the door of Olympus and let out the prettiest little figure, all besprinkled with white velvet, and plumes that were tipped with just the color of the lively blue eyes. This dainty little person was always accompanied by a very quiet-looking and plainly-dressed lady, whom Mrs. Martin knew must be the child's governess. She had a kind face, and one that expressed decision as well as goodness. Mrs. Martin stared at her so hard, so devouringly, that she stopped once in her walk and looked at the seated figures to see if she possibly knew them. Then the mother trembled and hid her face under the close sun-bonnet of little Ellen. She had only given unintentional expression to the anxiety that filled her heart as to the person who had the daily charge of her darling. For Miss Hardy had told her that Mrs. Elwyn had nothing to do with her but to dress her and make a fool of her.

Day after day, in the bright, warm October sunshine, Ellen and her mother watched the joyous couple, themselves unnoticed, as they walked or half ran through the long walks and under the elms, golden with autumnal ripeness. If Alice had only chanced to turn her head sometimes where the lonely longing figures stood watching, she must have heard and recognized Ellen's low scream of delight, or the mother's happy sigh. But she looked forward and onward, tripping daintily, or bounding healthfully, with glowing cheeks. That was a comfort indeed, amidst all the deep pain of the separation.

When the winter came, were the short cold days filled with every variety of clear-starching, crimping, fluting, mending, and cooking? Not at all to the Pleasant Alley dwellers. In the little attic they lived a whole winter of Alice's gayeties. Of Alice driving away to dancing-school with Miss Selford in the blue silk carriage; of Alice in a dozen new hats and plumes, and with a suit of ermine about her throat and over her small hands; of Alice, when the snow came, calling pettishly to Jupiter to bring her another shawl to wrap her in the gay sleigh; of Alice behind prancing horses flying over the snow out towards Brookline, and passing other prancing horses and gay sleighs with tinkling bells all the time answering the music of their shoutings and laughter; of Alice returning safe with Miss Selford and with blooming face and sparkling eyes. Many lives they lived in hers of diversified enjoyment, and when Mary Martin remembered that as soon as the winter was over and the hot weather should come again, her darling would be taken away to the cool breezes and the sea-foam, she did not know whether most to smile or sigh.

But now, in only one little year! Oh, if she had only had faith to wait, or if, indeed, she had acted only from pure, right motives; but then she couldn't be more than she was. Now appeared a letter from the lawyer in Barton to Mrs. Mary Martin. Had she happened to keep a deed of the land of the old place? the old house that fell to her on her uncle's death, and which nobody had ever considered worth living in, or the house worth repairing? A tumble-down old house on a long stretch of swamp land thickly sown with stumps and stones? So she remembered it.

She had kept the deed; she did not know why. It was in the dark closet among the other things which hadn't gone to the rubbish man. Now she sent the yellow representative of so much dreariness and waste, and presto! the benevolent lawyer transformed it into a lively parterre of railroad crossings. Its stumps and stones made up into a noisy junction, and the desert blossomed into a number of roses. Mary Martin's daily life was thenceforward changed from poverty to comfort, from toilsome days and sound sleep to ease, plenty, and the small worries that come with more and novel indulgences. She bought a pretty house on Charles Street, one not very far from Mrs. Elwyn's own, from which she could easily reach the garden seat on the Mall to watch Alice. She sent Ellen to a good private school where the rudenesses and roughnesses, contracted under public auspices, were gently rubbed away, and where she improved in manners as rapidly as she grew. Tall and blooming she was far beyond her years, and, as the days went on, she learned to sympathize clearly with her mother's anxiety and interest in Alice.

It did not occur to Mrs. Martin to take Alice home, any more now than before the improvement in her circumstances. Comfortable and pretty as her house and furnishings were, she was still at an immense distance from the luxury that surrounded Alice, and her own taste of ease and plenty had only exalted her appreciation of the exuberant abundance in which Alice lived. To take her away now would be worse than ever. Besides, she felt herself bound by her implied promise to Mrs. Elwyn. So, every day, as the seasons went on, the two walked watchfully up and down the Mall until the bright form came tripping forth for pleasure, or exercise, or to go on some expedition for entertainment. From Miss Hardy they gathered all they did not themselves make out, and they knew or guessed almost every article of her wardrobe. Thus Ellen kept in her heart and dreams the sister who had long ago forgotten her, and whom she too must have otherwise forgotten, so utterly had she passed out of the sphere of her daily existence.

Once Ellen, in going forward of her mother, came so near to Alice, who was walking with Miss Selford, as to brush against her clothes. Alice turned and looked full at her, but without recognizing her, and Ellen hurried back to her mother to hide her agitation. They told dear Martha Hardy about it in the evening; both of them tearfully, when that good friend dropped in as faithfully as she used in old times to drop up.

"The poor child hadn't the least idea, of course, you silly creatures! You wouldn't like it better if she had known you! and how's she to know you? From the time that woman told me, with the stuck-up toss of her head, 'that it was desirable old associations should be broken in her mind,' and from the time Susan went off, I've never spoke to her about you, and I was the only thread betwixt her and you—don't you see?"

And then Miss Hardy would tell the newest news of the Elwyn household, and of other households where she made and mended; and Mary Martin didn't need to buy novels, for there was a plenty of wonderful incidents to be had from Martha without even asking. Such tragedies! such household comedies! such high life below stairs, and oh! such low life above!

And how of Alice herself? Unconscious of the eager, loving glances of the strangers behind her, something in Ellen's face as she looked up in her eyes, troubled her memory or fancy. She nestled against Miss Selford, and said, in a low voice :—

"Did you see that person who looked so at me? that one behind?"—

Miss Selford said No, and did she mean the little girl sitting under the tree now? For Miss Selford by no means agreed with Mrs. Elwyn in her human classification of gentlemen, ladies, and persons.

"She pushed me—she had a common de laine on. Mamma wouldn't like to have her rub against me, I think," said the little lady, with hauteur.

Miss Selford answered, pleasantly. "I don't think she meant to push you. She seems a nice little girl. Besides, we must all expect to be pushed in our turn, except the queen. As to dress, mine is a delaine, and a particularly pretty one, I consider."

Alice is puzzled. For Miss Selford is not a person, and Miss Selford tells her Hans Andersen's story of the snails which were served on a silver dish.

The governess loves Alice dearly and watches her carefully; but she finds it impossible to counteract, by her own, the daily influence of a vulgar, pretentious woman, who at the same time stands in the relation of mother and benefactress to her pupil. Miss Selford was recommended to Mrs. Elwyn as a lady of the bluest Boston blood, and therefore capable of imparting every accomplishment which humanity is capable of receiving. Mrs. Elwyn pays her a high salary for her services, and delivers Alice as far as possible into her hands. She feels that Miss Selford's sphere of thought and action is quite separate from her own, and she has respected her extremely ever since she knew that she had in her possession a grandmother's India shawl so delicate that it could be drawn through a ring. Miss Selford is so far from being alive to the reflected importance of this garment that she almost never wears it, which astonishes and mystifies Mrs. Elwyn more than ever.

Miss Selford has always known Martha Hardy, and heard from her truth-telling lips the whole story of Alice Martin while she was putting up the patch curtains in the school-room. So she knew exactly what she had undertaken, and told Martha to tell the child's mother that she would do her very best for Alice.

(Conclusion next month.)

No man's spirits are very much hurt by doing his duty. On the contrary, one good action, one temptation resisted and overcome, one sacrifice of desire or interest, purely for conscience sake, will prove a cordial for weak and low spirits beyond what either indulgence, or diversion, or company, can do for them.—Anon.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

BY MARY E. NEALY.

Oh! art thou still the very, very same
Dear friend of mine,
As when we kindled first the sacred flame
On friendship's shrine!

Do no dark doubts or deep corroding fears,
My dearest friend,
No heavy shadows, damp with midnight tears,
Above thee bend!

Or does thy faith, and love, and sacred trust,
Dear friend of mine,
Still free from earth and time's decay and dust,
Around me twine?

For I believe if e'er a warm heart beat,
My dearest friend,
With truest pulses, making life more sweet
Even to the end,

It beats within that strong and noble breast,
Dear friend of mine.

Oh! may I there still hope to find the rest
Which is divine?

Oh! earth is changeful, and hopes decay,
And the winds blow over the sea;
But I am still faithful to you to-day,
If you are so to me.

For friendship yields friendship, and love brings love;

It is just as the seed is sown,
And we heed not the clouds in the sky above,
If no clouds in the heart are known.

And, after wandering weary years
In search of the fount so sweet,
We pause some day with our sighs and tears,
And find it—at our feet!

And you cannot think when the soul has found
Her beautiful rest at last,
She would ever give her enchanted ground
For the future—or the past!

THERE are few mortals so insensible that their affections cannot be gained by mildness, their confidence by sincerity, their hatred by scorn or neglect.—Zimmermann.

DEATH.—When Socrates was told by a friend that his judges had sentenced him to death: "And has not nature," said he, "passed the same sentence upon them?"

LIKE a morning dream, life becomes more and more bright the longer we live, and the reason of everything becomes more clear. What has puzzled us before seems less mysterious, and the crooked paths look straighter as we approach the end.—Richter.

THE eye of age looks meek into my heart! the voice of age echoes mournfully through it! the hoary head and palsied hand of age plead irresistibly for its sympathies! I venerate old age; and I love not the man who can look without emotion upon the sunset of life, when the dusk of evening begins to gather over the watery eye, and the shadows of twilight grow broader and deeper upon the understanding.—Longfellow.

Mint. Now, honey, de way you 'se hit dat ar nail on de head ker plumb, does credit to your 'scrimination. 'Deed it does, now! My sakes, ain't dis yere a quare place?

Miss Melinda. (Sitting down.) Queer? What makes it queer, Mint?

Mint. Why, fustis place fummostly, dar 's de oshum.

Miss Melinda. The what?

Mint. De oshum, de water.

Miss Melinda. Oh, the ocean.

Mint. Dat 's what I done said, de oshum, a roarin' like some o' dese yere savage critters dey tells about. Comes a splittin' in on de beachum, a lickin' an' a lickin', creepin' 'long like it was 'shamed o' hisself, and when dis chile thinks it 's done got fixed, jest turns round an' goes outen ag'in same creepy fashion.

Miss Melinda. That 's the tide, Mint, coming in and going out.

Mint. Oh, sho, now! you 'se pokin' fun, you is. How de mischief it go in an' out when it 's tied? You can't cram nuffin' like dat ar down dis chile's froat. Hi-yi! ain't there lots o' folks here a promeraidin' up an' down?

Miss Melinda. Yes, they come for sea-bathing and the mineral springs.

Mint. What 's dat ar? Dat ar water?

Miss Melinda. Yes, water to drink, to make you well if you are sick.

Mint. 'Spected 'twas some kind o' water. 'Most de 'visions in dis yere place is water. Wonder if dere 's any kind o' water in dese parts for washing a nigger white. Reckon I 'll jes' look roun' for dat ar water and take a wash. He-ye! (Laughs.) 'Specs white folks stare see dis chile go in brack, come out all whitey. Take de kinks outen de wool, too. (Laughs loudly.) 'Specs all de niggers come to dis yere place if I makes 'scovery o' dat ar water.

Miss Melinda. I think they would, Mint.

Mint. Sart'in for sure dey 'd do dat ar, missee. Does you want any waitin' on, honey?

Miss Melinda. Why?

Mint. Miss Graves done sent me here to wait on you.

Miss Melinda. I want nothing just now. If I need you I will ring.

Mint. Jes' so. You jes' give de bell a tink-lum, an' it 'll fotch me quicker 'n a locomotion engine. [Exit MINT, hopping on one foot.]

Miss Melinda. Poor ignorant child! Now, I suppose some folks would not have spoken five words to her, but I soar above such petty prejudices.

Enter HELEN.

Helen. Good-morning, Aunt Melinda. Why, you are dressed for luncheon. Are you not going in to bathe?

Miss Melinda. I think not. The fact is, Helen, I am sick of the very sight of water.

Helen. I don't wonder at it.

Miss Melinda. What with the ocean bathing twice a-day, and drinking night and morning from the medicinal springs, and the sailing, and fishing, and shell gathering, it 's nothing but water, water, water, from morning till night.

Helen. But why not return to town if you are so tired of the sea-shore?

Miss Melinda. Return to town in the middle of the summer?

Helen. Take a trip to the mountains, then.

Miss Melinda. And spend half a year's income jolting round in coaches, and getting up hundreds of feet in the air to see a view that I don't care a pinch of snuff for when I do see it. I've had enough of that!

Helen. Go into the country, then.

Miss Melinda. And have the smell of pig-stys in my nose all winter.

Helen. Go to Niagara.

Miss Melinda. Been there a dozen times. Besides, I tell you I 'm sick and tired of water.

Helen. (Pettishly.) What do you want to do, then?

Miss Melinda. You know very well the doctor said I must come here for my health, and that I must stay.

Helen. (Aside.) For her health. She never saw a sick day in her life. (Aloud.) Well, dear aunt, if you are not disposed to bathe, shall we take a walk or a drive? It is a lovely cool day, and it seems a pity to stay in the house.

Miss Melinda. Where can we drive?

Helen. We have never visited the beautiful lake four miles from here. All the visitors speak in such glowing terms of the beauty of the drive and the lake itself, that it would be a pity to return to town without seeing it.

Miss Melinda. More water!

Helen. (Laughing.) I did not think of that.

Miss Melinda. Well, there is no other place where I care to go to-day, so we will drive to the lake. I will go to my room for my hat and shawl, while you order the carriage.

[Exit MISS MELINDA.]

Helen. (Yawning.) She is not half so weary of water as I am. Just like her notions, to come to this little stifled-up boarding-house, instead of going to a hotel where there is some life and excitement. (Rings the bell.) She said her health required change.

Enter MINT.

Mint. You done ringed dat ar bell, honey?

Helen. Why, who are you?

Mint. I 'se Mint, I is. 'Gaged here to wait on de quality folks dat's a-boardin' loug o' Missee Graves.

Helen. Oh, the new domestic.

Mint. 'Spects dat ar 's the French for it.

Helen. Well, go and order Miss Crawford's coachman to have the carriage here in half an hour. You will find him at the stables of Congress Hall.

Mint. Whar's dat?

Helen. Mrs. Graves will tell you. Don't bother me!

Mint. (Looking bewildered.) What's I to do, honey? Can't get de idee frou my wool an' save my 'sistence.

Helen. (Impatiently.) Go tell Mrs. Graves that Miss Crawford wants her carriage in half an hour. She will tell you where to find the coachman.

Mint. (Aside.) Snee-a-p snap-p-i-n' turtle! 'Tother quality wuff seven 'leven o' dis one. (Aloud.) I'll tell Missee Graves, honey. 'Deed I will! An' de way dat ar kerridge 'll fotch up to dis yere door 'll be a caushum to white folks, 'deed it will. [Exit MINT, shuffling her feet.]

Helen. Disgusting! That's another of the beauties of a boarding-house, having such servants instead of well trained waiters.

Enter HERBERT.

Herbert. (Yawning.) What's the programme for to-day, Nell?

Helen. We are going for a drive to Mixywixy Lake.

Herbert. Am I expected to go?

Helen. Of course. You know Aunt Melinda always makes a fuss if you are not ready for escort duty at any time.

Herbert. When are you going?

Helen. In about an hour. I ordered the carriage in half an hour, and you know Aunt Melinda makes it a rule to keep James waiting about half an hour always. She takes longer to dress than any young belle here.

Herbert. I should think it would take one hour to get a hat or bonnet on over that gigantic waterfall she wears.

Helen. Don't mention it! Did you ever see such a bunch? I despise the extreme of fashion.

Herbert. You can see plenty of that at a watering-place. I'm going to the billiard-room, Nell, and you can stop there for me as you drive past. I'll be looking for you.

Helen. Very well.

Herbert. Mixywixy Lake! I should think Aunt Melinda could see water enough here without driving four miles to look at a lake.

[Exit HERBERT.]

Helen. If I was a man, I would go and play billiards, too. I'm sick and tired of this hateful little coop. Nothing to do, nothing to see, nothing to hear, but the roar of the ocean, varied by Aunt Melinda's whining!

Enter MINT.

Mint. Miss Crawford axin arter you, honey.

Helen. She wants me to arrange her dress, I suppose. If I had as much money as she has, I would keep a lady's maid. [Exit HELEN.]

Mint. Quality folks going a ridin'. Dere'll be nobody dat 'quires waiting' on till dey comes back, so I jes run down and pull off my shoes to paddle in de oshum.

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE II.—FALL.

SCENE.—Same as Scene I. Curtain rises, discovering MISS MELINDA lying upon a sofa dressed in a gay wrapper. She has pillows under her head, and is covered with a handsome Afghan. HELEN is seated at some distance from her reading a novel. MINT, on a low seat beside the sofa, is fanning MISS MELINDA.

Helen. (Looking up from her book.) The first of September. I did not think of it before. To-day is Herbert's birthday.

Miss Melinda. And the first day of fall. Oh, dear! we were to return to town to-day.

Helen. Yes, and now we may be kept in this stupid place till winter. It was bad enough when there was plenty of company, but, of course, fall weather will drive everybody home.

Miss Melinda. I am sure you need not complain. You may go where you please, and you are gadding about somehow the best half of your time, leaving poor me tied to this sofa.

Helen. Mint is always here.

Miss Melinda. Yes, if it had not been for Mint,

I should have had a pretty time of it since I got that terrible fall. It is Mint who rubs my poor sprained back, and Mint who lies beside the bed at night to get me water and wait upon me, and Mint who fans me and keeps the flies off, and Mint who runs my errands and waits upon me day and night.

Helen. (Coldly.) She is a servant, and does a servant's work, of course.

Miss Melinda. She has done what no mere servant would do for any wages. She is a good, kind-hearted girl, and, Mint, some day you will find that your services are not forgotten.

Mint. Dear me, honey, my sarvices ain't nuffin. Dis chile couldn't no way see anybody git such an orful bone breaky fall as you had an' not try to 'leverate dere 'flections. Poor thing! You tink Mint hear yer groany, groany all de dark night frou, an' not hist up to rub yer poor hurted back, an' get yer de doctor's stuff make you all fust rate well again?

Miss Melinda. Others can hear me, Mint, and not feel any desire to alleviate my sufferings.

Helen. You know, Aunt Melinda, that I am as ignorant as a baby about sickness.

Miss Melinda. It is time then you learned to care for others in suffering. It is woman's peculiar mission, in my opinion.

Helen. I, at least, have not found it my vocation. Mint does so well that no other nurse is required.

Miss Melinda. Affection might suggest some attentions. Now, my head aches at this minute as if it would burst, but I suppose Mint will have to bathe it, if it is to be relieved.

Mint. I'll go for de ice water dis bressed minute. [Exit MINT.]

Miss Melinda. Dear, good girl. How carefully she has nursed me ever since my terrible fall. If I recover, I shall owe much to her kind care and attention.

Helen. Dear me, Aunt Melinda, what a fuss you do make about Mint. Of course, she expects a five dollar bill, or an old gown or two, when we leave.

Miss Melinda. (Significantly.) She will find my gratitude is not confined within such narrow limits.

Helen. (Aside.) What does she mean? Can she intend—how absurd I am! She has never made any will, and Herbert is heir-at-law. Her fancy that people die as soon as they make a will is very lucky for us.

Miss Melinda. What are you muttering? I think the best you can do is to keep quiet when my head aches so badly.

Enter HERBERT.

Herbert. Headache, did you say, aunt? No wonder with that great waterfall on. How can you lie down in any comfort with that enormous bag on your head? Nell, take it off for Aunt Melinda.

Miss Melinda. No, I prefer to wear it.

Helen. That is one of Aunt Melinda's fancies. I don't believe she has had that thing off day or night since her fall.

Enter MINT, with a bowl in her hand.

Mint. Here's de cure for de nasty ole headache. (Sits beside MISS MELINDA, and bathes her head.)

Herbert. (Aside to HELEN.) It seems to me, Nell, that colored girl completely usurps your place in taking care of Aunt Melinda.

Helen. (Aside to HERBERT.) I have no talent for nursing, and Mint does very well.

Herbert. (Aside to HELEN.) But—

Helen. (Aside to HERBERT.) Don't be absurd, now, my dear. Of course, if it was any of the relations or dear friends, I should interfere, but she can't leave her property to a colored girl.

Enter MRS. GRAVES.

Mrs. Graves. Good-morning, all!

Miss Melinda. Good-morning, Mrs. Graves!

Mrs. Graves. I just stepped in, ma'am, to see about the rooms.

Miss Melinda. The rooms?

Mrs. Graves. Why, you see, ma'am, this is the first of September, and all the other boarders leave either to-day or to-morrow, and we never have any new ones come in the fall.

Miss Melinda. Well?

Mrs. Graves. Well, ma'am, our family at the present prices won't pay me for keeping up the house.

Miss Melinda. But, my good woman, you know the doctor says it will be as much as my life is worth to move from here now, and I cannot even cross the entry to my own room without assistance.

Mrs. Graves. I know, ma'am, but I'm a poor widow woman, and I can't afford to have all I've made this summer eaten up keeping house for three people during the fall.

Miss Melinda. Oh! it's a question of money, then?

Mrs. Graves. Yes, ma'am.

Miss Melinda. It is very unfortunate that I had such a bad fall so late in the season. Will double the price for our board pay you, Mrs. Graves?

Mrs. Graves. Well, ma'am, I shan't make anything, then, but I think that it would save me from loss.

Miss Melinda. Well, consider it settled, then, until I am able to move.

Mrs. Graves. Thank you, ma'am.

[Exit MRS. GRAVES.]

Helen. I think, Aunt Melinda, that is an instance of perfect extortion.

Herbert. Can't be helped, Nell. Of course, she knows she can get any price under the circumstances.

Mint. Poor head! Do it ache bad now, honey?

Miss Melinda. Yes, Mint, it does ache. Oh! who would want to be rich, the victim of selfish relatives and extortionate landladies, without one real, true friend in the world?

Helen. You are unjust, Aunt Melinda.

Miss Melinda. Perhaps so.

Mint. Now, if you'll send 'em boff away, honey, I'll have you asleep quicker 'n winkin'.

Miss Melinda. I will release you, then, my most affectionate niece and nephew. Mint has quite a mesmeric power in her hands, and an hour's nap may do me good.

Helen. (Sarcastically.) Mint has every perfection. Come, Herbert, we will take a stroll on the beach.

Herbert. I hope your head will be better for a nap, Aunt Melinda.

Miss Melinda. Thank you!

[Ezeunt HERBERT and HELEN.]

Mint. Now, honey, let me jes' take off dat ar waterfallum an' nuss your head. (Takes off the waterfall, which MISS MELINDA carefully places under her pillow.)

Miss Melinda. If I ever get well again, Mint, you shall go to town with me, and stay as long as you live.

Mint. Bress you, honey, Mint don't ax nuffin' better on dis yere snubinary spere dan dat ar. Don't yer git low now, honey, 'bout gittin' well. You 's boun' to 'cover, you is.

Miss Melinda. I don't know, Mint. I'm an old woman to have such a severe fall. It may be the death of me yet.

Mint. Sho, now, you 's got de blues, honey, dat's all, an' de blues is very 'pressin' to de spirits, 'deed dey is. You cheer up, now. I'll put you to sleep, honey, now, an' you 'll wake up fust rate. (Bathes MISS MELINDA's head, making a purring noise with her mouth.)

[Curtain falls.]

SCENE III.—WATERFALL.

SCENE.—Same as Scene I. HATTIE discovered putting the chairs in order.

Hattie. Well, this is a nice winding up to Aunt Graves' summer at the sea-shore. A funeral is always gloomy, but this one seems especially so. That nephew and niece of the old lady don't seem to care a pin for her. Indeed, I think poor Mint was the only true mourner there.

Enter MRS. GRAVES.

Mrs. Graves. Well, it is all over at last.

Hattie. Have they read the will?

Mrs. Graves. Well, it wasn't exactly a will, you know, only a kind of memorandum; but she made her nephew promise before the doctor and me to respect her wishes, there expressed, the same as if it was a regular will.

Hattie. Well?

Mrs. Graves. She has left him her house and furniture, and a lot of bank stock, and, indeed, everything except—guess what?

Hattie. I never could guess anythin'.

Mrs. Graves. You know that stupendous waterfall she always wore, even when she was sick?

Hattie. Of course I know it. It was the laughing stock of the house.

Mrs. Graves. She left that to Mint.

Hattie. The mean old thing! Why, Mint was perfectly devoted to her. Is that all she left her?

Mrs. Graves. That's all!

Hattie. Well, I'll never believe in gratitude again. I thought she would leave Mint a hundred dollars at least.

Mrs. Graves. We have no more time to stand here talking, Hattie. Mr. and Mrs. Crawford go back to town this afternoon, and we must get ready to shut up the house to-morrow.

Hattie. Come, then, we have no time to lose.

Ezeunt MRS. GRAVES and HATTIE.

After a moment's pause. Enter HERBERT and HELEN.

Helen. But are you sure, Herbert, she had so much money with her?

Herbert. Don't I tell you I drew it out of bank myself a few days before we came here, and bought ten thousand dollars' worth of Government bonds, and ten thousand dollars' worth of large notes.

Helen. But, Herbert, what could she have done with it?

Herbert. It must be in her trunks, somewhere.

Helen. It is not in her room. I have searched every corner, opened every article of dress, ransacked all her pockets, unfolded every scrap of paper. There is no money there, except about two hundred dollars in her pocket-book.

Herbert. Then where is it?

Helen. She must have invested it somewhere before she left town.

Herbert. Nonsense! Did not I transact all her business for her? No, it has been stolen, and I'll have this house searched before I leave it.

Enter MRS. GRAVES, in time to hear the last speech.

Mrs. Graves. (Angrily.) Have my house searched, indeed! Pray, may I inquire what you have lost, sir?

Herbert. We have lost twenty thousand dollars in Government bonds and thousand dollar notes.

Mrs. Graves. Mercy on me!

Enter MINT, hugging MISS MELINDA's waterfall, followed by HATTIE, laughing at her.

Mint. (Sobbing.) 'Tain't no good pokin' fun at me, Missee Hattie. I done loved her, I did, an' I 'se a poor missable, forlornity nigga', now she's gone to glory. Oh! oh! oh! wish't I was dead, too!

Hattie. Did you ever see such a time, hugging that old waterfall as if it was a box of jewels? Pretty pay that is!

Mint. Didn't want no pay, I didn't! Many's de time I've histed dis yere off her poor achey head, an' I'll never gib it to nobody till I dies.

Herbert. Mint!

Mint. Yes, Marse Crawford'.

Herbert. Stop that howling, and answer some questions for me.

Mint. Yes, Marse Crawford'.

Herbert. When you were alone in the room with my aunt, did you ever see her put away money or papers?

Mint. Heaps o' times, Marse Crawford'.

Herbert. Where did she put them?

Mint. She done put de papers in dat ar big desk long side de winder, and de money in dat little velvety portemonkey in de brewreau drawer.

Herbert. Nowhere else?

Mint. Never seed her put none nowhere's else atop of dis 'varsal airth. She allers done put 'em jes dar.

Helen. Are you sure, Mint?

Mint. Sure, for true, certain.

Herbert. Did she ever give you any money, Mint?

Mint. Nebber, sure's I'm a born nigga. She done promised to think of me if she got well, but she (breaks out sobbing) done died dead afore she ever 'covered her health, spite de good nussin' dis chile 'stowed 'pon her day an' night.

Hattie. Well, then, Mint, stop blubbering, and try on your new waterfall.

Mint. (Griming.) You g'long, Missee Hattie. Waterfall'd look pretty for sure 'long of my black wool.

Hattie. Oh! put it on.

Helen. Herbert, we must find that money.

Hattie. Come, Mint. Here, I'll pin it on for you.

Mint. No, no. You shan't touch it. You jes keep your hands to yourself, Missee Hattie.

Hattie. Let me see it.

(HATTIE attempts to take the waterfall, MINT resisting her and holding it fast. In the struggle it is torn in two, and a number of folded papers fall out of it on the floor.)

Hattie. (Picking up the papers.) Hullo! what are these? (Opens one.) A thousand dollar note! (Opens another.) A government bond for five thousand dollars!

Herbert. What do you say? Let me see!

Hattie. No, let Mint take them. (Gives the papers to MINT.) You are a rich girl, Araminta.

Helen. That is where she put the twenty thousand dollars.

Herbert. We were idiots not to examine it before we gave it to Mint.

Mint. (Who has been examining the papers.) Is dey all money, Missee Hattie?

Hattie. Yes, Mint. There is money enough there to keep you in comfort all the rest of your life.

Mint. Ki! y! Specs dis darky lie abed snorey in de mornin' now.

Hattie. You must find some gentleman who will tell you how to take care of it, Mint.

Herbert. I will take care of it for you, Mint.

Mint. Specs not, Marse Crawford'. Tain't to be spected folks dat 'lected and slighted dere own aunt's goin' to be speshunially good to a poor nigga gal.

Hattie. But who will advise you, Mint?

Mint. Marse Smiff, whar I live 'fore I come here. He was allers good to me. Reckon he'll tell me 'bout dese yere papers.

Helen. I declare it is too much to endure!

Mint. Don't 'dure it den. Dat's my 'vise to you, honey.

Mrs. Graves. (Sarcastically.) I hope you are convinced now, Mr. Crawford, that your missing money was not stolen.

Herbert. (Angrily.) Come, Helen, we may as well pack up and return to town.

[Exeunt HERBERT and HELEN.]

Mrs. Graves. Hattie, we must go, too.

[Exeunt MRS. GRAVES and HATTIE.]

Mint. Specs I'll have to go, too, 'long of de rest. Jest to think, all dis yere's money! What on de 'varsal airth'll I do with it till I've 'sulted with Marse Smiff. Never had a portemonkey in all my days. Allers kep my wages in an ole stockin'. Land! I know. I'll jes stuff the whole 'cumerlashun of papers back here in Missee Lindy's ole waterfall.

[Curtain falls.]

DIVERSIONS.—Of all the diversions of life, there is none so proper to fill up its empty spaces as the reading of useful and entertaining authors; and, with that, the conversation of a well-chosen friend.—Spectator.

A CHEERFUL TEMPER, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful, and wit good-natured. It will lighten sickness, poverty, and affliction; convert ignorance into an amiable simplicity, and render deformity itself agreeable.—Addison.

THE origin of all mankind was the same; it is only a clear and a good conscience that makes a man noble; for that is derived from Heaven itself. It was the saying of a great man that if we could trace our descents, we should find all slaves to come from princes, and all princes from slaves; and fortune has turned all things topsy-turvy in a long series of revolutions; besides, for a man to spend his life in pursuit of a title, that serves only when he dies to furnish out an epitaph, is below a wise man's business.—Seneca.

THE LADIES' MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

BY MRS. HALE.

THE truism, so often repeated, that this is an age of progress, does not mean that good can be obtained without effort. Earnest work and patient waiting seem necessary before faith, hope, and love, eliminating the wrong from the right, can elevate moral sentiment to sustain the latter, and thus make the progress of humanity, like the quality of mercy, twice blest.

The readers of the LADY'S BOOK will, we hope, recollect the announcement that the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania was established in 1849. At that time we were preparing a work, "Woman's Record, a Biographical Dictionary of Distinguished Women." Two important matters had been pressed upon our attention in the course of our labors. One was the miserable condition of heathen women, who seemed to be without hope in the world, dead while they lived; and the other, the wrong to Christian women, especially those of the Anglo-Saxon race, in being excluded from one of their own special duties, that of Midwifery. The founding of this Medical College for the sex suggested the idea that single ladies could become Medical Missionaries, and thus bear to the perishing heathen at once the light of the blessed Gospel for their minds, and the healing of disease to their bodies.

To carry out these ideas, we consulted with those who had faith in God and sympathy with missions, men and women who were esteemed for good works. Encouraged by their approval, we formed, in December, 1851, a constitution with the following preamble:—

"Believing that God, in committing the care of the young especially to woman, imposes on her the duty of preparing herself, in the best possible manner, for her important vocations, among which are the care of her own health, the physical well-being of her children, and tendance on the sick, suffering, and helpless; and finding, also, that the BIBLE recognizes and approves only woman in the sacred office of midwife, therefore we, who give our names to this benevolent association, agree to unite in the following purposes:—

"1st. To co-operate with the efforts now being made in this city of Philadelphia, to qualify women to become physicians for their own sex and for children.

"2d. To give kindly encouragement to those women who are engaged in medical studies.

"3d. To give aid and sympathy to any among them who may desire to become Missionaries, and go, in the spirit of love, to carry to the poor, suffering women of heathendom, not only the blessings of the healing art, which Christian men can rarely, if ever, bear to women in those lands, but also the higher and holier knowledge of the true God, and of salvation through his Son, Jesus Christ."

Thus was formed the

PENNSYLVANIA LADIES' MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The official Board had the following named ladies as MANAGERS.

MRS. SARAH J. HALE, Episcopalian.
 MRS. MARIA WOOD, Presbyterian.
 MRS. D. B. HINMAN, Baptist.
 MRS. JOHN P. DURBIN, Methodist.
 MRS. CHARLES GIBBONS, Friend.
 MRS. W. S. ROBERTS, Baptist.
 MRS. T. A. STROUD, Methodist.
 MRS. E. D. WHITNEY, Dutch Reformed.
 MRS. SARAH PETER, Episcopalian.

President, MRS. THOMAS WOOD.
Secretary, MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

We then laid the Constitution and plan of the Society before clergymen of various denominations that their approval might be obtained, and that we might appeal to the public with the sanction of their names.

The Rev. Dr. Malcom (Baptist), who has visited the East, and knows the wants of Missions, gave the plan his warmest approbation.

Rev. Dr. Durbin (Methodist), in his letter to the authoress of this Appeal, after expressing his sympathy with the movement to educate women physicians to take charge of their own sex and of children, adds, "If I were stationed in this city, I would give the effort my personal aid; now I send my own name, and that of Mrs. Durbin, as members of your Society."

Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter (Episcopalian), in his letter, thus nobly cheers us on our way: "The importance of securing for women a larger sphere of usefulness, and the especial propriety and desirableness of qualifying them to practise the healing art among children and those of their own sex, will be admitted, I should hope, by all persons. If there are those, however, who think otherwise, I certainly am not of the number, and I shall rejoice heartily in the success of every effort which is calculated to promote such object."

Rev. Charles Wadsworth (Presbyterian), after observing that he had "long entertained the opinion that Medical Science should, in all cases, form part of a woman's education," etc., thus concludes: "The design of the Ladies' Medical Missionary Society seems to me truly benevolent, and its constitution eminently wise. I need not say that it has my most cordial wishes for its entire success, and that I shall rejoice to be able in any way to further your wishes in a cause so good."

Rev. Dr. Stevens (Episcopalian), now Bishop of Pennsylvania, who was for some years a physician, thus sanctions our plan: "Whatever will tend to give true, Christian elevation to woman, whatever will enlarge the sphere of her legitimate influence, whatever will give her more efficiency in raising her sex in heathen lands, and in spreading among them the life-giving truths of the glorious Gospel, is worthy of the attention and co-operation of all those who have at heart the true welfare of our race. 'The Ladies' Medical Missionary Society' aims to secure all these points, and is therefore deserving the support and encouragement of the Christian community."

In March, 1852, "An Appeal to American Christians" on behalf of this Society appeared in the LADY'S BOOK. It was kindly received by our host of readers, and responded to from almost every section of our wide land. The appeal was also noticed with commendation by many editors, who gave extracts, or reprinted our entire article in their journals. It was also republished in England, and circulated on the Continent. In short, our idea of training women to become physicians for their own sex and for children, and thus to be employed as Missionaries, was made known to hundreds of thousands who had never before considered its possibility or its importance.

In the following year, June, 1853, we published a second article in the LADY'S BOOK—"Doings of the Ladies' Medical Missionary Society." Two beneficiaries had been received, and had entered on their college studies: Miss Elizabeth G. Shattuck (Baptist), commended to us by Rev. A. D. Gillette, and Miss Mary J. F. Thayer (Congregational), commended by Rev. S. B. Treat, Secretary of the American Board of Commission for Foreign Missions. A third beneficiary was admitted—Miss Emeline Horton (Presbyterian), and we had been cheered by many tokens of public approval. No direct effort had been made to obtain subscriptions. The ladies most devoted to the cause hoped that the different Missionary Boards would take up the task of sending out and sustaining our missionaries. We had sought to open the way by gathering facts and diffusing information to show the need of this new aid in the conversion of heathen households to the Christian faith.

Our appeal had been widely circulated, and brought us a multitude of letters. Nearly all were encouraging as well as kind. We could fill a dozen pages with quotations from the letters of eminent clergymen and men of other professions, whom we had scarcely expected so frankly to approve. The following extracts are selected:—

From Rev. Howard Malcom, D. D.

Among the movements of the age denoting progress as well as philanthropy, the Ladies' Medical Missionary Society is one of the clear and strong indications.

"There can be no good reason for shutting the door against women becoming qualified to treat many diseases of women and children, and especially to preside at childbirth. Indeed, it seems as if we had gone backward in this matter. Among polished nations of antiquity, such as the Egyptians, women were the midwives and physicians as well as nurses. Inoculation is said to have been a discovery, or rather invention, of Turkish women; and a woman introduced it into Europe.

"Certainly a qualified feminine physician and surgeon could, as a missionary to the East, find access to harems and houses, where else there seems no chance to introduce Christianity."

From Rev. Robert Baird, D. D. (Deceased.)

"Most willingly I add my humble testimony to the nature of the noble enterprise on which you have entered. It is a most happy conception, this, of preparing Christian women to be useful as physicians to children and women in heathen lands. What a field of usefulness it opens!—so vast, so appropriate to pious ladies! Nor is the projected work less important for our own country. It is certainly no proof of advancing civilization among us, that men physicians are so often employed in cases where women should be. It is indeed time that this subject should be brought before the good people of this country. Feminine physicians are much more employed in many countries in Europe, among children and their own sex, than with us. Institutions in which women may receive a proper training, both as to medical science and the best treatment of the sick, are common on the Continent. It is high time we had such among us."

From Rev. L. S. Hamline, Bishop of the M. E. C.

"My feeble health forbids my enlarging, but I have great satisfaction in expressing my cordial approval of the three special objects for which the 'Appeal' announces your Association is formed—of the mode by which you propose to accomplish its aims, and of the arguments by which your noble enterprise is vindicated and commended to public favor. So far as my health and consequent retirement enable me, I certainly will 'encourage' your benevolent labors, and trust the favor of Providence will crown the efforts of the Society with success."

From Rev. A. A. Wilkits, Pastor of the First R. D. Church, Philadelphia.

"In answer to your 'Appeal,' I would say, that the idea of medically educating women has had for a long time my sympathy and admiration. I conceive its practical realization will confer immense benefit to society, and it ought to have the aid and comfort of every friend of humanity.

"The connection of this idea with the cause of missions is a new and very pleasing aspect of the subject, to my mind. It must, most certainly, commend itself to the head and heart of every friend of missions who will give it consideration. I look upon your organization as a noble step in the path of progress, and most heartily wish it God-speed."

From Rev. B. B. Smith, Bishop of Kentucky.

"My various relations as Pastor and Teacher have impressed me very profoundly with a sense of the importance of imparting to every well-educated mother a competent knowledge of the physical constitution of children. The laws of hygiene are next in importance to the laws of a higher life. I can easily conceive the intimate relation between a very superior medical education, imparted to a few favored ladies, for professional purposes, and its more general diffusion through all the educated classes, and ultimately through all ranks of life. I am fully persuaded that the time is near at hand when, except in extreme cases, the offices of ladies alone will be tolerated by ladies of the highest refinement, and, of course, midwives must be educated and skilful, as well as kind-hearted. May the blessings of Almighty Providence attend your efforts!"

From Rev. Wm. Neill, late President of Dickinson College, Carlisle.

"I have read your 'Appeal on behalf of the Medical Missionary Association,' and very cordially bid you God-speed in the noble design. In so far as you can qualify women, married or maiden, for service in the missionary cause, you will serve the cause of God and humanity. I am also of opinion that the duties of midwifery would be better performed by well qualified women than they can, ordinarily, be by men."

From Rev. Wm. Hosmer, Editor of the Northern Christian Advocate.

"Your idea of educating women as physicians for Foreign Missions, is most admirable. It will be popular, and do immense good. But what is the import of such a step? Does it not say that our customs, in regard to the medical treatment of women, are so vile that even the most degraded heathen spurns them? When your sex rise up with indignation against the abominations to which they are now subjected by the Faculty, the Faculty will stand aloof, and leave to woman the sanctity which belongs to her."

Public opinion seemed warmly favorable to the plan. The young women graduated with honor to the College and to their own abilities. But the obstacle to sending them arose from the heathen people, who, as the Foreign Mission Boards feared, were not ready for such an innovation. A letter of 1852:—

From Rt. Rev. Bishop Boone, Shanghai, China.

"All the ladies of the Mission have read your letter and circular, and I have consulted particularly with the more experienced of them. They all agree in the opinion that no single lady could sustain the position here of a medical practitioner among the Chinese women and children from house to house. She would most probably meet with such taunts and insults as would put an end to her going from house to house."

True, there were other foreign missionaries who expressed a stronger hope; both letters were dated in 1852:—

From Rev. H. G. O. Dwight, American Missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., at Constantinople.

"I may be too sanguine, but it is my present belief that a well-taught feminine physician in this place would find access to the families of all classes of the people, not excepting the Mohammedans; and she would not find time to attend to one-quarter of the calls that would be made upon her professional services. If, now, in connection with her medical knowledge and experience, she possessed the love of Christ, and the zeal of Christ for the maladies of the soul, how unlimited would be her opportunities for doing good! She would gain access where the missionary never can go, and access, too, to that portion of the community which greatly influences all the rest; for even in Turkey, where woman is so degraded, she still wields a mighty influence in society. For here, as everywhere else, it is true that those who stamp the character of the nursery stamp the character of the nation."

We found the American Foreign Mission Board inclined to Bishop Boone's opinion that serious disturbances might result to the Missions in India and China from the attempt to send out single ladies as physicians for women and children. The Boards declined to take the responsibility of sending our missionaries abroad; but Miss Thayer was employed to take charge of a school for Indian girls at the Tuscarora Mission.

The other two beneficiaries did not go out. Miss Shattuck was admitted to the Blockley Hospital as an assistant physician, where she continued to serve with the esteem of all who knew her. She had rare abilities for her office, and such abiding faith that she should finally be allowed to go on her Medical Mission to Burmah, where so many Baptist women have proved their usefulness, that she would never enter on her profession as a doctress here. But she was about to be appointed Resident Physician at Vassar College when she died of a malignant fever taken from sick patients, whom she would not leave in the hour of need. She was faithful in all her duties, and her premature decease was deeply mourned.

Miss Emeline Horton was married to the Rev. Mr. Cleveland. They were about to go out as Missionaries, when a severe illness so injured his constitution that he has never since been able to preach. Mrs. Cleveland is now Professor in the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania. This College was opened in Philadelphia in 1849. Since then it has struggled on with varying fortune, but always with usefulness and credit. A recent donation from the late Isaac Barton, amounting to sixty thousand dollars, has largely increased its opportunities of doing good. It is presided over by Mrs. Cleveland and others, ladies of distinguished ability and cultivation, who have won for the institution the thorough confidence of the public. Ladies preparing to be Missionaries will find in this College the best opportunities that the world can offer them.

As the Boards declined to send out our Missionaries, the plan was for a time given up. But another hope came after several years waiting. The wife of the Rev. Dr. Mason, a Baptist Missionary in Burmah, returned to this country with a new plan of teaching heathen women. This was by the "Woman's Union Missionary Society of America for Heathen Lands." We saw that this association, if successful, would in time give opportunity for sending out single ladies as Medical Missionaries, and we gave to Mrs. Mason our aid in forming the Philadelphia Branch of this Society. It was organized in May, 1861. The New York Society had been formed a few months earlier. We have no space in this article to give an adequate idea of the marvellous success of this effort to evangelize heathen women. We would refer our readers to the "Reports" of the Societies, and to their general organ, "The Missionary Link."

We make no boast of our own doings, but God's time had come for the enlightenment of heathen women, and His blessing rested on our work. We give a short extract from a letter of Miss Brittan, an American lady, who has been for six years the zenana teacher in Calcutta:—

"The Missionaries, who have been laboring for the last fifty years in India, were never able to gain access to these prisoners, but they prepared the way for us. They taught the gentlemen, and, by the Christian knowledge they imparted, have shaken to its very foundation the whole structure of heathenism, so that gradually one superstition after another has been thrown away, and now gentlemen of the highest castes are desirous that the blessing of Christian civilization should be extended to them, and even to their women, that their nation may arise to take its true position among the enlightened nations of the earth."

An extract from a speech of Bishop Simpson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, on our seventh anniversary, thus sums up the results of our Mission at home and abroad:—

"This Society has been in the field but a few years, and on this Seventh Anniversary you come, not with lamentation and sorrow, but with lessons of glorious deeds. From every open door come glad tidings of rejoicing, crowding to you from all lands whither your Missionaries have gone. They send back word that 'the fields are white, and the harvest is ready.' They ask for more laborers and more means. The work there stimulates the work here. Oh, may the sunshine of Christianity pour into every hamlet and every home in India; and may the women, ay, and the men, break from their bondage into the light of holiness! I congratulate you, Christian ladies, on the success of your Society."

Our Philadelphia Branch had chiefly directed its efforts to the support of native Bible-women, and of schools for native girls, though we also assisted in zenana teaching. Now, it seems that the time has come for medical ladies to be sent out as healers and teachers in the homes of the awakened and expecting heathen. The way is open. In Burmah, India, and China we are called to meet their needs. We give an extract from a letter of Mrs. Thomas, wife of the Missionary in charge of the Girl's Orphanage in Bareilly, Northern India. After dwelling upon the pressing necessity of a Medical Missionary to instruct the pupils, and practise among the natives, she says:—

"Since last December we have been visited by at least three wealthy native gentlemen. One of them offered to build a small hospital here, on the mission premises, for the use of the class, and to receive patients when it was necessary to have them under immediate supervision. Doubtless these gentlemen would subscribe largely for books, charts, etc. They are quite ready to take upon themselves the support of such girls as may enter the class, while they are going through the course. Gunga Pashad told me it would be one of the noblest and best works we could enter upon. He said it would open the doors of the zenanas to us as nothing else would. Besides this, said he, you will save thousands of lives that are now sacrificed through the ignorant and bad practice of native doctors. Now, I see no way of having this class of native girls properly instructed except by a lady; and you will see at once that a full-fledged Medical Missionary lady is what we want as soon as possible, here in the Girl's Orphanage. I ought to have made this appeal two years ago. Do you think the Women's Union Missionary Society, to which you belong, would help us by sending out the doctress if one could be found willing to come? I am sure that in addition to teaching this class, she would find plenty of practice among the native Christians and among zenana women in the city; and her pupils could attend her at these places, as soon as they are in any way competent, and so acquire the practice as well as the theory of medicine."

We immediately made arrangements with a lady—Miss Clara Swain, M. D.—eminently fitted for this important post; pious, faithful, and thoroughly educated in her profession. She was to go out with Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Gracey, who are stationed at Lucknow, and have the orphanage at Bareilly under their care; but the ladies of the Methodist Church, to which Miss Swain belonged, had formed a society to co-operate with the Methodist Mission Board, and claimed the privilege of sending out Miss Swain and supporting her. She sailed last November, and has now probably opened her Medical School, the first ever taught by a woman in Asia. Thus our long cherished hope has been fulfilled. We quote a few words from the pen of Dr. Parker, to show the feeling which exists through Hindoostan and Burmah, and, to some extent, even in China:—

"The demand for Medical Missionaries is great. The heathen call for them, and woman's missionary societies are ready to send them out, but where are the qualified laborers? Devoted Christian ladies must be educated for this work, and other devoted ladies must aid them with the necessary means."

We have made great progress during the last twenty years in the unification of nations. China, in particular, after an isolation of thousands of years, has been thrown open in a measure to European enterprise. But all that has been done has not reached the heart of the matter. After a century of British rule, the Hindoos and Mahometans of India keep up their social and religious barriers against the white intruders with unrelenting severity, and the empire of the superior race is maintained through strength alone. The only effectual conquest is that which shall be won in the homes of the people, and shall bind their hearts to the victors. Let the women of India be civilized and made Christian, and the very root of disunion will be torn up. And how better can the work be done than by the Christian Doctress? She has access to the innermost recesses of heathen homes; she has the reverence which all Eastern nations pay to medical knowledge; she has the natural kindness felt by men for women. If India and China are to take their place by the side of Europe and America, in this way only can it be done.

TREHERNE'S ROSE.

BY LOUISE BARTON.

It was that loveliest hour of early autumn, when it is not yet sunset, but the shadows fall with longer sweep, the cloudless skies are glowing with a mellow sapphire, and the freshening breeze just stirs the tree-tops in the park with a rustle as of the approach of evening. It is an overgrown, neglected spot—so broken in upon by undergrowth, that it might seem a stretch of unkempt wildwood, filling the low-lying hollow between the rambling old ivy-grown grange upon the hill and the sea, blue and golden still, that swept away beyond the wood. An avenue once crossed this deepest glade, but now the untrained growth of a dozen years had wandered at will into and across the road, and so left but an irregular bridle-path. Along this, on that autumn evening, was sauntering a man not far upon the sunny side of middle age, if one judged from the thread or two of gray in the dark hair, and the lines of care in the face, which, if not handsome, was such as impressed even a casual observer with its thoughtful power and character. If one judged from the athletic figure, full of strength and vigor, one might perhaps strike off some years from the first impression of his age; and yet there was that about the firm-set mouth and the keen gray eyes which seemed to have little fellowship with the sunny side of anything. He certainly had chosen a gloomy walk enough. He loitered on among the gathering shades, his gaze fixed absently upon the fallen leaves, which now and then he tossed from out his path with a twirl of his stout cane.

The wood had been very still as he went idly on. The rustle of the foliage, which makes loudest stir when falling into decay, the twittering of nest-bound birds, the hoarse caw of the ravens swooping overhead toward their ancestral oaks about the grange, and here and there the patter of a nut dropped by a squirrel, or shaken off in the light breeze, were all the sounds that reached his ears. But as he neared a cross-road through the wood, or rather a mere path which formed a short cut through his lands to a village which lay beyond them, the sound of hoofs caught his attention. With an impatient shrug he left the path and struck into the copse, which was here only dense enough to serve as a screen, not a barrier.

Returned but yesterday, after an absence of a dozen years, he did not care to encounter any chance acquaintance. All ties of neighborhood had been too rudely snapped asunder long since, when he had gone away into exile, for him to hope or even to wish to join them ever again. The rending had been fiercely painful at the time—had been cruelly felt, even through an anguish keener beyond all comparison. But the pang of that rending was over now. It had been a sharp lesson, but it had been learned in early manhood, that it was possible to stand alone, without one friend, and with the stain of blackest calumny upon his name, and yet to stand, not falling into the shame and degradation which all who knew him believed to be his.

Ralph Treherne's whole life had been overshadowed by one hour, and that hour was that which made him the master of the grange. Treherne Grange with its lands was an entailed estate, and Ralph being the son of a younger son, had, in childhood, been left by his father's death a pensioner upon his uncle. The elder Treherne was a rough man, and of a savage temper when roused, as not seldom happened, by wine. He was of the hard-riding, fox-hunting type of squire, and, under his bachelor rule, the old halls of the grange were sunk in dull and gloomy silence, broken only by carousals. It might have been imagined that Ralph, his heir, would have grown to the same stature of manhood, with mind and principles dwarfed in such an atmosphere. But whether it were that in his memory some breath of the earlier life yet lingered, and made him revolt against that which encompassed him—certain it is, that as he emerged from mere boyhood, he drew more and more aloof from the old squire, his boon companions and surroundings. Compassion for the lad, and kindly remembrance of his father, and the days when Treherne Grange was under fairer auspices, induced some one or two of the country families, friends of the Trehernes in former times, to take him by the hand. Of course there were prejudices against him to be overcome—for what that was good could in these latter days come out of Treherne Grange? But in his frank straightforwardness he was fast overcoming them, and making his own way, when, in the midst of all, he fell in love.

Now, it so happened that the Dacres had been the first, years ago, to turn the cold shoulder upon the Treherne Grange proceedings. Therefore, the elder Treherne, who bore no good-will to his equals and censors in the neighborhood generally, kept the fiercest of his enmity for this one family. His rage was beyond bounds when some of his satellites reported on the visits of his nephew; and there was no gentle scene between them in the presence of more than one witness, ending in the uncle's throwing a glass of wine in the young man's face, and taunting him with being a milk-sop like that white-livered Dacre brood. Young Treherne, stung to the quick, flung himself on his horse, and rode straight from his uncle's presence to that of his lady love. Pretty Ellen Dacre was not one to soothe his angry mood, but, rather, grew alarmed at his vehemence and incoherent words of rage. As he rode up she was sauntering along, gathering roses on the lawn, which overhung the sea, and which could be seen in full view from Treherne Grange. She had half shrunk from him as he grasped both her hands, and bade her vow nothing should part them—nothing that his uncle could say to her father. She had obeyed. And then as he grew calmer, she had paced the terrace, to and fro, leaning upon his arm; and at parting had fastened a rose on his coat, playfully declaring that she would be true as long as it should live. Her words were verified. Two hours later there was the report of a gun above Treherne Park, where Gilbert Treherne and his friends were shooting, the hill round which wound the bridle-path from Dacre Hall. One of the sportsmen coming up, found Gilbert Treherne fallen on his face full length upon the ground, while his nephew, stooping beside him, raised the body, which proved to be shot through the heart. In vain the young man explained that he had only hurried to the spot on hearing the shot, and that the gun must have gone off accidentally in his uncle's hold. The bystanders had witnessed the morning's altercation—and Ralph was the heir. Appearances were too strong for him. Nothing could be proven in his favor by the position of the gun, for he had thrown it out of his way on springing from his horse to his uncle's aid. And although nothing could be proven legally against him, yet public opinion, even among those who heretofore most warmly had befriended him, now condemned him. Mr. Dacre, on the morning after Treherne's release from prison, passed him by without a bow; and Ellen sent him not a word. He faced the frown of his little world, until some later nine-days' wonder made him half forgotten; and then he left the country, and had only yesterday returned.

No wonder, then, that though he dared boldly meet any man's glance, he did not care to encounter the gaze of curiosity which would be his only welcome home. And so he drew apart, while the hoof-beats approached nearer and nearer. He did not intend to conceal himself, however, merely to avoid being in the direct path of the riders, for two he presently saw they were. They came on at a canter—a stripling and a girl hardly more than a year or two older. Treherne set his teeth together as she rode past, without a glance for the man making his way there through the undergrowth, who, in his velveteen coat and slouched hat, might have been the keeper. But he looked long and hard at her. Every movement of the girlish figure resting in such unconscious grace in the saddle—the massy, half-curling knot of golden hair, the dazzling white and rose tints of the face, half shaded by the black plume of her riding-hat; the very smile with which she turned to her companion, were Ellen Dacre's.

Treherne breathed more lightly as she passed him, and the next moment half smiled to himself. Of course it was not Ellen Dacre. The thirteen years which told so wearily on him, could not have left her quite the same. It must be one of the sisters—Lucy, Rosamund—yes, little Rosamund must be quite seventeen now; and Guy—that lad was tiny toddling Guy.

He had been moved by the rush of memories which the fancied presence of Ellen Dacre brought. But not one lingering breath of the old love had been among them. Anger, scorn, impatience at the cloud which overhung his life, had pressed home to him. But his boyish love had died out long ago. Not because she gave him up. From the very moment when he saw his name could not be cleared, he determined that she should not bear it with the shame that clung to it. If she had sent to him to come to her but once—had said her father's will stood now between them—or had even said that she was only a girl, not strong enough to take the burden of the world's contempt upon her shoulders, or if she had merely written him one line—the simple word farewell—he could have kept his first sweet memories of her, he might have loved her to this day, or at least could not have distrusted all women for her sake. It was long since he had thought of her before, and he strode out with these bitter recollections thronging on him. When on a sudden a loud shriek broke the calm of the air, and, as he sprang forward into the road again, a riderless horse dashed past him.

One instant and he had gained the turn of the road, and was stooping there, lifting the fair head upon his arm, with a shuddering recollection of another whom he had thus supported in this very park. He clasped the cold, limp hands, while Guy stood by in helpless horror, for it was he who had caused the accident by some mad prank which terrified her horse. Treherne directed him to a brook which bubbled by, from which he brought water in his cap, and then the boy was dispatched to the grange for aid. Very soon a rude litter was arranged, and the unconscious girl borne to the house, while Guy rode off for his mother, since to remove Rosamund that night was out of the question. Out of the question for that night and for many more. Blank as little Mrs. Dacre looked at the prospect, there was nothing for it but to prepare for a lengthened reception of the hospitalities of Treherne Grange. The shock to Rosamund had been so severe that for weeks she hovered between life and death.

Treherne Grange appeared to have no master in those days, or rather to have an invisible one; for surely some ruling spirit so ordered all that Mrs. Dacre found her every need anticipated, and the way was smoothed for Mr. Dacre and for Guy—poor Guy, who lurked along the corridors, and dogged the doctor's every step. Treherne was seldom or never to be met with after Mr. Dacre's first visit, when the host had placed Treherne Grange at Mr. Dacre's command as earnestly as under the circumstances an utter stranger must have done. But Guy, of whom no one else had time to think, touched to the quick the sympathies of the man who had not forgotten those days of his own youth, when he first felt himself an outsider to every one. No woman could have listened more patiently to the boyish lamentations and outpourings concerning the only home sister—for Lucy was dead, and Ellen long since married. Treherne's gloomy library was the one spot where a gleam of light came into the lad's heart on those unutterably dark days.

This morning was darker than all that went before. Not that Rosamund was now in danger—she was even gaining in strength—but more than one eminent surgeon had just met in consultation, and, as they drove away again, Guy, who had been lying in wait for them for hours on the stairs, rushed past Treherne, shaking off the kind hand laid upon his shoulder.

Treherne did not follow as the boy rushed down the steps and out into the wood. He merely stood and looked after him. His heart knew its own bitterness too well not to fathom this. "Best leave him to himself till the first pang is over," he said, and shut himself up in the library, thinking far more of the brother's pain than of the sister, who perhaps lay dying. A hard world had not so deadened his sympathies that he could turn to his usual friends, his books, with any zest now. He was idly walking up and down the room, when there came a tap at his door. He gave a careless "Come in," but started when Mrs. Dacre stood upon the threshold.

She paused there, putting her hands out as if blindly reaching for support. Her face was stained with weeping, and lines of care had graven deeply the fair face once so like Ellen's. Against this woman Treherne had felt even more anger than against the girl who had played him false, anger which he had never borne for Mr. Dacre, who had merely had a surface knowledge of him, while this woman had been his friend in all his troubles till that last, and therefore should have understood him better than to have believed him guilty of that crime. But now he forgot all this. He went to the grief-stricken mother, and she clasped her hands over his arm, and waited a moment, struggling for composure. Then she said, sobbingly:—

"Rosamund has begged to see you, Ralph Treherne."

How long since anyone had called him Ralph. That word, if possible, warmed him more to her, and he gave his arm as they went up stairs together. But, when she would have entered with him to Rosamund, she burst into such a passion of weeping, that she could only sign to him to pass in alone, while she went away to her own chamber.

Treherne opened the door, expecting to see a shaded room and a perhaps dying girl, for that there was fresh cause for distress he knew.

But, to his astonishment, sunbeams danced in brokenly through the ivy drooping round the windows, and flitted even to the sofa, where she was lying propped on pillows. Her blue wrapper made her pallor yet more evident, while it brightened the clustering rings of golden hair, for the wealth of coiling tresses was gone. The voice, though faint, was cheerful which bade him good-morning, and a little hand was stretched out for his.

"I was hardly prepared to see you so well, Miss Dacre," he said, as he took the chair beside her.

"Where is Guy, Mr. Treherne?" she asked, abruptly.

"Guy? He wandered out into the park some time ago," was Treherne's answer.

"They won't let me see him, yet, Mr. Treherne. He told mamma you were so good to him. Oh! would you keep him with you as much as possible, and let no one but yourself tell him!"—

"Tell him what?" he asked, bending toward her with a pitying impulse, for the pale lip began to quiver, and two large tears coursed slowly down her white cheeks.

"Tell him—I shall be a cripple always—I shall never walk again."

What could he say? But there was no need to soothe her with words of compassion; for she brushed the two tears hastily away, and no others came to take their place. She went on, bravely:—

"Don't look as if you were so sorry for me. I am so glad, so glad I am not to die. And it would have been so hard for Guy. It was not his fault, you know, but he thinks it was, that Shekla threw me. He will miss me in his rides, but still there is a great deal of happiness in living, Mr. Treherne. He will see that after the first shock is over."

"You will help him to bear up, I see," Treherne said, looking at her cordially. "You are a generous little maiden. You will not forget that he is even a greater sufferer than you."

"Indeed, he is. And this is why I sent for you, Mr. Treherne. My father feels the blow so much for me that he cannot be quite just to Guy, and mamma is so wretched that the sight of her grief will but make the poor boy more unhappy yet. Oh! if I could but see him for a moment. They are all mistaken when they say it would do me harm. If I could but see him, I could make him see that I can bear it very well, can bear everything but having him so miserable. But you will tell him, Mr. Treherne—you will find him now, at once, and comfort him?"

He rose. "I will tell him," he said, lifting the wasted hand reverently to his lips, "that he has no right to be miserable when an angel is left to him on earth."

A lovely color flushed her pallid face, and she followed him with her eyes as he turned toward the door. But, when he had reached it, she spoke his name again. "This time I have a very unangelic request," she said, lightly. "I do want so much to look at myself. Won't you bring me that small hand-glass yonder?" Then, observing his glance of astonishment, she added: "I suppose mamma and my nurse think my face will frighten myself; they put me off every time I have asked for a peep into the mirror. Please let me have one, or I shall be fancying I am wrinkled and marked with smallpox and quite gray. They have cut my hair off I know; Guy used to like my hair."

Treherne obeyed. With childlike eagerness she gazed into the glass as he held it for her. He was beginning to think the face reflected there, wan as it was, was lovelier than anything on earth. But she turned her head away, and hid her eyes upon the pillow.

"Don't let him know how I look, Mr. Treherne. Perhaps I won't be quite so ugly when he is allowed to see me. And you will come and tell me about him, won't you? And—and I should like to see you again for yourself—you have been so kind to us all," she added, timidly, looking up at him with dewy eyes once more. "I'm afraid you won't get rid of me for some time yet. The surgeons say I must not move."

It was some time—for weeks did she remain a prisoner at the grange. Treherne still maintained the course which had been his from the beginning, therefore they met but rarely. Yet he was fast learning to watch for the occasional interview brought about by Guy; or for the bow and smile from the latticed window as he rode by for it. She was fast becoming the rose of the world to Treherne. The first rose which he had worn was bright and glowing, but it withered in the hour of his trial. The second was but pale and fragile, and he could not hope to wear it, yet it breathed a sweetness over his life which he had not thought that life could know again.

So time wore on, and Rosamund was to-day to leave Treherne Grange. She had now first ventured down stairs, leaning on Guy's arm, for the boy could not bear that she should use a crutch. As they paced the terrace for a few yards, Guy stopped his sister, earnestly:—

"Rosy," he began, then faltered as the pale face was uplifted, and he saw how inappropriate the pet name had become.

"Your white rose," she said, softly, with a smile; "what does Guy want with her?"

"No one has been near Mr. Treherne, Rosy, and I think it would be but kind in you to stop in the library and say good-by."

"But would he like it?"

"That I am sure he would."

They passed at once into the hall, and Rosamund tapped at the library door. There came no response.

"He must be out," her brother said. "What if you were to rest here and wait for him? Nay, you need not draw back. He bids me come and go, just as I choose."

She turned the lock. But the apartment was not unoccupied, as she had thought. There, at the farther end, sat Treherne, his head bowed on his arms crossed on a writing-table. Rosamund moved away. But at the rustle of her dress he raised his head, then rose at once, expressing in a few earnest words his pleasure at the visit. He led her to the seat which he had just quitted—the only luxurious article which the stiff, old-fashioned plenishing of the library could boast. Guy lingered, talking for some moments, then strolled out again upon the terrace.

"And you will come and see us soon, Mr. Treherne?" said Rosamund, for she and Guy had been unfolding "the order of their going" back to Dacre Hall.

Treherne made no reply, and she repeated her words, this time in the form of a question.

"Not so, Miss Dacre. We may hardly meet again after to-day."

She uttered nothing in reply. Only the hot blood rushed into her face, and she dropped her eyes upon the carpet. When, after moments that were very long to her, she lifted them again, she met his resting full upon her, wistfully. He stretched his hand to her across the table. "Did you think it was not pain to me to say that we can meet no more?" he asked, keeping her soft palm in a light clasp while he was speaking. "But, Miss Dacre, there is not a door in all this county which would open wide for me."

"For you? Mr. Treherne, for you?"

"I do not think you can have heard my story—its novelty died away when you were a mere child. I do not think you know this hand which touches yours is called a murderer's."

For an instant she shuddered. But only for an instant. In the next her other hand was safely laid on his, and then she withdrew both, and folded them together on the table, looking up, unshrinkingly to him.

"You do not believe it?"

"I do not," she said, quietly.

"And yet," he answered, "those who should have known me better than you, did. How long will your faith stand the test of hearing the evil story?"

"Tell it me yourself. I shall trust it from no other."

So he told her, leaving out the cause of his uncle's wrath, the woman who had played him false. "You see," he ended, "there is no shadow of a hope of clearing my fair fame. There is no witness to prove my innocence. The crime could not be proven, but its brand is on me all the same."

"But you did wrong in one thing," Rosamund replied. "You should never have turned your back upon the accusation. You should have faced it out here in the grange."

"I see I have not been frank enough with you. I—poor fool that I was—was madly in love; and when, after the trial, she passed me by again and again without recognition, I had not nerve to bear it."

"No woman could be so hard. You must have been hasty in your judgment of her."

"Not more hasty than her second engagement, which was arranged before I quitted England. She married within the year."

"And you have never married for her sake?"

He smiled. "For her sake—but hardly in the sense you mean, Miss Dacre. As the utter coldness of her falsehood killed my love, it withered, too, my faith in all fair-seeming, and I learned distrust."

Rosamund shook her head. "We are not better—you and I—than our kind," she said, gravely, "and we are trustworthy."

"You are, I am sure," he replied.

"Then," she said, softly, "if one woman has shaken your faith by her changeableness, let another establish it by knowing no shadow of changing."

He bent toward her, then checked himself, and, rising suddenly, went away to the window, standing there with his back to her. "It is too late," he said. "Rosamund, twelve years ago such a woman as you might have saved me, but now it is too late to breast the tide. I must never look now for the lot of other men. I must end my days, as I have lived them heretofore, alone."

No answer, and he remained standing there apart, feeling his isolation to the full. But presently Rosamund had made her painful way across the room, holding by chairs and tables as she came. "It is not too late," she cried. "Have patience only, all shall yet be right."

He answered nothing, save by the firm resolve which sprang into being, responsive to her words. He could not trust himself to speak and leave unsaid that which he must not utter till he should indeed have lived down ill-report, as she had said. Guy coming in across the lawn just then, broke off the conversation.

Years went by before it was resumed. Meantime, as Rosamund had foretold, her friend had overcome. People first began to say Treherne had broken off his wild course on the Continent, and was attempting to redeem the first half of his life with the last. After a time it dawned upon them that his course abroad need not of necessity have been wild; and once amenable to conviction, his censors found more than one authority for the fact that wild it was not. Little by little doubt was thrown on the old story of his guilt, until at last those who had shaken most their heads over his name, were now the foremost in declaring suspicion had been harbored only in a few weak minds. All this did not come to pass at once, without now and again a drawback. But Treherne's calm dignity, which never courted an advance, and yet repulsed none, his public spirit and charities, above all, an opportune shipwreck on the rocky coast beneath Dacre Hall, when every life on board was mainly owed to Treherne's daring, smoothed the way for the turn in the current of popular feeling.

It was just at twilight on a summer evening, that he rode up round the lawn at Dacre Hall, and sprang up the portico steps. He had but touched the bell, when a voice from the drawing-room window greeted him.

"Mr. Treherne, is that you? Come in! I thought I knew your step."

Rosamund was lounging in an arm-chair at the window open to the floor, and held her hand out to Treherne in welcome as he entered. But he did not take it. He threw himself upon the seat opposite, and leaned forward, looking at her before he spoke. "Miss Dacre," he said, at last, "if you suffer me to take your hand, I mean to keep it. Only you can mend or mar my fate now. As far as concerns the outside world, my victory is won. Read that," and he laid in her lap an open letter.

She could hardly hold it her wrist was shaking so. The characters so swam before her, that it was a long moment before she could make out that the writer was no less a person than one of the most prominent men in the county, and that he was urging Ralph Treherne to stand for a certain constituency. She had not one word for him. But she turned upon Ralph a face radiant with triumphant faith in him.

"Rosamund," he said, in a sunken voice, "since I told you my story in the library at Treherne Grange, I have been dreaming of this hour. When you so bravely crossed the library and came to me, I resolved that if ever I should live down the stain upon my life, I would put that life in your hand, to keep or cast aside as it should please you. But I am not strong enough for that. I cannot suffer you to put me aside. I have waited long; I must, I will have my rose now! He had risen in his eagerness, and she stood, too, steadying herself by his arm.

"A poor, faded, broken rose," she said, with quivering lips.

"The one rose of the world to me." And then she laid both hands in his, to have and to hold.

GODEY'S COURSE OF LESSONS IN DRAWING.

LESSON XII.

PROPORTIONS OF THE HUMAN FIGURE.

WE have deemed it best to keep this class of drawing, treating of the proportions which different parts of the human frame bear to each other, according to the acknowledged standard of beauty, as derived from measurements from the antique, separate from the others. The student will find the lessons here given of great assistance in enabling her to draw from casts. We should advise her to habituate herself to this given in Fig. 1, is equal in width to the length of one eye and a half, and the height to one-half. The mouth in profile is exactly the same height, but only half the width; the upper lip projects less than the lower one. The nose in width is equal to one eye, and the height to two eyes, measuring parallel to the eyebrows (Fig. 2). The eye is composed of the ball, the sight, the lachrymal point (which is the point nearest the nose), the upper and lower eyelids, and the eyebrow (Fig. 3). The ball, when seen in front, is an exact circle, with the sight in the centre; the height is equal to half the length, and the eyebrow is situated above the eyelid about one-third the length of the eye. practice, as it will lay a foundation for attaining with ease a correctness of proportion, which constitutes the chief beauty in drawings of the human figure. She must not, however, suppose that beauty is always attained by attention to these rules, but chiefly correctness. There are many styles of beauty, the qualities of some consisting in a slight deviation in some point or other from the established proportions. This, however, is not carried so far as to become incorrectness.

"THE HUGUENOTS."

BY J. K. S.

In the dim garden, by the ivied wall,
 Silent they stand, enfolded each by each;
 Silent, save for a look, that serves for all,
 And more than all that lips and tongue can teach;
 Around his arm she strives to draw the band
 That saves his body, through his honor's stain:
 Can he that look of passionate love withstand?
 The mute appeal that those closed lips contain!
 But see! his hand the knotted scarf withholds!

On his firm lips a sad, sweet smile doth play;
 His dark eyes scan the face his arms enfold;
 "It cannot be, my love," he seems to say.
 For truth and God he loveth more than all,
 And therefore her he loveth still the more;
 A glorious paradox! to disenthral
 The soul, by adding bonds it lacked before!
 To all our lives let this an emblem be:
 "Who would love others, let him first love me!"

DESTINY.

BY VIOLETTE WOODS.

It was noon-recess at a country-school. Groups of girls of different ages were scattered here and there throughout the woods, but one sat idly and listlessly upon the stone steps that led into the house. She was a beautiful child of twelve or thirteen years, with merry brown eyes, clustering ringlets, and rosy, dimpled cheeks. As she sat there, with her chin resting in the palm of her hand, her little foot beating an accompaniment to a woodland song which escaped her lips, two gentlemen rode leisurely up, and startled her from her reverie. After raising their hats, and bowing politely, they asked for a glass of water, and, having received it, passed on their way. They had gone but a little distance, however, when one of them turned, rode back to the door in which the young girl was still standing, and asked:—

"What is your name, little maid?"

"Betsy Jones," she answered, after a moment's hesitation.

"And what is your father's name?"

"Timothy Jones, if you please."

"Do you know that you are very pretty?" he asked, gazing admiringly into her bright, uplifted face.

"Yes, sir," she replied, with an indignant toss of her brown curls.

"Who beside myself has told you so?" he inquired.

"Jonathan Doolittle, sir."

"Ah! yes. A lover of yours, isn't he?"

"So he says, sir," she replied, not at all disconcerted by the gentleman's pertinacity.

"Well," he continued, "when you have grown to be a young lady, I am coming back to see you. Do you suppose you will still be living here?"

"Yes, sir, if we have not moved away."

The stranger laughed, exclaimed "Very likely," and, putting his hand into his pocket, drew forth a small volume bound in blue and gold. "I have a book of poems," said he, "which I would like to present to you. Will you accept and read them?"

She hesitated awhile, bent her dark eyes upon the ground, and finally answered: "I am much obliged for your kindness, sir, but I am not allowed to receive presents from strangers."

"But it is only a book," said he, "and I am sure there will be no impropriety in receiving it even from a stranger. If your parents object, you can destroy it or give it away. Will you accept it?"

She replied in the affirmative.

"Betsy," said he, "I hope you will like these poems. They were written by Schiller, a German poet of great talent, and you will find them worthy, not only of perusal, but study." He wrote her name upon the fly-leaf, and, handing it to her, added: "Now, good-by, and remember I am coming to see you in a few years." He looked once again into her dark eyes, kissed his hand to her, and cantered out of sight.

The dimples in the young girl's cheeks grew deeper, and a soft smile gathered upon her lips, as she opened the volume and read the inscription: "To Betsy Jones, from an unknown friend."

"I wonder what papa and mamma would think if they knew of this," she murmured, half-aloud. "But he had no business asking my name and so many other questions. I've half a mind not to read a word in his book, but then I should be the loser by it, for I am not so ignorant as to know nothing of Schiller's merit." She threw on her straw hat, and, strolling off into the woods, soon seated herself beneath a large tree, and was soon absorbed in the contents of her book.

As the two young men rode along, one of them said to the other: "I tell you, Harvard, that is my wife."

"What? That little brown gypsy to whom you were talking in the door of the school-house?"

"Yes. That very 'gypsy,' as you call her, will one day be Mrs. Grant Atherton. I saw my destiny mirrored in her eyes as plainly and as clearly as we saw the stars mirrored in that little lake, upon whose margin we stood last night."

"Don't be foolish, Grant," was the only reply he received to his enthusiastic outburst.

"I am not foolish," Grant returned, "only convinced. Remember my prophecy, for, if you live, you will see its fulfilment. Shakespeare says:—

'What Fate imposes men must needs abide;
It boots not to resist both wind and tide.'

I shall not resist mine, however, and am truly grateful for having had a glimpse of it thus early."

"Pshaw! I am astonished at hearing so sensible a man talk so foolishly. I'll warrant you'll never see or hear of her again," and Harvard Graham tapped his dusty boot with his whip.

"But I will see her again," exclaimed Grant, warmly. "I am no more afraid of losing her than I am afraid of ceasing to breathe while I continue to live."

"Why, Grant, you do not even know her name."

"Yes, I do."

"What is it?" Harvard was becoming interested.

Grant hesitated, and his cheek colored perceptibly.

"Why, what is the matter?" inquired Harvard. "You are blushing like a school-boy. What is her name?"

"Betsy Jones," Grant replied, doggedly, averting his head.

"Betsy Jones!" repeated Harvard, with peculiar emphasis, and his laugh rang loud and long through the woods. "What would your stately mother and my own little Bella say to the alliance?" he asked, as soon as he could control himself sufficiently to speak.

"Nothing, I suppose, seeing that they are willing to receive you into the family. But, Harvard," he continued, seriously, "please say nothing of this at home. Whenever they do get a joke on me, they torment me unmercifully."

Harvard promised to keep his secret; and, relapsing into silence, they proceeded on their journey, until the shades of evening induced them to seek shelter for the night at a village inn. After they retired, Grant tossed restlessly upon his couch.

"Of what are you thinking?" asked Harvard.

"Of Betsy Jones," Grant replied, with a sigh. "The impression made upon my mind and heart to-day is ineffaceable as well as indescribable. I cannot tell you what I saw in that sweet, childish face to charm me so irresistibly. It was not her eyes, for others as bright have beamed upon me, and I derived no pleasure from their brilliancy; nor her mouth, for rosier lips have smiled upon me without arousing a softer feeling than admiration of their beauty."

"You contended to-day that it was destiny," said Harvard. "It must be so, though I acknowledge that I cannot indorse your theory."

"Yes, it is destiny," said Grant, fervently. "She is the embodiment of my ideal in embryo. The magic touch of womanhood will develop it in all its fair and beautiful proportions."

"I am glad to see your heart even this much interested," said Harvard, warmly. "I had predicted that you would be a bachelor, but there is, at least, the prospect of a life of happiness for you."

It was late before Grant could sleep, and, when he did, he dreamed that he was a rejected suitor, that Betsy Jones had discarded him for Jonathan Doolittle.

Six years passed away. It was evening in Rome. A full moon illuminated the city of seven hills, once the queen and pride of a worshipping world. Grant Atherton, restless and wearied, derived no happiness from her thousand sources of beauty. He had drawn from every fount, but still his thirst was not slacked. At twenty-five he was tired of the world. His mother was dead, his sister married to Harvard Graham, and, with no domestic ties to bind him at home, he was a wanderer from it. Although he had spent years in society, he had never loved. But one face had ever made an impression upon his heart, and that had haunted him ever since it had dawned upon him at the door of the country school-house; bright, pure, and, as he then fondly thought, the day-star of his destiny. He had recalled it in his dreams, where it had shone upon him with renewed and fadeless lustre, and he had watched for it with every step he had taken in native or foreign lands. He had once visited the old school-house, hoping to obtain some clue to her parents; but, upon inquiry, learned that no such man as Timothy Jones had ever resided in the neighborhood. So he turned his horse's head, and wended his way homeward.

For months he had been in Rome. Restless, unoccupied, moody, and reserved, he attracted attention, and few forgot his appearance who had ever seen him once. As I have said, it was night—night, glorious, beautiful as those of which Italy alone can boast. Grant wandered among the mighty ruins which surrounded him on every side, and, without being aware of it, his feet strayed to the Coliseum. He had visited it at morn, when the beams of the rising sun had bathed its broken monuments in roseate light; at noon, when the golden rays sifted through every lonely niche and arch; and when the sombre shades of twilight threw a dusky mantle over the venerable pile; but never had it possessed such a fascination for him as upon this particular night. The moon poured a flood of silvery lustre through myriad decaying arches, revealing the lonely passages and crumbling stairways which once had teemed with life, and happiness, and pride. As he wound carelessly along through the deserted, desolate ruin, emerging from darkness into light, the hum of distant voices fell upon his ear. He stood silently in the shadow of a broken column, and waited unseen. A gentleman and lady, accompanied by a guide, approached the spot upon which he stood, and paused just where the moonlight fell full upon them, and clothed them in her silvery sheen. The gentleman was tall and dignified, gray-haired and middle-aged. The lady, and Grant Atherton's heart almost ceased to beat as his eyes fell upon her, was young, beautiful, and his destiny. The same matchless eyes, which but once had looked into his, were before him now; but her gaze was turned from him, and he dared not move, lest he should frighten her away. Her dress was of white, and she wore no ornament except a cameo pin at the throat; but a crimson scarf, wound carelessly about her shoulders and head, protected her from the dews of night, and formed a pleasing contrast to her snowy attire.

"Come, Zoe, we will go farther yet, if you are not tired."

Grant could not hear the lady's reply to the old gentleman's invitation, but her white robe fluttered against him as she passed, and he inhaled the exquisite perfume of the flowers she held in her hand. He waited until their return, intending to follow and learn their place of residence, but they entered a carriage and were driven rapidly away. He picked up a rose that had fallen from her hand, kissed it reverently and placed it in his bosom. As he lay upon his couch that night, he pondered in his mind this incident of the evening, and tried to reconcile it with that which had made such an impression upon him six years before.

"Her name was Betsy—Betsy Jones," he said to himself, "and this young lady was called Zoe. I am sure of it, for I heard it distinctly. But they have eyes alike, and the same expression of countenance, except that Zoe's is more thoughtful, more exalted, just as Betsy's must be if she is the woman I thought she would make. Well, well, 'it is all but a dream at the best,' " was the conclusion of his reflections, "but I shall certainly be glad when the awakening comes."

For a week he wandered over the city, peering into every face he saw, seeking the one which shone upon him amid the ruins of the Coliseum, but in vain; and, weary of roaming and restless endeavor, he turned his footsteps homeward.

As soon as possible after his return to his native land, he visited the old school-house, having determined to make one more effort before abandoning his pursuit. It was noon, and the master, a pleasant, dignified old gentleman, came forward to learn his business. He inquired concerning Timothy Jones, and was again told that no man of that name had ever lived in the neighborhood.

"Had you ever a pupil called Betsy Jones?" and Grant's face colored perceptibly, although he tried to look indifferent.

"Betsy Jones," said the master, readjusting his silver-rimmed spectacles, and looking steadily upon the ground; "no, I think not. I have been teaching here ten years, and can remember no such name." He paused, pondered a moment, and added, whilst his countenance brightened, "Oh! yes, yes, you are thinking of Bessie, Squire Jones' daughter. She came to school six or seven years ago, but she has been married twelve months or more. Yes, yes, Bessie Jones—Mrs. Lawton that is now. She was a good child, sir, and has grown up to be a noble woman."

Grant thanked him for his information, and turned into the public road with a heavy heart. He derived but one consolation from his visit, and that was, that if he had been unsuccessful, so had Jonathan Doolittle; and now, bereft of even the faint hope which had cheered him previous to learning of her marriage, he determined to lay aside his cherished dream and take up the realities of life.

Friends bantered him because he would not marry; ambitious mammas used their influence, and pretty daughters smiled encouragingly, but he resisted them all.

One evening, at a party to which he had strolled at a late hour, his hostess said to him, in a pleasant, bantering tone:—

"They tell me, Mr. Atherton, that you are invulnerable, but I do not believe it. The world says that you are naturally a woman-hater, or have been most wofully jilted. Now, honor bright! which is it?"

"Neither, dear madam, I assure you. Instead of being a 'woman-hater,' I love the sex so dearly that I cannot concentrate my affections. This confession clears me also from the accusation of having been jilted. So you see the world does me great injustice."

"I am glad to hear it," was the reply, "for I have a charming young friend to whom I wish to introduce you. I have already spoken of you to her, but I could not promise her the pleasure of your acquaintance, knowing as well as I do that you are almost a recluse. Come, will you be presented?"

"Certainly, madam; but wait a moment, if you please," he exclaimed, before offering his arm. "Tell me what kind of eyes the lady has; dark or light?"

"Dark."

"And her name?"

"Is Allen. She is a daughter of Senator Allen, of B——."

"And her Christian name?"

"Is Zoe. There she stands by the window. You can see her to an excellent advantage."

He looked, and for a moment he felt as if he were again in the Coliseum at Rome. The moonlight streamed through its broken terraces and lonely arches, and revealed the form of a young girl clothed in white and crimson the same as now, but the arrangement was different. To-night she wore a dress of snowy satin, crimson fuchsias in her brown hair, and blood-red corals upon her arms and neck.

She turned her face towards him, their eyes met, and that glance quickened his desire for an introduction. After a few general remarks, he said to her:—

"I believe we have met before, Miss Allen."

"If I have had that pleasure it is strange that I should have forgotten it," was her reply.

"You have visited Italy, I believe?"

"Yes."

"And wandered through the ruins of the Coliseum by moonlight?"

"Yes—once. I shall never forget that visit, nor the impressions produced by it."

"I was there also," he continued; "roving restlessly about when you entered accompanied by an elderly gentleman whom I supposed to be your father, and a guide. Fearing that you might think me one of the bandits who are sometimes said to infest those ruins, I stepped behind a decaying column and waited for you to pass. I remembered your face perfectly when I saw you here, and felt much pleased in the prospect of an acquaintance."

"I saw you upon the night you have referred to," said she, "for I passed very near you as I ascended a flight of steps. I imagined you a robber, and even divulged my suspicions to father, but he attributed them to a vivid fancy and a desire to connect something romantic with our moonlight excursion. We were not aware of Mr. Atherton's nearness, or we should have made Mrs. Graham's friendship a sufficient pretext for claiming her brother as an addition to our party."

During the winter Grant saw her frequently, and, after a short engagement, they were married. Betsy Jones was forgotten, and the light which beamed upon Grant from a pair of soft brown eyes so long before, was obscured by that which shone upon him from Zoe's matchless orbs.

A few weeks after the wedding they were on a visit to Harvard Graham and his wife. One morning, as they were all seated in the elegant boudoir, Harvard exclaimed, with a merry twinkle in his eye:—

"I suppose, Zoe, Grant has told you all of his affaires du cœur, has he not?"

"On the contrary, he denies ever having experienced but one," was the smiling reply.

"Ah! I'm afraid his memory is treacherous." Turning to Grant, he asked, mischievously: "Do you remember that horseback excursion we took some six or seven years ago?"

Grant replied in the affirmative, but appeared uneasy and disconcerted.

"Well, Zoe," pursued Harvard, "one day we rode up to the door of a country school-house and asked for water. It was given to us by a child of twelve or thirteen years, in whose countenance I saw nothing remarkable except a pair of fine dark eyes. After we started, Grant turned back and inquired her name, which proved to be Betsy Jones. He raved about her for hours, quoted Shakspeare voluminously, declared that he saw his destiny mirrored in her eyes as plainly as he ever saw stars at midnight, and ended by vowing that he would marry her and no one else. He wandered the world over, revisited the country school-house, could hear nothing of his 'destiny,' and, finally, having seen you, settled down into a satisfied, respectable Benedict. So, hereafter, when he raves about loving you and you alone, refer him to me, and I shall take the brotherly liberty of mentioning Betsey Jones."

"And is all this true, Grant?" Zoe turned her bright face to her husband and looked lovingly into his eyes.

"So Harvard says, and you know he is considered prime minister."

Zoe stole softly from the room, and returned in a few moments bearing a package carefully folded in paper. She placed it in Grant's hands, and said, in a low voice: "This was presented to me by an unknown friend. I have at last discovered his name."

He unwrapped it; it was a volume of Schiller's poems. He handed it to Harvard. "Who can say now that I have not found my destiny?" said he; and turning to his wife, he looked down, down into her eyes, and added, "It is the same light that beamed upon me years ago; the same, brighter, purer, and more exalted."

"I shall believe in your theory, hereafter," said Harvard, returning the volume to Grant; "but I can scarcely identify Zoe with the little girl who claimed to be Betsy Jones."

"That was the name of a schoolmate," Zoe explained, "and was the first which entered my mind as a reply to Grant's question. My mother was in feeble health at the time, and my father was travelling with her, hoping that change of scene would prove a benefit to her. I was left with an aunt, from whose house I attended the school at which you saw me. My aunt reproved me for the falsehood I told, but I excused myself upon the plea that strangers had no right to question me. I often felt that that casual meeting was in some way connected with my future; but in the past months I have been so happy that I have not recalled the incident. Of one thing, however, I am sure, and that is, that I shall never quarrel with Grant for having had his destiny revealed to him by the light of Betsy Jones' eyes."

SUMMER RAIN.

BY ITHIEL DACRE.

O'er copse and dingle, wood and hill,
With sudden thrill,
Low murmurs, and faint, broken sighs,
The wild wind dies;
And all is still.

The flowers bow as if in prayer—
In thankful prayer—
As gently through the cool, hushed air—
The listening air—
Comes the rain.

Sweet is the music of the rain—
Soft-falling rain—
That taps upon the trembling leaves—
The dripping leaves—
Its low refrain.

It woos to calm and gentle thoughts,
That oft remain
To soothe the weary, troubled heart,
And rest impart
To tired brain.

But, ah! how differently we hear
From year to year
The raindrops fall! More sad they seem,
As fades each dream
That we've held dear.

So many hopes are withered, dead!
And in their stead
Such deep griefs as we thought not of!
But God is love!
Life soon is fled.

BEAUTY without kindness dies unenjoyed and undelighting.—Johnson.

WORK DEPARTMENT.

BEAD MAT.

Materials.—Two bunches of white, and two of large green German beads, one of dark lilac, and one reel of No. 1 cotton.

THESE mats are now very much used, and have a very brilliant effect. They are also very durable, and will wash very well, though they will wear a long time before requiring it.

Thread 31 green beads on the white cotton, taking a long needleful, turn 2 beads, and pass the needle through the 3d, * thread a green bead, miss 1, and pass the needle through the next, repeat from * to the end of the row.

2d row. Turn, * thread 1 white bead, pass the needle through the next, repeat from * to the end of the row.

7th. Thread white beads till you come to the bead over the 1 green in 5th row, thread a lilac bead, and repeat.

8th. Thread white beads till you come to the green bead in 6th row, thread a green bead, pass the needle through the lilac bead, thread another green bead, repeat.

9th. work 2 rows of green beads, and add a fringe in the following manner : Thread 7 green beads, 1 white, 1 lilac, 1 white, 6 green, pass the needle through the 1st of the 7 the long way, pass the needle through the 1st green bead down the side of the mat, thread 7 white beads, 1 lilac, 1 green, 1 lilac, 6 white, pass the needle through the 1st of the 7 white, miss 1 green bead, pass the needle through the next, repeat the loops of green and white alternately all around, at the end, instead of missing a bead, pass the needle up one end and down the next between each loop of fringe. In joining the cotton a weaver's knot should be made, and always at the end of the row, as it is more likely to show when joined in the centre.

EMBROIDERY FOR BOTTOM OF PETTICOAT.

THIS trimming consists of a straight strip of longcloth, four inches broad, with narrow-stitched hems on both sides, leaving one and as well as some of its clothes. It is made of white straw; the bottom of it is decorated with embroidery in satin stitch on a scarlet ground. The bouquet is encircled with braiding. The pockets are lined with white cloth, and ornathree-quarters of an inch free in the middle. The under edge is finished with Cluny lace, about half an inch broad, put on plain. The strip is laid in plaits, one and a quarter inch broad, nearly two inches distant from each other. For the stitching (see design), the empty spaces are filled with an appliqué of white embroidery in the form of straps, and firmly stitched inside the scallop edge.

mented with a braiding pattern. The basket is lined with scarlet Thibet, and the pockets and edge are finished with a scarlet woollen ruche.

THE DAISY MAT FOR MOSS.

Materials.—One dozen light green, one dozen dark green; bone knitting pins.

1st row. Light green, cast on twenty stitches.

NURSERY BASKET.

Materials.—White straw basket, scarlet Thibet, white cloth, scarlet woollen band, soutache, fine gold braid, blue and green shaded silks, and blue buttons.

THIS basket is intended to hold the various small articles necessary for washing an infant, BONBON DOLL.

Materials.—Bonbons in gold and light green glazed paper; plain brown, and brown and white chocolate cakes, in two sizes; dark red sugar flowers and beads; two detonating bonbons; card-board; hat wire.

THE front of our model is of card-board, and measures seven inches in front; the back also of the same material measures eight inches in length; the width at the bottom is twenty inches; both sides are gradually sloped off and sewn up behind.

The head of a China doll, corresponding in size, is sewn on to the shoulders. The under edge of the dress is trimmed with a strip of gold paper two inches broad, and two rows of chocolates fastened with green silk stitches.

The upper part is ornamented with bonbons inclosed in papers of various colors and placed in reversed order.

For the arms place a piece of covered wire underneath the throat, and put a detonating bonbon on it, and bind it on firmly at the top and bottom with ribbon. An almond is placed at the end of the wire to imitate a hand. The necklace is of sugar beads, and the headdress of narrow ribbon and sugar flowers.

INSTRUCTIONS IN NETTING.

THE beauty of netting consists in its firmness and regularity. All joins in the thread must be made in a very strong knot; and, if possible, at an edge, so that it may not be perceived.

The implements used in netting are a netting needle and a mesh. In filling a netting needle with the material, be careful not to make it so full that there will be a difficulty in passing it through the stitches. The size of the needle must depend on the material to be employed, and the fineness of the work. Steel needles are employed for every kind of netting except the very coarsest. They are marked from 12 to 24, the latter being extremely fine. The fine meshes are usually also of steel; but, as this material is heavy, it is better to employ bone or wooden meshes when large ones are required. Many meshes are flat; and in using them the width is given.

The first stitch in this work is termed diamond netting, the holes being in the form of diamonds. To do the first row, a stout thread, knotted to form a round, is fastened to the knee with a pin, or passed over the foot, or on the hook sometimes attached to a work-cushion for the purpose. The end of the thread on the needle is knotted to this, the mesh being held in the left hand on a line with it. Take the needle in the right hand; let the thread come over the mesh and the third finger, bring it back under the mesh, and hold it between the thumb and first finger. Slip the needle through the mesh while the stitch is being completed. When the necessary number of stitches is made on this foundation, the future rows are to be worked backwards and forwards. To form a round, the first stitch is to be worked immediately after the last, which closes the netting into a circle.

ROUND NETTING is very nearly the same

DESIGNS IN ETCHING EMBROIDERY.

the loop over the third finger, under the mesh and the foundation thread. In doing this a loop will be formed, which must be passed over the fourth finger. Withdraw the third finger from the loop, and draw up the loop over the fourth, gradually, until it is quite tight on the mesh. The thumb should be kept firmly over stitch. The difference is merely in the way of putting the needle through the loop and foundation, or other stitch. After passing the needle through the loop, it must be brought out and put downwards through the stitch. This stitch is particularly suitable for purses.

SQUARE NETTING is exactly the same stitch as diamond netting, only it is begun at a corner, on one stitch, and increased (by doing two in one) in the last stitch of every row, until the greatest width required is attained. Then, by netting two stitches together at the end of every row, the piece is decreased to a point again. When stretched out, all the holes in this netting are squares, PINCUSHION AND JEWEL CASE COMBINED.

MAKE a square box of pasteboard; cover it with crimson satin, and plait a wide satin ribbon all around it, with a white Cluny lace coming half way down over it. Quilt the satin on wool in small diamonds to line the inside of box and lid. Stuff the outside of the box lid Square and diamond netting are the most frequently used, and are ornamented with patterns darned on them, in simple darning or in various point stitches. In the latter case it forms a variety of the sort of work termed guipure, now so fashionable.

GRECIAN NETTING.—Do one plain row. First pattern row. Insert the needle in the first stitch, and, without working it, draw through it the second stitch, through the loop of which draw the first, and work it in the ordinary way. This forms a twisted stitch, and the next is a very small loop formed of a part of the second stitch. Repeat this throughout the row. The second row is done plain.

The third like the first; but the first and last stitches are to be done in the usual manner, and you begin the twisting with the second and third loops.

The fourth is plain. Repeat these four rows as often as required.

Use No. 20 mesh for the fancy rows, and No. 14 for the plain.

Stitches in netting are always counted by knots.

for the pincushion, cover with satin, with lace over it, and finish the edge with a quilled satin ribbon. Fasten the ribbon at the side, to hold the lid up, and place a loop of ribbon on the front, to raise the lid by. The jewels are laid in the bottom of the box; the pins are stuck in cushion in top.

DUSTER BASKET WITH VARIEGATED EMBROIDERY.

Materials.—White and fawn-colored cloth; gold, dark red, blue, and blue-green silk cordon; gold cord; brown sarcenet ribbon, one inch broad; brown floss silk.

THE basket must be purchased. The ornaments consist of scallops of different form and size placed alternately.

red, and one blue-green petal. The flowers are joined with stalk and herring-bone stitch, and ornamented with gold cord. The oval joining scallops of fawn cloth are five and a quarter inches long and one and three-quarters of an inch broad. At the upper part they are ornamented with large buttonhole stitches in gold-colored silk to represent ears of barley; along the middle are three blue-green silk stitches held together by one cross stitch. The point of each scallop is ornamented with a tassel of brown sewing silk. The bows upon the cover, and the ruche which covers the joining on of the ornaments, must correspond with this.

A BABY'S BLANKET.

Materials.—One pound of 6-thread white fleecy and a pair of pins No. 2.

If more convenient to do a smaller piece of work, the blanket can be done in stripes, and joined afterwards, 45 stitches in each stripe, and joined either with sewing or single crochet.

BAG FOR FINE LINEN.

THIS bag is made of tatting and muslin. It can be made very ornamental, and hung in the room to hold the soiled fine articles which are not generally put in the ordinary wash. Fig. 2 represents one-quarter of the piece of tatting for the bottom, full working size. It, as well as the rest of the tatting of the bag, is lined with scarlet. Puffs of fine white chintz, spotted with scarlet, divided with bands of tatting, are sewed on to this bottom piece. Then another wide band of tatting around the bag at top of chintz. The bag has strings of scarlet wool, and a scarlet tassel at the bottom.

KNITTED EDGING.

CAST on 5 stitches, *, knit 5, pull the second last stitch on right hand needle over the last 4 times, pick up the loop at the end and knit it, pull the other over it, slip the stitch that remains on to the left hand needle, cast on 4 stitches, repeat from * 4 times more, then take up the long loop at the straight edge of each point, and knit it; this will make 6 on the needle; seam 2 together and seam 2, seam 2 together, turn, knit 4, take up the last stitch of the first point and knit it, turn and cast off, slipping the first stitch and seaming the others, *, cast on 1 stitch, pull the stitch to the left hand over it, repeat from * 6 times, cast on 4 stitches, and repeat from the first cross till you have made the length you wish. This is a very strong trimming for children's things.

Receipts, &c.

COOKERY FOR THE SICK AND CONVALESCENT.

THE best methods of preparing suitable nourishment for the sick is a matter of so much consequence, that its consideration here cannot be out of place. Its importance is, perhaps, scarce sufficiently appreciated by any class; and amongst the poor almost total ignorance prevails respecting it. Even when the needful materials are abundantly provided, still, things are prepared in such a barbarous and uninviting fashion, that the fastidious appetite of an invalid turns loathing from them; and this, simply from lack of knowledge, or of attention in preparing. Constantly is the medical man told—"I could eat, but I cannot fancy such food as we have here"—and this, when material is amply provided, but nicely wanting. The following receipts are a few of the most directly useful:—

Sick-room Articles of Diet—and here, it may just be hinted, that neatness in serving up, as well as care and perfect cleanliness in preparing, makes sick-room cookery more likely to be attractive to an easily-offended appetite.

Arrowroot.—Not quite a tablespoonful of arrowroot powder is to be mixed slowly and smoothly in a basin with a little cold water—and when done, a pint of boiling water added; it should then be sweetened to taste, and put on the fire to boil for five minutes, stirring well the whole time. If wine is permitted, it should be put to it after the arrowroot is poured into the basin. The same quantity of arrowroot is a proper one, when it is prepared with milk instead of water.

Oatmeal Gruel.—A dessertspoonful of meal must be mixed smoothly with two of cold water—a pint of boiling water poured on, and the whole boiled on the fire for ten minutes, well stirring for the time—sugar, or pepper and salt, being added, as may be agreeable to or proper for the sick person.

Sago requires thorough washing in cold water, to take away its earthy taste; after doing so (a tablespoonful will be a suitable quantity), put it in a pint of milk, and boil it slowly till it is quite soft and has thickened the milk—ten minutes, or a quarter of an hour is sufficient time—sweeten to taste, and add wine, or flavor with lemon-peel according to circumstances. Some invalids prefer tapioca to sago. It is prepared in the same quantity as the other, but does not require the previous washing, and takes only half the time for softening on the fire. In all preparations for the sick, let the constant stirring whilst on the fire be attended to, whether directed or not. A smatch of burn renders sick-cookery perfectly abominable.

Ground Rice Milk.—A tablespoonful of ground rice, a pint and a half of milk, and half an ounce of candied lemon-peel. Mix the rice very smoothly with the milk, then add the lemon-peel cut into very small pieces; boil for half an hour; and strain as soon as off the fire. This is an excellent nutritious beverage for the sick when strict abstinence is not required, and for early convalescence.

Simple Bread Panada.—Put a moderate quantity of grated or soft stale bread into enough boiling water to form a moderately thick pulp; cover it up, and leave it to soak for an hour—then beat it up with two or three tablespoonfuls of milk, and fine sugar to sweeten—boil the whole for ten minutes. This preparation is occasionally acceptable to the invalid, when milk dietary alone is rejected.

Carrageen Moss—One ounce of it, boiled in a pint and a half of water, is sufficient to form a semi-transparent, moderately consistent, nearly tasteless jelly, which, when sweetened and acidulated, or when mixed with milk, forms an excellent diet for invalids who require to have the strength supported. The gelatine, now so commonly used, is a very palatable preparation, combined with either water or milk, and may be taken dissolved in tea, coffee, or broth, without impairing the flavor of one or other.

Jelly from Gelatine.—To rather more than an ounce of gelatine add half a pint of cold water to soften it, then pour over a pint of boiling water, and stir till the gelatine is dissolved; pare very thinly the rind of one lemon, and add, with the juice of three or four—if acids are permitted—one pound of loaf-sugar, the whites and shells of three or four eggs, thoroughly well whisked together, and stirred into the whole; let it come to the boil upon the fire without more stirring—if wine is ordered with it, it should be added after coming off the fire; pour it through a thick flannel jelly-bag—what runs through at first will not be clear, and should be returned to the bag again; let it stand till cold, and you will have a clear sparkling jelly, which few invalids will refuse.

Gelatine with Milk.—An ounce of gelatine is to be soaked in half a pint of cold milk; when softened, a pint of boiling milk stirred well with it, till it is quite dissolved, it may be sweetened to taste, and put upon the fire to boil up altogether. It may be flavored with lemon-peel, or cinnamon, or brandy, as is most liked, or most suitable. It will be quite solid when cold.

White Wine Whey.—Boil a pint of milk; add to it one or two glasses of sherry wine, and sugar enough to sweeten; let it boil till the curd has separated, then strain through muslin. If the wine does not possess sufficient acid to turn the milk, a little rennet, or a teaspoonful of lemon-juice, or three or four grains of tartaric acid may be added.

Barley Water.—Barley, when prepared as pearl-barley, is one of the most useful additions to sick cookery; its decoction, "barley-water," being a pleasant and extremely beneficial demulcent in all affections of the mucous membranes, and forming a grateful and nutritious beverage in fever; it ought, however, to be made considerably thicker in the former case than in the latter. To make plain barley-water, two and a half ounces of pearl-barley are to be well washed in cold water, half a pint of boiling water is then to be poured upon the grain, the whole boiled for a few minutes, and the water strained off; a couple of quarts of boiling water must then be poured on, the quantity boiled down one-half and strained. This process does not quite exhaust the barley, and another portion of water may be boiled upon it, by those to whom the saving is an object. A little lemon or orange-peel is a pleasant addition to the beverage. A compound and very pleasant drink is made, by adding to a quart of simple barley-water, figs, sliced, and raisins, stoned, of each two and a half ounces, liquorice-root sliced five drachms, and a pint of water, the whole to be boiled down to a quart and strained. This compound decoction is not so well adapted for a fever drink as the simpler form. Equal parts of barley-water and milk, sweetened with a little refined sugar, is a good food for infants brought up by the hand. It may act upon the bowels.

Lemonade.—The juice of two lemons, the rind of one, added to a quart of boiling water, sweetened moderately, and kept in a covered jar or jug, is a useful drink for those suffering from cold or slight fever.

Toast Water.—This simple beverage is seldom well prepared. Let the water with which it is made have been boiled and become cold. Toast thoroughly of a fine deep brown, but not black, half a slice of stale quartern loaf; put it into a jug, and pour a quart of the water over it; let it stand two hours, and decant the water from the bread. A small piece of either orange or lemon-peel added with the bread is an improvement to toast-water.

Linseed Tea.—One ounce of linseed, not bruised, two drachms of liquorice-root, bruised; pour over one pint of boiling water; place the jug—covered jugs with perforated spouts should always be used for drinks for sick people—near the fire for three or four hours, then strain off. When linseed-tea is ordered to be continued, it should be made fresh every day.

Milk and Soda-Water.—Heat, nearly to boiling, a teacupful of milk; dissolve in it a teaspoonful of fine sugar, put it into a large tumbler, and pour over it two-thirds of a bottle of soda-water. This is an excellent mode of taking milk when the stomach is charged with acid, and consequently feels oppressed by milk alone.

Rice and Gravy.—Let the rich gravy from a leg of roasted mutton, or sirloin of beef, stand till the fat forms a cake on the surface, remove it, and heat the gravy with as much well-boiled rice as will make it thick. A teacupful of this is very strengthening in the early convalescence of delicate children.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

Mutton Duck.—Take any cold mutton you may have, and lay in slices on the bottom of a pie-dish. Make a duck seasoning, and lay alternate layers of meat and seasoning; fill up with water, and stew in the oven.

Mushroom Soup.—Take a good quantity of mushrooms, cut off the earthy end, and pick and wash them. Stew them with some butter, pepper, and salt in a little good stock till tender; take them out, and chop them up quite small; prepare a good stock as for any other soup, and add to it the mushrooms and the liquor they have been stewed in. Boil all together, and serve. If white soup be desired, use the white button mushrooms, and a good veal stock, adding a spoonful of cream or a little milk, as the color may require.

Tripe Stewed.—Cut tripe into stripes, put them in rich gravy, with a lump of butter the size of a hen's egg, rolled in flour; shake until the butter is melted. Add a tablespoonful of white wine, some chopped parsley, pepper, salt, pickled mushrooms, a squeeze of lemon. Shake well together and stir until tender.

Oxford Sausages.—Chop a pound and a half of pork, a pound and a half of veal, free from skin, etc., three-quarters of a pound of beef suet; mince and mix well; stir some crumbs of bread in water, mix with the meat. Add sage, salt, pepper, and allspice to taste. Roll into balls, flatten, and fry of a light brown.

Kidney Pies.—Cut into small thin slices some veal kidneys, from which the skin and fat have been removed. Melt some good butter, season it with salt, pepper, and nutmeg. Stir in the sliced kidneys; and when they are still saturated, distribute them in small pattypans lined with puff-paste. Cover these with the same paste, cutting a hole in the middle, and having previously moistened the inner edges to make them unite; let them bake quickly in a moderate oven, after which fill them up with rich gravy, and serve. This preparation requires but little time; it ought not to be made until a few minutes before serving.

Veal à la Menagere.—Melt a good lump of butter in the pan, add two tablespoonfuls of flour, and let it brown gradually while stirring. Next put in a piece of veal and turn it until well moistened. Then pour in some hot water, and stir until it boils. Season now with pot-herbs, salt, and pepper. Let it cook gently, and at the end of an hour add the vegetables—onions, carrots, mushrooms, etc.—with which the dish is to be garnished. These vegetables being cooked, serve the piece of veal imbedded in them, and with the sauce poured over. If it is desirable to have the sauce thick and light-colored, mix it with some yolks of eggs. In this case sprinkle in a little vinegar.

Mushroom Sauce.—Peel button mushrooms, and put them into water and lemon-juice to keep them white. Strain them, and put them into a stewpan with a quarter of a pound of butter, a teaspoonful of salt and pepper mixed, and the juice of half a lemon. Stew half an hour; then add a teaspoonful of flour, with half a pint of cream, or white or brown sauce, and boil five minutes. If pickled mushrooms be used, omit the lemon-juice and wine.

Crum Pie.—Mince any cold meat very finely, season it to taste, and put it into a pie-dish; have some finely-grated bread-crumbs, with a little salt, pepper, and nutmeg, and pour into the dish any nice gravy that may be at hand; then cover it over with a thick layer of the bread-crumbs, and put small pieces of butter over the top. Place it in the oven till quite hot.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

Delicate Cup Cake.—One cup of butter, three of loaf-sugar pulverized, the whites of ten eggs, five cups of flour, in which two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar have been mixed and sifted. The flour must always be sifted before measuring, and then again after the tartar is in, and lastly a cup of sweet cream with a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in it and strained. This can be varied by mixing through it a few currants.

Rose Charlotte Russe.—Take one ounce of isinglass or gelatine, and soften it by soaking awhile in cold water. Then boil it slowly in a pint of cream, sweetened with a quarter of a pound of fine loaf-sugar (adding a handful of fresh rose-leaves, if convenient, tied in a thin muslin bag), till it is thoroughly dissolved and well mixed. Take it off the fire, set it to cool, and beat together until very light and thick four whole eggs and the yolks only of four others. Stir the beaten eggs gradually into the mixture of cream, sugar, and isinglass, and set it again over the fire. Stir it well, and see that it only simmers, taking it off before it comes quite to a boil. Then, while it is warm, stir in sufficient extract of roses to give it a high rose flavor and fragrant smell. Have ready two moulds lined with lady cake or almond sponge cake. Fill them with the mixture, and set them on ice. Before they go to the table, ice the tops of the charlotte, flavoring the icing with rose.

Syllabub Pudding.—Well beat four eggs; add to them six ounces of pounded and sifted loaf-sugar, a glass of brandy, a glass of white wine, and sufficient flour to make it a very stiff batter. Have a quart of milk warm from the cow poured upon it while you continue beating; and, when it is well frothed, put it into a buttered dish, place it in a quick oven, and bake it for a quarter of an hour. Serve immediately.

Rich Soda Cake.—One pound of pulverized loaf-sugar mixed with three-fourths of a pound of sweet butter, the beaten whites of fourteen eggs, and two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, sifted with a pound of flour, and lastly a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in half a teacupful of sweet milk, and strained. Bake immediately.

College Puddings.—Three-quarters of a pound of stale bread, grated; the same quantity of beef suet, chopped very fine; one pound of currants, half a nutmeg, a few cloves, a glass of brandy, two or three eggs, two spoonfuls of cream or milk; mix these well together, and make into a paste in the shape of eggs. Fry them gently over a clear fire in half a pound of butter; let them be of a nice brown color all over. You may add blanched almonds and sweetmeats. Serve them up with wine sauce.

Fruit Cup Cake.—One cup of sweet butter and three of nice sugar worked to a cream, five well-beaten eggs, the yolks and afterwards the whites, a glass of brandy or wine, half a nutmeg, half a dozen cloves, and a teaspoonful of ground cinnamon. Pulverize a teaspoonful of soda, and mix it in five cups of sifted flour, and stir the flour in the cake. Flour one pound of washed currants, and mix them in, and afterward one pound of seeded raisins cut once and rubbed in flour; stir it well, and just before baking add a cup of sour cream. Do not beat it much after the cream is in, but thoroughly mix, and bake immediately. It will take one hour to bake. Frost while a little warm. It will keep fresh some time. Do not cut it the day it is baked. This is an old but excellent receipt.

Wafer Pudding.—One tablespoonful of flour, two ounces of butter, two eggs, a quarter of a pint of milk, one lemon. Beat the butter to a cream, sift the flour in gradually, pare and finely mince the rind only of the lemon, add the eggs, yolks, and whites, well-beaten, to the milk, and mix all thoroughly. Bake in well-buttered saucers for twenty minutes, serve with sifted sugar. Care must be taken that the oven is not too fierce.

Apple Fritters.—Pare and core some fine large pippins, and cut them into round slices. Soak them in wine, sugar, and nutmeg for two or three hours. Make a batter of four eggs and a tablespoonful of milk; thicken with enough flour, stirred in by degrees, to make a batter; mix it two or three hours before it is wanted, that it may be light. Heat some butter in a frying-pan; dip each slice of apple separately in the batter, and fry them brown; sift pounded sugar, and grate nutmeg over them.

CONTRIBUTED.

MR. GODEY: I send you a few receipts which I know to be good:—

Green Tomato Pickles.—Take the large smooth apple tomato, cut in two or three slices, and about one good-sized onion to four tomatoes, also sliced. Put in layers in a jar, with a slight sprinkling of salt between each layer; let them stand over night. In the morning remove from the brine, rinse in cold water, drain thoroughly; then pour over, to cover them, enough vinegar, which has previously boiled half an hour with cloves and whole pepper. Pieces of horseradish root will prevent scum rising on any pickles. Pour the vinegar on while hot.

To Knit the Heels of Stockings Double.—After setting the heel, widen a few stitches, according to the fineness of the yarn, commence at one side, knit the first, then slip off the next without knitting, knit the next, slip the next, and so on across. In knitting back, slip those stitches that were previously knit, and knit those that were slipped. This makes a double heel like the old-fashioned striped mittens.

To Cement Glass or China.—Take white lead, the thick portion which adheres around the sides of a paint keg, spread smoothly on the edges, unite the pieces, and tie together to keep in place. Lay away in a dry place, and do not use for two or three weeks.

Mrs. C. M. H.

Strawberry Short Cake.—One teacupful of sour milk (not buttermilk), a piece of butter the size of a walnut, one-third of a teaspoonful of soda, quarter of a teaspoonful of salt. Mix very lightly, and bake in a quick oven. While baking, take a pint and a half of strawberries, mashed fine with the hand; when the cake is cooked enough, cut in two, taking off about one-third, leaving two-thirds at the bottom; spread each part thickly with batter, then put on the large portion a layer of sugar, then the berries, then sugar, and lastly turn the other part over. Serve immediately.

L. J. L., Douglass, Ill.

I WILL send you some receipts which I can recommend, if you choose to publish them. Wishing you continued success as ever:—

Delicate Tea Cake.—The whites of three eggs beaten to a froth, one cup of pulverized white sugar, half a cup of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, half a teaspoonful of soda, two cups and a half of flour, a teaspoonful of almonds, half a cup of melted butter.

Family Pudding.—One quart of sweet milk, one pint of bread-crumbs soaked in the milk, three eggs well beaten, one teacupful of sugar, little mace, six good tart apples, pared, cores dug out, and stand them in the pudding, and steam until the apples are well done. An hour will suffice.

Sauce for Family Pudding.—One cup of brown sugar, with a tablespoonful of wine or spirits, boiled like a syrup with half a cup of butter added, and the white of one egg beaten stiff stirred in after the sauce cools. It is very nice and simple.

White Mountain Cake.—Four eggs well beaten with two cups and a half of white sugar, one heaping cup of butter, one cup of sour milk, one teaspoonful of soda, five cups of flour, one teaspoonful of vanilla, one of lemon, a heaping cup of raisins (whole without stoning), half a cup of candied orange-peel and citron sliced, half a cup of almond meats sliced. It is a delicious cake, and this amount will make two common size ones.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dirty Knives should be wiped before cleaning, and the handles should never be put in hot water, it loosens them and causes the ivory to become yellow.

Fish Napkins that have been used should be put to soak in water all night, and washed out the next morning. If allowed to dry with the grease in, they become discolored, and no ordinary bleaching will restore them.

A Good Way of Cleaning Oil-Cloth is to sponge it well with skim milk, as it brightens and preserves the color.

Bandolines.—The simplest is soap and water, or water alone. But these are not always efficient. Here is a venerable and familiar one: Take bruised quince seeds, a tablespoonful; clear rain water, a pint. Boil gently to three-quarters of a pint, then strain through muslin, and add alcohol or brandy, Cologne water, of each two tablespoonfuls.

Never let fresh bread-crumbs be made for fish or cutlets. Direct the cook to save the pieces of bread that are not eaten from the dinner-table and other crusts, and to put them in the oven till they are crisp and a pale brown, then pound and sift them. Keep in a large tin ready for use.

THE CHILDLESS AND FATHERLESS.

WHILE we have much to teach, it may be that we have something to learn in those ancient regions which were the primitive homes of our race. Our missionaries, who carry the light of Christian education into the households of the far East, find among the domestic usages of the people some which deserve consideration for their good results. Among these is the custom of adoption. Childless parents are not merely allowed, but are in some countries required by their religious sentiments to adopt children, who become in all respects as closely bound to them, in ties of duty and of affection, as if they had been the offspring of the adopters. It is well known that some of the greatest difficulties of the English rulers in India have arisen from their disregard of this usage, and their refusal to acknowledge the right of succession claimed for the adopted children of native princes. This custom of adoption is almost universal throughout the East, so that a childless family is hardly known.

The Romans had the same custom, and it has descended, with their laws, to some of the nations of Europe, though under many restrictions. By the French law, the person adopted must have been, during at least six years previously, under the constant care of the adopter, who must be childless. The adoption must be by a formal contract, approved by a legal tribunal. The adopted takes the name of the adopter, and succeeds to his property if he dies without a will.

The English law and our own codes, which are derived from it, know nothing of this relation. Yet it may well be admitted that this is a serious deficiency, and that it would be far better, in many cases, to follow the kindly Eastern method of adoption, instead of our cold mercantile system of apprenticeship. Much good has been done, we know, by benevolent societies and individuals, who have rescued orphan and deserted children from poverty and misery, and have found comfortable homes for them in Christian households. But a mere apprenticeship, or any other contract, is a poor substitute for that powerful bond of affection which springs up when the natural feelings of parent and child are called forth. The apprentice or bound servant, however kindly treated, remains a mere social walf, without kindred or home. The adopted child enters the family circle; and the holy and tender sentiments, which the ties of fatherhood, motherhood, and childhood awaken, envelop all within the circle, and make them all happier and better.

In those instances which have fallen under our observation where, so far as our law will allow, children have been adopted, the best results have followed. We have one instance in mind of a respectable married couple, who, after the loss of an only son, adopted two young orphan children, a boy and a girl, in no way related to them. They were not rich, but were able to give the children a good education, with the same tender care and thoughtful training which they would have given to their own lost child. In their declining years a reverse of fortune fell upon the adoptive parents, and they found a loving welcome and willing support from their children; one of whom was then an eminent clergyman, and the other a happy matron in a pleasant home replete with every comfort.

It would seem that while there are, and ever will be, so many childless homes, which would be made cheerful by the presence of children, and so many orphaned little ones, to whom these homes would bring present safety and future welfare, some method could be devised by which the system of adoption might be made far more general than it is, and invested with a legal sanction—not so restricted as that of France—but giving free play to natural affections and Christian benevolence, while surrounding the child with all the just safeguards which the law can devise. Our legislators and philanthropists will find this a subject well worthy of their attention. But to those childless parents, who have the means of rescuing orphan children from suffering and neglect, we would say: Do not wait for any amendment of the law, which may be long in coming; let your love and pity be a law to themselves, and trust the consequences to that Providence which makes all well-doing, in some way or other, bring its own sure reward.

WE have long desired to see a book of this sort. Women, as a sex, have undoubtedly a history; and the direction of public opinion to-day upon the questions of their fitness for the suffrage, and their position before the law, give a particular importance to any work which will enable us to judge of the future by the past. The book now lying on our table is not itself a philosophical history, but it is an important and valuable contribution towards that history—Mémoires pour servir, as Frenchmen would call it—and some future Hallam or Guizot will acknowledge his obligations to the research and patience which have collected into one dainty volume the facts that lay scattered here and there through seventeen centuries.

The women of the Greeks and Romans are passed over by the author in a single chapter; and the period that follows, from the fifth to the tenth century of the Christian Era, is so scantily illustrated by records even of the doings of men, that it is only by chance, as it were, that a woman's name is ever mentioned. Towards the beginning of the feudal system, we hear more of the sex; and the extract which we have chosen, and which is itself mainly a quotation from M. Guizot, describes the gradual transition from their situation under the Roman Empire to their position as inmates of the feudal castle. To the state of women in the Middle Ages the great bulk of the volume is devoted; and the work practically ends with the reign of Queen Elizabeth in England and Henry IV. in France. Our space is confined, and we hasten to our quotation; but we must say a word for the beauty and artistic perfection of the illustrations. No letter press could give such a lively impression of the dress and appearance of our ancestors as their pictures "in their fashion as they lived." The book is a storehouse of materials from which we may draw again, especially as it is an English publication, and may not be reprinted in this country.

The Transition to the Feudal Period.—Domestic Life in the Castle.—The Feudal Tenure brought with it new institutions and new forms of life. The new lords of the land formed alliances among themselves, or made war upon each other, at their own will, and their whole aim was to keep themselves in a permanent state of defence. The old residences were now abandoned, and their places supplied by almost impregnable fortresses. The castle, indeed, is become in a manner the symbol or image of feudalism. In this fortress, placed at a distance from all social life without, the lord and his lady lived in a complete state of isolation. The coarseness and ferocity which arose out of this life threw a new impediment in the way of social and intellectual improvement, and these early ages of feudalism were indeed ages of darkness.

Yet as one of the ablest of our modern historians has observed, "at the same time that castles opposed so strong a barrier to civilization, while it had so much difficulty in penetrating into them, they were in a certain respect a principle of civilization; they protected the development of sentiments and manners which have acted a powerful and salutary part in modern society. Everybody knows that domestic life, the spirit of family, and particularly the condition of woman, are developed in modern Europe much more completely and with more happiness than anywhere else. Among the causes which have contributed to this development, we must reckon life in the castle, the situation of the possessor of the fief in his domains, as one of the principal. Never, in any other form of society, has a family, reduced to its simplest expression, husband, wife, and children, been found so closely drawn together, pressed one against the other, separated from all other powerful and rival relations. In the different states of society of previous periods, the head of the family had, without absenting himself, a multitude of occupations and diversions which drew him from the interior of his dwelling, and, at least, hindered it from being the centre of his life. The contrary happened in feudal society. As often as he remained in his castle, the feudal possessor lived there with his wife and children, almost his only equals, his only intimate and permanent companions. Without doubt, he often left it, and led abroad a brutal and adventurous life; but he was obliged to return to his home, where he shut himself up in seasons of danger.

"Now, whenever man is placed in a certain position, the part of his moral nature which corresponds to that position is favorably developed in him. Is he obliged to live habitually in the bosom of his family with his wife and children, the ideas and sentiments in harmony with this fact cannot fail to obtain a great empire over him. So it happened in feudal society. When, moreover, the feudal possessor left his castle to go in search of war and adventures, his wife remained there, and in a situation very different from that which women almost always held in previous times. She remained there as mistress, a lady of the castle, as representative of her husband, charged in her absence with the defence and honor of the fief. This situation of rank, and almost of sovereignty, in the very bosom of domestic life, often gave to women of the feudal epoch a dignity, courage, virtue, and a splendor which they had not displayed under other circumstances, and contributed powerfully, no doubt, to their moral development and to the general progress of their condition.

"This is not all. The importance of the children, of the eldest son among the others, was greater in a feudal household than anywhere else. There was displayed not only natural affection, and the desire of transmitting his goods to his children, but also the desire of transmitting to them that power, that superior situation, that sovereignty inherent in the domain. The eldest son of the lord was, in the eyes of his father and of all his followers, a prince, a presumptive heir, the depository of the glory of a dynasty. Thus the weaknesses as well as the good sentiments, domestic pride as well as affection, joined in giving to the spirit of family much energy and power. Add to this the empire of Christian ideas, to which I here only point passingly, and you will easily understand how this castle life, this solitary, sombre, and hard position, was nevertheless favorable to the development of domestic life, and to that elevation of the condition of woman which holds so great a place in the history of our civilization. This great and salutary revolution took place between the ninth and twelfth centuries. We cannot follow it step by step; we can only trace very imperfectly the particular facts which assisted its progress for the want of documents. But that in the eleventh century it was about completed, that the condition of woman had changed, that the spirit of family, domestic life, and the ideas and sentiments that belonged to it, had acquired a development and empire previously unknown, is a general fact which it is impossible to overlook."

THE NEW SILK-WORMS.

OUR readers will be interested in what is said of the two new varieties of silkworms which feed on the leaves of the oak and the allanthurus; for if all that is affirmed of them proves well founded, they will bring a new source of employment for women, and will also make the most elegant and durable materials for dresses abundant and cheap beyond all previous likelihood. It appears that a few years ago the eggs of the oak-feeder were procured by the French government from Japan with much difficulty, as the Japanese laws at that time forbade their exportation under the penalty of death. The habits of the insect were not well understood, and the first attempts at rearing it partially failed. But it is said now to be acclimatized not only in France, but even in England. It is hardy, and thrives better out of doors than when confined in rooms. The worm which feeds on allanthurus leaves is of similar habits. The silk produced by it is of excellent quality. A French writer says: "The silk from the allanthurus lasts double the time of that made by the mulberry worm, does not spot so easily, and washes like linen. The strength of the silk is said to be very surprising; and the durability of the Indian Foulards, which are composed entirely of allanthurus silk, is attributed to this fact."

Mr. J. Q. A. Warren, who has just returned from Europe, bringing the eggs and cocoons of these insects, mentioned these and other interesting facts in his report to the Farmers' club of the American Institute, which appears in the New York Tribune. He added:—

"The allanthurus tree is easy of cultivation, and can be raised to any extent in America, and the advent of this new insect, the bombyx cynthia, will make an important era in sericulture in America. It is easily multiplied and acclimated, and its cultivation must become successful. While in England last August, I visited the farm of Dr. Wallace, and saw some 18,000 worms feeding in the open air on the allanthurus glandulosa. The same month I had the pleasure of paying a visit to the beautiful country seat of Lady Dorothy Nevill, Dangstein, Petersfield, about fifty miles from London. Her ladyship had planted a large number of allanthurus trees in a portion of her beautiful garden, and covered them with a strong inclosure of network to keep off the birds. There were hundreds of young allanthurus trees growing, and thousands of worms feeding in the highest state of perfection—a beautiful sight indeed, on entering the inclosure, to see those magnificent silk-worms, from one to three inches long, of an intense emerald green color, with the tubercles tipped with a gorgeous marine blue. They seemed to care naught for wind or rain; their feet having great adhesive power, they cling to the leaves with a peculiar strength—their bodies, being covered with a fine down, seem to turn the rain like the leaf of a cabbage. Some were eating; some dormant; others commencing to spin like weavers, and many had made their cocoons and were stowed away in the leaves. Lady Nevill says they are cultivated at little expense, and the allanthurus glandulosa easy to raise. A ready market is found for all that can be cultivated; while the English cocoons are said to be finer than the French. To America what a boon is offered in the introduction of these new species, and the utilization of oak leaves; a material which has never been of the least value, has now suddenly become valuable, nay, precious. If such a statement had been offered one decade ago, it would have been looked upon with derision, but now, by the medium of an insect, our oak trees and hedges, and the once neglected ailanthus are, by a modern change, converted into a precious silken fabric."

If the insects will thrive in Western Europe, they should certainly do well in this country, where the climate is so nearly like that of China and Japan. Mr. Warren's efforts deserve every praise; if they should be successful, an agreeable and useful industry will be opened here, especially to our countrywomen, which their quickness and ingenuity, we may hope, will carry far beyond the point it has reached in the countries of its origin. Who knows but that the poorest among us may in a few years "walk in silk attire," and oak velvets and ailanthus satins be as common as merinos and muslins!

BOOKS FOR HOME READING.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS.—The appearance of a new volume by our great modern poet is always hailed with delight by the thousands who have felt the charm of his genius; and the subject of his book is well calculated to raise their expectation to the highest. Mr. Tennyson's blank verse is simply exquisite. Rhyme is sometimes a hampering restraint to him; but rhythm and metre seem his natural element. The lines of Elaine and Guinevere flow on with a softness and beauty that predispose the reader to receive and comprehend the poem. The mind is won through the ear. In this new volume the same mastery over words compels our attention. It consists of four Arthurian legends—"The Coming of Arthur," "The Holy Grail," "Pelles and Ettarre," and "The Passing of Arthur." A portion of the last named has long been familiar to us as "Morte d'Arthur," and contains some of the poet's most vivid and beautiful lines. The other long poems are "Lucretius," a striking and powerful monologue, and "The Golden Supper," founded upon a story in Boccaccio, and the rest of the book is made up of short pieces. We have no space for detailed criticism. We can only say that as a whole the new poetry is not quite up to the mark of Mr. Tennyson's best writing; but that parts of it are very fine, and that the hand which wrote the Princess and the Idyls of the King has lost nothing of its cunning. We will give a few lines from the first poem, describing how Arthur was sent to save Britain:—

"Bleys, our Merlin's master, as they say,
Died but of late, and sent his cry to me
To hear him speak before he left his life.
Shrunk like a fairy changeling lay the mage,
And when I entered told me that himself
And Merlin ever served before the king,
Uther, before he died, and on the night
When Uther in Tintagil passed away,
Moaning and wailing for an heir, the two
Left the still king, and passing forth to breathe,
Then from the castle gateway by the chasm
Descending through the dismal night—a night
In which the bounds of heaven and earth were lost—
Beheld—so high upon the dreary deeps
It seemed in heaven—a ship, the shape thereof
A dragon winged, and all from stem to stern
Bright with a shining people on the decks,
And gone as soon as seen; and then the two Dropt to the cove and watched the great sea fall
Wave after wave, each mightier than the last;
Till, last, a ninth one, gathering all the deep
And full of voices, slowly rose and plunged Roaring, and all the wave was in a flame.
And down the wave and in the flame was borne
A naked babe, and rode to Merlin's feet,
Who stooped and caught the babe, and cried, 'The King!
Here is an heir for Uther!' and the fringe
Of that great breaker, sweeping up the strand,
Lashed at the wizard as he spake the word,
And all at once all round him rose in fire,
So that the child and he were clothed in fire,

And presently thereafter followed calm,
Free sky and stars. 'And this same child,' said he,
'Is he who reigns.'"

THE BISHOP POTTER MEMORIAL HOUSE.

ONE of the most important movements in the Protestant Church for many years is that which has opened the Bishop Potter Memorial House. The idea of employing the services of "ministering women" in the cause of the church is almost new to England and the United States, but, wherever it has been put into execution, the results have been such as to encourage the belief that a new agency is open for the good work. The Memorial House was opened in Philadelphia, in June, 1867, under the auspices of Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania. Its object may best be described in his own words:—

"The women taught at the Memorial House are there instructed first to do all those several works of mercy and Christianity which the word of God requires, and, having become proficient themselves in the art of attending the sick, visiting the poor, gathering in the outcasts, superintending mothers' meetings, organizing sewing-classes, leading the churchless to the House of God, counselling the fallen, sympathizing with the mourning, praying with the penitent, and guiding the inquiring soul to Jesus, they are sent out into parishes to become instructors of others, to organize the agencies of that parish, to stay up the hands of its rector, to seek out those needing spiritual counsel, and to bring them to the Church, that its nursing care may shelter them under its wings of love. There also they learn the nature and best mode of working the several plans of Christian benevolence—at themselves to be at the head of such institutions, and are able, as intelligent and specially trained persons, to fit in and adjust such societies or institutions into the working machinery of the parish."

This institution sprung from suggestions made in 1862 by Bishop Potter to the convention in his diocese. The committee to which his address was submitted reported in favor of the establishing an institution which should give direction and scope to the systematic devotion of women to works of piety and charity among the needy; "an institution, primary in position, whose object shall be not only the association and training of women for lives of mercy and labors of love, but also to gather around it all the auxiliaries to Christian usefulness in Homes for the Aged, Asylums for Reform, Infirmarys, Orphan Houses, Christian Nurseries, and the like, to be served by its ministry to the glory of God and the highest good of His creatures." Bishop Potter said of the plan, in 1864:—

"In more than one parish, and especially in one with which you are connected, I have seen godless men and reckless youth, who had withstood all others, yielding to the silent and persevering efforts of ladies, and demonstrating how much can be done among the most forlorn of our people through their agency. It is teaching us more and more the necessity of individualizing our appeals, of making them with all kindness and constancy, and of coupling them with fervent and believing prayer.

"Properly trained, this agency of woman would be most benign in all our public institutions—in our prisons, almshouses, reformatories, and asylums for the sick and afflicted of every name. God bless the noble women who have given themselves to the work! The Lord make his face to shine upon efforts to extend and systematize it; and the Good Spirit rouse our sex—too slow to engage in such works—to emulate the example."

From Bishop Stevens' address we quote:—

"For, let me ask, what is this Memorial House? It is for the training of Christian women in all kinds of Christian work. It is a calling out and developing in the Church agencies which Protestant denominations have long kept dormant. It is giving vent and organic force to influences which only need to be wisely guided to secure blessed results. It is seeking to put women in the place where our Lord put them when on earth, when he graciously accepted their ministries; where the Apostles put them, when Lydia, and Phoebe, and Priscilla, and Tabitha, and that noble roll of Christian women, recorded by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, labored, under deacons and elders, in the primitive Church."

Of the plan of the institution, Mr. Welsh, the chairman of the committee, to whom its early establishment is mainly due, said:—

"Mrs. Jackson, of Milwaukee, the widow of the Rev. William Jackson, of Louisville, Kentucky, is to be the Lady Principal of the institution, subject to the direction and control of the bishop; and under her charge will be placed as many suitably qualified volunteers as can be procured, accommodated, and supported, without expense to the hospital. These will be trained in teaching and in charitable work, under direction of the principal and such helpers as she may call to her assistance. At the expiration of six months, they can leave the institution, or re-enter to prepare, according to their aptitude or taste, for some special service in the foreign or domestic fields, or for nursing in the hospital or elsewhere."

From these few details our readers will understand how important is the work of the Memorial House. The results have surpassed expectation. We hope that many will be induced to send to Mr. William Welsh for the History of the Institution, published in Philadelphia in 1868, which will give a mass of interesting details. Why should not this House be endowed by the wealthy, and filled with the devoted daughters of the Church?

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

BY DR. CHARLES P. UNKE.

INFANTS' FOOD.

In infantile life an ample amount of nourishing food is of paramount importance. Indeed, the growing child needs more in proportion than the adult; for not merely is the daily waste to be repaired, and that constant reproduction of the tissues to be provided for which is essential to the maintenance of vitality in all parts of the body, but each day is to bring with it an increase in size and stature. The nerves, the bones, the muscles, and all the great machinery of the interior of the body are to be built up and strengthened to meet the increasing demands of nature. The organs of digestion, however, as well as those having other offices to perform, are at this period of life frail and delicate, and poorly able to accomplish any great amount of labor. In fact, their development is incomplete; for we find the jaws edentulous, the salivary glands inactive, and portions of the alimentary canal imperfect in its anatomical construction. Nature intended the infant to subsist for the first few months of life upon food which requires but few changes to be made in it. And while she thus points to an article of food that shall yield the necessary sustenance, and shall be so easily assimilated as not to overburden the delicate organs of the young, the question naturally suggests itself, where shall that food be found? We should search in vain through the animal and vegetable kingdoms for any substance that would completely fulfil these conditions; but nature herself supplies the want, and prepares within the mother's own mysterious organism the very sine qua non for the natural, healthy, and complete nutrition of the child.

Milk—the best, and only proper aliment for the young—contains, ready combined, all those elements which are necessary for its growth and for the maintenance of its vitality. How small must be the effort needed to effect the assimilation of this food. "The chief of its solid constituents, the casein, differs little, if at all, from the albumen of the blood, while in combination with it is a considerable quantity of the phosphate of lime—a salt that enters largely into the composition of the bones. Among its other components we find butter and sugar—the former of which probably in part contributes to the formation of the fat that is so abundantly deposited in the healthy infant, while the remainder of it supplies materials for the generation of heat, by being resolved, together with the saccharine matter, into its ultimate elements of carbonic acid and water." This food, too, is not merely suitable for the infant soon after birth, but it continues to be the aliment most proper for it for many months; the casein increasing in quantity as the infant grows older and the demand for materials to maintain its growth increases.

The infant, whose mother refuses to perform towards it the mother's part, or who, by accident, disease, or death, is deprived of the food that nature destined for it, too often languishes and dies. Such children you may often see with no fat to give plumpness to their limbs, no red particles in their blood to impart a healthy hue to their skin; their face wearing in infancy the lineaments of age; their voice a constant wail—their whole aspect an embodiment of woe. But give to such children the food that nature destined for them, and if the remedy do not come all too late to save them, the mournful cry will cease—the face will assume a look of content—by degrees the features of infancy will disclose themselves; the limbs will grow round, the skin pure red and white, and when at length we hear the merry laugh of babyhood, it seems almost as if the little sufferer of some weeks before must have been a changeling, and this the real child brought back from fairyland.

Bringing up children by hand is a serious matter. Much care, much patience, and much judicious management are necessary to counteract the inevitable evils that result from it. And, although it is in every respect desirable that for the first six months at least of their existence, children should derive their support entirely from their mother; there are many circumstances which render it impracticable, and the question we often have to answer, and that, too, sometimes very soon after the infant's birth, is not as to the goodness of a wet nurse, but as to the best substitute for the mother's milk. Now it is obvious that the more nearly the substitute we select approaches to the character of the mother's milk, the greater will be the prospect of the attempt to rear the infant upon it proving successful. Discarding, therefore, all those preparations of arrowroot, sago, tapioca, flour, milk biscuit, etc., in which too many repose such confidence, we shall not need any labored argument to convince us that in the milk of some other animal we shall be likely to find the infant's most appropriate food. There are, however, many important differences between the milk of all the domestic animals and of the human female. Asses' milk, it is found by analysis, approaches the nearest of any, and on this account it is regarded as the best substitute for the child's natural food. Unfortunately, however, expense is very frequently a bar to its employment, and compels us to have recourse to cows' or goats' milk, as being so much more readily procured. And to these substances should the entire food of the child be limited, until, at least, the period of teething is well established.

The practice of feeding young infants upon crackers, and bread, and sweetmeats on account of their supposed lightness, cannot be too highly censured. It is a very wrong and dangerous habit to "get into." For above all things these substances are difficult of digestion at this period of life. When taken, they pass through the stomach undigested, or nearly so, and enter the intestines in a condition wholly unfit to be acted upon by the bile or other intestinal fluids; the intestines become irritated, and, in their efforts to get rid of the offending material, diarrhœa or inflammation is excited, while, if they remain for any length of time in the body they pass into a state of fermentation or putrefaction, and thus produce those horribly offensive evacuations which are so frequently voided by children under these circumstances. And more than this, during the summer months, or while the child is teething, a diet so harsh and unnatural as this, can seldom fail to be accompanied with one or more attacks of cholera infantum or some other similar disease as a consequence. How many children die martyrs to this accursed practice, none but those who almost daily witness the occurrence can disclose.

Literary Notices.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—
HANS BREITMANN IN CHURCH. With other New Ballads. By Charles G. Leland. The rare humor, so characteristic of the earlier series of the Breitmann Ballads, would seem, judging from the present volume, to be by no means exhausted. Mr. Leland has also developed a vein of pathos, even, in the midst of his quaint phraseology and occasional irreverence and profanity, which shows him to be capable of touching the finer chords of human feeling as well as of exciting laughter.

HANS BREITMANN'S BALLADS. By Charles G. Leland. New, enlarged, and complete edition. This beautifully bound and handsomely printed volume contains the entire series of the Breitmann Ballads.

THE MAIDEN WIDOW. A Sequel to "The Family Doom." By Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth. Mrs. Southworth has no peer in the field of romantic fiction, and her wonderful and interesting stories are read wherever the English language is spoken. Those who became involved in the mesh of mystery woven in "The Family Doom" will be anxious to see its disentanglement, which is accomplished in the present volume.

ROLAND YORKE. A Sequel to "The Channings." By Mrs. Henry Wood. The many admirers of Mrs. Wood will find this novel fully equal to anything that has yet come from her pen.

WHY DID HE MARRY HER? By Miss Eliza Dupuy. Miss Dupuy, well known as a contributor to the New York Ledger, has, in this volume, completed one of her most interesting, most artistic, and most charming novels. Lovers of sensational literature will need no further announcement.

THE LAST ATHENIAN. Translated from the Swedish of Victor Rydberg, by William W. Thomas, Jr., late U. S. Consul at Gothenburg, Sweden. The popularity of this novel, which was first issued in its present form only a year since, has forced its publishers to issue a second edition. The book, on its first appearance in Swedish, was enthusiastically received by Miss Bremer, and it was on her special recommendation that Mr. Thomas began the work of translation.

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE; or, The Joys and Sorrows of American Life. By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz.

HELEN AND ARTHUR; or, Miss Thusa's Spinning-Wheel. By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz.

THE PLANTER'S NORTHERN BRIDE; or, Scenes in Mrs. Hentz's Childhood. By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz.

EOLINE; OR, MAGNOLIA VALE; or, The Heiress of Glenmore. By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz.

The works of Mrs. Hentz, which were the delight of the past generation, are being rapidly reissued for the benefit of the present one in a style that is creditable to the publisher, and gratifying to the purchaser. Four volumes of the series are before us.

From Mrs. J. HAMILTON THOMAS, Philadelphia:—
THOUGHTS THAT CLUSTER ROUND OUR HOMES. By the compiler of "Drifted Snowflakes," "Leaves Gathered," etc. The little books which this lady publishes are models of typographical excellence. The one before us is printed on tinted, hot-pressed paper, with gilt edges, and is beautifully bound. Its title suggests the character of its contents, which contain a vast number of poems selected from various authors, all of them excellent in their character.

THE HALF-YEARLY ABSTRACT OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Being a Digest of British and Continental Medicine, and of the Progress of Medicine and the Collateral Sciences. Edited by William Domett Stone, M. D., F. R. C. S. Vol. I. Jan. 1870.

From the AUTHOR:—
REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE RELATIONS OF ALCOHOL TO MEDICINE. By John Bell, M. D., Chairman. Extracted from the Transactions of the American Medical Association. The subject of the relations of alcohol to medicine seems to be pretty nearly exhausted in the very readable pamphlet of one hundred and twenty pages. Examining the question under the several heads of hygiene, etiology, therapeutics, and medical jurisprudence, Doctor Bell brings the most conclusive evidence to show not only the utter inutility, but also the absolute harmfulness of alcohol, under whatever shape or form, as a medicine.

SKETCHES OF CREATION. By Alexander Winchell, LL. D. With Illustrations. A most interesting and instructive volume, giving a popular view of some of the grand conclusions of the sciences in reference to the history of matter and of life. It is in some sort a review, in a style adapted to the comprehension of the non-scientific reader, of what has been done by science in throwing light upon the physical conformation of the earth and of the solar system, as well as a summing up of the various speculations and theories as to their origin and final destiny.

JOURNAL OF A VISIT TO EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, THE CRIMEA, GREECE, ETC., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By Hon. Mrs. William Gray. We find this a very readable account of the recent eastern tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales, having been written by one of their suite. It is in the form of a journal, and was originally written without a thought of publication; and it was not until the book was actually in print that its authoress knew that it had passed into the printer's hands, and gave her consent to its being made public. The glimpses it gives of life in the harem are specially interesting, and serve to dispel some of the illusions which mystery has woven around woman's life in the east.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. We have here a valuable collection of stories and essays, which, having appeared first in the pages of English magazines, are now printed in book form, the better to preserve what is so well worthy of preservation.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Alton Clyde, author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. C. Steele, author of "Gardenhurst."

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE NATURAL SPEAKER. By Joseph Alden, D. D., LL. D., President of New York State Normal School. With a Prefatory Note by James McCosh, D. D., LL. D., President of the College of New Jersey. The peculiar feature of this new book of oratorical exercises consists in the fact that it rejects all pieces calculated to form a theatrical, declamatory manner of speaking. The exercises that have been selected are such as will foster a simple, natural, business-like style of oratory. Most, if not all of the prose selections have never appeared in any similar work.

THE MASTERY SERIES. Manual for Learning Spanish. By Thomas Prendergast, author of "The Mastery of Languages," etc. The principle of the "Mastery Series" of books, of which the present is the fourth volume, consists in first learning the language and then studying the grammar, just as one does in acquiring a knowledge of his native tongue. This is certainly the natural, and, for this reason, appears to us the better method. At all events, the system is worthy of a trial.

RED AS A ROSE IS SHE. A Novel. By the author of "Cometh up as a Flower," etc.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part No. 11. Price 50 cents.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., New York, through LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

MRS. JERNINGHAM'S JOURNAL. Mrs. Jerningham's journal begins with the trials of a six-week's old bride, who, being young, given to pleasure, and somewhat frivolous, yet perfectly innocent, is married to a staid, undemonstrative, exacting husband. She misses her country home, and the amusements and recreations of her girlhood, while her "master" is disappointed and dissatisfied because she does not become at once the staid and demure matron who finds her chief delight in looking after his comforts and "improving her mind." As the journal progresses troubles arise in which each are in fault; but after serious difficulties all ends happily. The poetry is not perhaps of the first order of merit; but it is amusing, and at the same time tells grave truths. Everybody should read the book, laugh at it, and ponder over it.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

THE LIFE OF OUR LORD. By Rev. William Hanna. Part II. The Ministry in Galilee. We noticed lately the appearance of the first volume of Dr. Hanna's "Life of Christ." The second is now before us; four are yet to come. The history is brought down to the Transfiguration. Dr. Hanna's style we have before commended for its clearness and simplicity. The binding and printing leave nothing to be desired.

THE GOLDEN CUP, and Other Stories. By Rev. J. de Liefde, Amsterdam.

BESSIE ON HER TRAVELS. By Joanna H. Mathews. This is the last of the "Bessie Books," and many a child will be sorry to hear the news. The series has been charming: interesting, and varied, free from excessive moralizing, and written so clearly and simply that the youngest reader can enjoy it. We hope to hear from Miss Mathews again.

A BRAID OF COORDS. By A. L. O. E. A collection of little stories called "Braids," contrasted together, the dark against the light. The author's name is familiar and pleasant to many of our readers.

From ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston:—

THE EARTHLY PARADISE. Part III. By William Morris. The lovers of poetry have long anticipated the publication of this volume. The first part of "The Earthly Paradise" was enough of itself to establish Mr. Morris' claim to the highest rank of contemporary verse. We shall give in our next number a more detailed criticism of these new stories, the most graceful, exquisite, and powerful legends since Chaucer. Here we will only say that three months' tales are included, six in number; viz., "The Death of Paris," "The Land East of the Sun and West of the Moon," "Accontius and Cydippe," "The Man who never Laughed Again," "The Story of Rhodope," and "The Lovers of Gudrun." One more part is yet to appear.

MAUPRAT. By George Sand. Translated by Virginia Vaughan. Messrs. Roberts have promised us a desideratum in English literature—a selection from the writings of George Sand, translated by a competent hand. This volume is, we believe, the first of the series. It is one of Madame Dudevant's latest works, and is, we need not say, entirely free from those views which are generally distasteful to American readers. It was composed "to paint an eternal, exclusive love—a love inspired before, and continuing during and after marriage." Of the interest and artistic excellence of the work, the author's name is sufficient guarantee.

A DAY BY THE FIRE. By Leigh Hunt. The papers here collected were published in six different periodicals at widely different periods of the author's life. They are good specimens of Leigh Hunt's best manner; that is, they are very good indeed. We know no easier, brighter, pleasanter companion for a spare hour than such a book. The opening essay, which gives the title, is simply charming. Leigh Hunt has such a thorough and delighted appreciation of good things in art and nature that the reader enjoys them with him. The book is beautifully printed. We have never seen a volume with the imprint of Messrs. Roberts whose mechanical part was open to serious criticism.

From LEE & SHEPARD, Boston:—

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR; The Bible and School Fund. By Rufus W. Clark, D. D.

From LORING, Boston:—

A ROMAN LAWYER IN JERUSALEM; First Century. By W. W. Story. Reprinted from Blackwood. This is an exceedingly ingenious defence of the character of Judas Iscariot.

From HENRY A. DREER, Philadelphia:—

DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR FOR 1870. This calendar contains a full list of seeds and plants for flower and vegetable garden, and furnishes also brief directions for the cultivation and management of flowers, vegetables, and fruits.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

MAY, 1870.

"This very morn hath May unbarred the Spring,
And lovers all, to crown the happy day,
To Flora's rustic shrine their offerings bring,
With dance, and laugh, and jocund roundelay."

Our steel plate for this month represents the visit of the cow doctor to a country house for the purpose of affording relief to what appears to be the favorite animal. The wo-begone countenances of the farmer and his family show plainly how anxious they are that something should be done, as the product of that cow is one of the principal means whereby they are sustained. It is a copy of an old painting, as will be seen from the dress of the doctor, who was wont in olden times to habit himself in a style different from his fellow-men.

Our fashion-plate contains some very fine styles of making up spring dresses. On the extension sheet also will be found several more, which are brought down to a later date.

The great number of designs of all kinds presented this month should commend this number to our patrons and their friends, as it will be seen from the variety that all tastes can be gratified.

A GOOD WIFE.—The Jackson Tribune says: "This is the fashion book of America, without a doubt, and our wife says she does not see how she could survive without GODEY."

MANY persons are doubtful of their own judgment, and do not fairly know if they like a publication until they find it indorsed by others. This is one reason why we publish commendatory notices from newspapers and letters from individuals. We have no vanity in the matter, because we know we publish the best LADY'S BOOK in America; but we like the doubting to be convinced. We could fill one number of the Book with the most agreeable notices from the press of the whole country.

It is Mr. Godey's highest ambition to do precisely what the Piqua Journal says:—

"If Mr. Godey's highest ambition is, as it seems to be, to make the LADY'S BOOK excel all others of its kind, he is succeeding admirably. In our opinion, none have thus far been able to equal it in any of its departments, and the handsome club sent off for it from this place shows that the ladies of our neighborhood appreciate its worth."

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.—Apply to your postmaster for a postal money order. No more losses by mail.

"The postal money order system established by law provides that no money order shall be issued for any sum less than $1 nor more than $50. All persons who receive money orders are required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz: For an order for $1 or for any larger sum but not exceeding $20, the sum of 10 cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of $20 and up to $30, the charge shall be 15 cents; more than $30 and up to $40, the charge shall be 20 cents; over $40 and up to $50, the charge shall be 25 cents."

NEURALGIA.—It is said that the juice of one lemon, taken daily in water, will cure the most obstinate case of neuralgia. No sugar must be used.

THE DEATH OF ONE OF THE OLD STAFF.—David Stevens died on the 5th of March, aged seventy-five years. Mr. Stevens had been in our employ for thirty years as superintendent of the plate printing department. Born in England, he came to this country at an early age, and has always been noted for his honorable dealings and his upright character. He was a man of rather commanding appearance, and of infinite jest. He was faithfully attended in his last illness, which was only of a week's duration, by the other employees in the office, who never left him for a minute night or day.

THE BOOK OF BOOKS.—The American Reserve flows out as follows: "It is the book of books for all our fashion-loving ladies to take."

Pretty much in the same strain is the notice from the Woodstock Standard: "GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is in its fortieth year. The lady who has it upon her table wants for little else of its kind."

SHORT, but to the point. From the Commonwealth, Marion, Alabama:—

"GODEY—the best magazine ever published."

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST.—A splendid engraving with this title, after the picture by the renowned John Martin, has been published by John Danity, No. 31 South Sixth St., Philadelphia. The engraving is by the celebrated A. B. Walter, who puts his name on nothing that is not good. The size of the engraving is sixteen by twenty-four inches, and the prices as follows: Proof before letter, $8; India proof, $6; plain proof, $5; plain prints, $4. This is the first time this celebrated picture has been engraved in this country, and is a beautiful one to hang in a parlor. All orders to be addressed as above. The publisher will send it carefully by mail.

"A GREAT assistant in the culinary department." Many persons overlook this great branch of our book, and yet all housekeepers acknowledge its worth. The Nevada City Times knows the importance of it. The editor says:—

"This justly popular ladies' magazine is again before its patrons for 1870. GODEY is the best household magazine we have. It is a great assistant in the culinary department, an able instructor in the boudoir, and an adviser in the family circle."

ARISTOCRATIC HUMBUGS.—Count Von Bellow is the name of the last imposition. We chronicled Lord Ainslie some time since. The count succeeded in marrying a young lady in New Jersey, and borrowing several thousands from her relatives and friends. What a soft set of people, and how fond the Americans are of titles!

WE ask particular notice to the fact commented upon by the Wisconsin Record about the cheapness of the LADY'S BOOK:—

"The cheapness of the LADY'S BOOK, in comparison with the lower-priced magazine, has always been conceded. The plates are more numerous, the music is all original, and cannot be procured until after they have published it; the same of model cottages and drawing lessons. And the fashions, where can you find their equal for truthfulness?"

FREIGHT ON LETTERS AND PREMIUM ON DRAFTS.—We wish our subscribers distinctly to understand, that when they send their letters by express company they must pay the freight, and those who send drafts must pay the premium. We advise subscribers to remit by mail a post-office order or a draft payable to the order of L. A. GODEY. Should either be lost, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

GERMANTOWN TELEGRAPH.—We hail with pleasure the close of the fortieth year of this popular weekly. Side by side for that number of years have the LADY'S BOOK and the Telegraph stood together in the good work of disseminating moral and useful reading among the people. Among the farmers in the adjoining counties, there is no weekly paper that is thought so much of as the Telegraph. Its views in everything relating to a farm are considered sound. At the starting of the paper, it was considered a bold venture, but the success it has achieved proves that energy and a strict adherence to right principles will in the end surmount all obstacles. Mr. Freas has our best wishes for his continued success.

"It has no superior in its peculiar department." We annex the whole of the notice from the Madison, Wisconsin, Democrat:—

"This magazine certainly has no superior in its peculiar department, and many think it is the best of the kind printed. Everything relating to the fashions, or those matters which ladies desire to be informed about, is here told in full, and with much particularity, illustrated by steel and wood engravings."

NO PRESENTS.—It will be seen by the following from a New York paper that our crusade against begging is having its effect. Many persons now put on invitation cards to weddings—

"No presents." This is the latest and the neatest invention adopted among well-bred people who issue invitations to silver weddings. Tin, silver, and golden weddings, as they are generally conducted, are only a refined species of blackmailing, and we have had quite enough of them during the season just elapsed."

We copy the following from the Ledger: "Wanted an experienced operator on shoes." Does not this mean that a shoemaker is wanted?

A VOICE FROM THE KITCHEN.—Upwards of thirty professed cooks, many of them hailing from the best hotels in the United States, have voluntarily come forward and pronounced RAND'S SEA-MOSS FARINE the finest article for puddings, custards, blanc mange, creams, jellies, and other favorite items of the dessert that has ever come under their notice.

So much for the palatability of the new element of food.

A still greater number of distinguished physicians and scientific chemists indorse it as a nutrient of the very highest class; while every housekeeper who uses it admits that it is full fifty per cent. cheaper than maizena, farina, corn starch, or any other preparation from corn or the cereal grains.

The new food staple is manufactured, under a patent, by the Sea-Moss Farine Co., 53 Park Place; and, in view of the above established facts, it is not surprising that their extensive machinery is kept running night and day to supply a demand that is rapidly becoming universal.

PUNCTUALITY:—

"It comes as regular as clock work, never having missed a number since it has been on our exchange list." And that is a long time, Messrs. Editors of Wrightsville Star.

Another virtue is its promptness, always reaching us in advance of other publications.—Missouri Investigator.

PLEASANT.—Hearing a couple of persons, employed to hang the pictures in your parlor, disputing as to which is the top and which the bottom of the pictures.

CHILDREN'S parties, as they are conducted in the present year of grace, are about as lamentable instances of the evil results of the following of fashion as can well be adduced. The old-fashioned children's party, which took place in the afternoon—five o'clock, or even earlier, being considered a very proper hour for assembling—was an entirely different kind of thing. Then boys and girls were boys and girls, not those modern horrors, the "young gentlemen" and "young ladies" of our present juvenile parties. The children's dresses were not so fine as to prevent them from indulging without fear of evil consequence in the games considered proper to their age. Alas for the days of simplicity! Children of the mature ages of six to ten years have now as many engagements as their mammas—very probably more; and the parties to which these young people go are not the simple teas followed by games, but regular set affairs, with the dressing, the company manners, the wine drinking, the suppers, and the late hours of entertainments indulged in by persons of much maturer age.

Children's parties, as they are generally conducted, are productive of very serious evils. The want of sleep at proper hours, the unsuitable food and the wine which are consumed, tell on the physical strength of children with most startling results. The little creatures become pale and hollow-eyed, and they suffer from attacks of indigestion, which produce very serious consequences. Early and sound sleep, plain food, fresh air, sunlight, are wanted, that children may be the rosy, healthy, happy creatures that they ought to be. The crowded rooms and late hours to which our present fashions expose them will undermine many fragile constitutions entirely, and will weaken even those naturally strong. How can children be healthy whose conditions of existence are eminently unhealthy?

Nor are the physical evils the only ones to be deplored. These parties foster in children a taste for excitement, which it is more easy to raise than to allay. We have heard quite young children boasting of the number of parties to which they had gone. Then they are encouraged to ape the manners as well as the dress of their elders; and, while their affected airs and graces are extremely amusing to thoughtless spectators, they are painful in a very high degree to those who consider what will be the outcome of all this juvenile precocity. To those who remember that "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," there seems to be much need for reform in the matter of children's parties.

A LIFETIME.—Nearly forty years it has been a welcome visitor to thousands who could scarcely do without it.—Wrightsville Star.

METHOD AND ORDER.—Nature, in every object, however minute, inculcates the invaluable lessons of method and order to man:—

"Each moss,
Each crawling insect holds a rank
Important in the plan of Him who framed
This scale of beings—holds a rank, which lost,
Would break the chain, and leave behind a gap
Which Nature's self would rue!"

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine over ten years without repairs and without breaking a needle, although I commenced the use of it without any instructions; have used it constantly for family sewing; have quilted whole quilts of the largest size, and it is still in complete order, runs like a top, and bids fair to be willed to those who come after me with better powers of production than an unbroken prairie farm. MRS. H. E. G. ARRY.

Whitewater, Wis.

ARTISTIC POWER OF SAVAGES.—Curious facts with regard to the artistic power of those whom we are accustomed to speak of as savages come to light every now and then. The meeting of the Royal Geographical Society of London, lately held, was occupied in the consideration of the gigantic sculptured figures found on Easter Island, a little place not more than twelve miles long and four broad, and lying surrounded by miles and miles of the great Pacific waters, yet abounding in sculptured figures.

The Hydahs, or Indians of Queen Charlotte's Islands, off the northeast coast of North America, possess a very remarkable artistic skill. With a broken knife and a file for tools, they will carve pipes and statuettes, and will construct jewelry from silver or gold coin, wonderful both in the execution and in the taste displayed in the design of the ornaments. A man named Waekus made out of gold coins, for the wife of the English Admiral on the station, a pair of bracelets of the most beautiful design and workmanship. This man had quite an inventive genius. He made the design for the cast-iron railing now on the balcony of the Bank of British Columbia in Victoria; and he could copy engravings or make portraits by scratching on ivory. This Waekus came to a sad end, having been shot by his chief in a drunken quarrel.

Many of the Hydahs possess similar artistic powers. Mr. A. G. Dallas, late Governor-General of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, has an excellent bust of himself executed in ivory by a Hydah. Another of these Indians carved for Mr. Robert Brown a beautiful ivory chair, doing all the work with a knife, and polishing it with shark's skin. These people copy on slate figures which they see in stray copies of the Illustrated London News; so that future ethnological explorers must beware of founding theories on the fact that figures of Assyrian bulls are found traced on slate in "Queen Charlotte's Islands."

These clever and interesting people are dying out. They have no power of becoming settled enough to learn the arts of civilized life, and drunkenness and disease, introduced by white men, are fast putting an end to one of the finest of the Indian tribes. Who is answerable for this? We do not like to answer this question, but we think we could.

WHAT the Press says of the literature of GODEY: The Nevada Times, "It is a welcome visitor to the library." "The tone of the magazine is of a high order, and its moral teachings unexceptionable." That is from the Schenectady Union, and that is what we pride ourselves upon. "His corps of contributors are of the first class of American writers, as indeed they always have been." This is from the Port Byron Times, and the editor of this paper is very particular in his literary notices. "The general tone of this magazine is unexceptionable for any family circle."—Searcy Record. We have always said that every story we publish may be read aloud in the domestic circle. "The reading matter is of a high order."—Wis. Record. "Of late we perceive that Godey's stories are superior to those of any similar periodical." We thank the Madison Democrat for this, and we will go still further. We are willing that a comparison should be made between other as well as similar magazines. "Its literary contents are unexceptionable, and by the best authors."—Jackson Tribune. They certainly are by the best authors that money can procure.

BARON ROTHSCHILD is anxious for an English peerage, that he may get in the House of Lords. But the lords still object to the presence of a Jew among them; and yet they cannot prevent the Duke of Hamilton, the greatest blackguard in Europe, from taking his seat, because he has an hereditary right to it. Here is consistency.

HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY.—A brilliant list of new and fashionable music in the May number, now ready. A choice new Fantaisie de Salon, for good players (worth of itself, in the stores, 50 cents); Susie Morne, beautiful song and chorus by our popular contributor, Mrs. Hackelton; Lottie Mazourka, easily arranged for beginners by the favorite composer, E. Mack; Beyond the Sunset, beautiful sacred song; Spring Garden Waltz, easy, are all included in the contents, and as usual are printed upon the best music paper of the full music size. Lovers of music everywhere should send 40 cents for this number, or $1 (and nine cents in stamps for postage) for the last three numbers. Terms, $4 per annum. For two subscribers we send premium of $5 worth of new music gratis.

New Sheet Music.—Happy Gypsy Girl, new song, 30 cents. Mary, my Beautiful Angel, by Mrs. Hackelton, 30. Francie Belle, exquisite song by Krauss, 25. Still True to Thee, very pretty, 30. Sunset on the Mountains, 30. Also, Lyda Polka, easy, 20. Golden Sunset, Reverie, 30. Spring Schottisch, by Mack, picture title, 40. Grand Duchess Fantaisie by Brinley Richards, 35. Catalogues free. Persons ordering $5 worth of music will receive Holloway's Musical Monthly for 1870 free. Address orders for the Monthly and for Music only to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post-Office, Philadelphia.

A NEW YORK paper says that "Many people—especially strangers—in this city stay away from church on Sunday for fear of being considered intruders, and this feeling is a very natural one under the circumstances. We have seen in fashionable places of worship half the pews vacant, and yet a visitor unable to obtain a seat, unless he or she would take one near the door or up in the organ loft."

The above will apply to all large cities.

THE London correspondent of the American Literary Gazette gives the following as a most remarkable circumstance:—

"I may mention as a rather unusual circumstance in literary history, that Fraser's Magazine has just issued a second edition of its January number. The article which caused this demand was Mr. J. A. Froude's article on 'England and the Colonies.' You know Mr. Froude is now its editor? The example set by the Fortnightly Review is followed now by 'Fraser.' Several of the articles are signed. The Quarterly Review recently found it necessary to issue a second edition; and, if I remember accurately, Blackwood's Magazine published a second edition of Mr. Samuel Warren's ('Ten Thousand a Year') eulogium of Prince Albert. These are the only instances of a periodical issuing a second edition I can recall."

It is nothing unusual for us to publish five different editions of our January number, and of many other numbers during the year. We consider this is nothing, as our Book is electrotyped; but before the days of stereotyping, we in one instance set up the type for a January number four times. We are now reprinting several numbers of the years 1859, '60, '61, '62, such is the demand for back numbers of the LADY'S BOOK.

A VERY impudent foreigner in New York, a Sig. Barilli, proposing to go to California, advertises a farewell concert in New York, a full dress affair, the necessity of which is that ladies must wear low-necked dresses and the gentlemen swallow-tailed coats, or they will not be admitted; and yet the fashionable donkies in that city will obey him to the letter. Let an American propose such a thing, what an outcry there would be! Cannot one appreciate music without a swallow-tailed coat?

POSTHUMOUS VINDICTIVENESS. The wills of two prelates recently deceased exhibit in a very marked degree "the ruling passion strong in death." The late Bishop of Exeter made special provision in his will for carrying on the Tregony case, which, to the uninitiated laity, seemed to involve no point worthy of posthumous litigation. The late Bishop of Manchester (whose connection with his diocese was marked by many unhappy quarrels) publishes and perpetuates a family feud which one might have thought would have been healed by the lapse of time. Many years ago his eldest daughter married one of his lordship's chaplains—a man of exemplary character—without the bishop's consent. She is by will excluded from all interest in her father's property, who explains his act in these terms: "This I do not in anger, but because I hold it a duty not to let such conduct as hers and the person she is married to prove successful."

We copy the above from the London Pall Mall Gazette. One bishop leaves as a legacy—a lawsuit; the other excludes from all interest in his property his first born daughter, because she married the man of her heart, not his—"a man of exemplary character," but only a chaplain. Not rich. If he had been, more riches would have been given him. The excuse given for thus cutting her off is contemptible. He leaves his daughter in poverty, that it may be a lesson. What lesson? That a bishop's daughter must not, no matter how much she may love and however respectable he may be, marry her father's chaplain? Will there be any difference in heaven between a bishop and a chaplain? that is, if both get there, but we think there is a chance that one may not. But we must not be uncharitable; or it may be said we are as bad as the Bishop of Manchester. How could this man ask forgiveness when he forgives not?

THE late celebrated George M. Dallas was once examining a well-known German politician upon the subject of his presence in Harrisburg at a certain time.

"Mr. S—, were you in Harrisburg on the 20th of January last?"

Witness, after considerable hesitation, answered: "No, Mr. Dallas, I was not in Harrisburg at that time."

"Were you in Harrisburg on the 25th of January?"

Witness replied, after long consideration: "No, Mr. Dallas, I was not in Harrisburg on the 25th of last January."

"Well, Mr. S—, please inform us on what day in January you were in Harrisburg?"

Witness replied rather quickly this time: "Mr. Dallas, I never was in Harrisburg."

We are equally surprised with the Gainesville New Era—

GODEY is on our round table, and, if such a thing could be, it excels any previous number of that host of all magazines. But the ladies all know how to appreciate GODEY. We are pleased to hear they are making up a club to send for it without delay. We are surprised that anybody who has a wife, sister, daughter, or sweetheart, does not send for a copy. Try it and we will not ask you to try it again unless you are satisfied it is worth twice the subscription price.

A COMICAL transposition of type occurred in a recent number of the Buffalo Christian Advocate as follows:—

"Her eyes were once to me the boundaries of the world, and were the first things I ever looked into. And I think the best five herrings each per day, the number of fish for the summer subsistence of this single species of bird cannot be under 214,000,000."

WHICH IS WANTED?—Many persons complain that they cannot find words for their thoughts, when the real trouble is that they cannot find thoughts for words.

EXTRAORDINARY CAB-DRIVERS AND POLICEMEN OF PARIS.—"A curious illustration of the honesty of Parisian cab-drivers and policemen is given in the last fortnightly lists of objects found in public vehicles or thoroughfares and deposited by the finders at the Prefecture of Police. Between the 26th of December and the 12th of January, 13 watches, 22 pocket-books (containing altogether 37,479f.), 3 rings, 1 gold snuff-box, 4 bracelets, 3 lockets, 7 brooches, and 1 pair of gold spectacles were returned. All these objects were picked up in the streets or in the public gardens. In cabs, omnibuses, and theatres there were found 27 purses and pocket-books (containing 63,698f.), 16 watches, 23 opera-glasses, 1 pearl necklace, 3 gold necklaces and lockets, 2 bracelets, 44 umbrellas, 5 ladies' shawls or cloaks, and 9 gentlemen's overcoats. The most surprising feature of the list is the number of twenty-franc and ten-franc pieces picked up and taken to the police office."

The above reads very well; but we were not so fortunate. We had the misfortune to lose two umbrellas and a cane from a cab, and made our representation to Mons. le Prefect, and, after waiting some days for an answer, were informed that, "Some honest man who had found them had not handed them in."

COMPLIMENTARY.

DEAR SIR: In trying to economize for 1870, I thought to begin I would give up all expensive periodicals; but my heart failed me when I came to GODEY, and found I never could do without it, and at the "eleventh hour" sent in my subscription, and was really more than repaid in the charmingly genial face and fatherly form that first met my gaze upon opening the January number. I inclose you some receipts.

Many thanks for the complimentary letter and the receipts.

FROM Thackeray's "Book of Snobs" we extract the following, which is peculiarly adapted to this region:—

"I am sick of court circulars. I loathe haut-ton intelligence. I believe such words as fashionable, exclusive, aristocratic, and the like, to be wicked, unchristian epithets that ought to be banished from honest vocabularies. A court system that sends men of genius to the second table I hold to be a snobbish system. A society that sets up to be polite, and ignores arts and letters, I hold to be a snobbish society. You, who despise your neighbor, are a snob; you, who forget your own friends meanly to follow after those of a higher degree, are a snob; you, who are ashamed of your poverty, and blush for your calling, are a snob; as are you who boast of your pedigree, or are proud of your wealth."

There are hundreds in this city who were absolutely poor before the war, and are now rich. These are our snobs, who attempt to make society laws for those who were wealthy before the war commenced.

THE following advertisement appears in a London paper:—

"A young lady, who has received a good education, can read and write, and is versed in geography, history, music, dancing, and elementary mathematics, wishes a situation in a respectable family as washer and ironer."

A young lady versed in geography, history, music, dancing, and elementary mathematics as a washer and ironer!

Another advertisement shows how some poor girls of the period have to rough it:—

"Governess in a farm-house, to instruct six children in thorough English, French, and vocal singing, plain and fancy needlework, with entire charge of children and their wardrobe. Must be amiable and polite. Salary £12."

Sixty dollars American money. The "amiable and polite" is worth the money. A lady advertises in one of our city papers, not professing to teach near as much as the above, but she wants $1000 salary.

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

THIS month (May) is one of unusual interest to the flower gardener, especially in the Northern and Middle States, as it is the month wherein nearly all the plants, classed as "bedding plants," are set out in the flower borders or beds. To insure perfect success, it is requisite to have good soil, as without this the best plants will fail. Those who have not already prepared their flower beds should at once attend to this, and procure some fresh soil from a pasture field, mixed with well decomposed stable manure and, if possible, some leaf mould from the woods. With such a soil, the most satisfactory results may be obtained. In Mr. Dreer's Garden Calendar for 1870 will be found an unusually fine assortment of plants and bulbs suitable for the flower garden. By his careful mode of packing they have been sent to every part of the United States by express with perfect safety. His Ten Dollar collection contains one hundred plants, among which are ten Everblooming Roses; twenty Verbenas; four Coleus; four Heliotrope; four Fuchsias; four Lantanas; four Geraniums; four Double Dahlias; two Monthly Pinks; two Monthly Carnations; four Tuberoses; six Gladiolus, with other bedding plants. Those who do not wish the whole collection can have fifty plants forwarded for Six Dollars.

This is also the month for sowing Flower Seeds in the open borders. A One Dollar package of Mr. Dreer's Flower Seeds, containing twenty-five free blooming varieties, will add much to the beauty and fragrance of your flower borders, and are forwarded by mail without any additional expense. Address

"NEVER MADE HIS MOTHER SMILE."—What a unique and meaning expression was that of a young Irish girl, in giving testimony against an individual in a court of justice the other day. "Arrah, sir," said she, "I'm sure he never made his mother smile." There is a biography of unkindness in that short and simple sentence.

THERE is scarcely any ache to which children are subject so bad to bear and so difficult to cure as ear-ache. But there is a remedy never known to fail. Take a bit of cotton batting, put upon it a pinch of black pepper, gather it up and tie it, dip it in sweet oil, and insert it in the ear. Put a flannel bandage over the head to keep it warm. It will give immediate relief.

A NEW YORK paper is rather severe on our fashionable young men. In describing a new hotel, it says: "The waiters are of ineffable elegance and of an intelligent cast of countenance. They look like young men going to a party."

TENN.

MR. L. A. GODEY: I was made happy last evening by the receipt of the three numbers of the LADY'S BOOK. Thank you, oh, so much! for your kind promptness. There was quite a jubilee in * * *, our country home, when the January number was opened, and Godey himself seemed to step forth to greet us. I shall prize the picture most highly, and it will soon grace the walls of my room. You see, Mr. Godey, our dear father had ordered for my sister and self two of the fashion magazines of the day; but dear GODEY, whom we prize above all the others, was not one of them, owing to some sad mistake, but he thought "two were enough for one family." So, having determined to have GODEY, I also determined to obtain it by my own efforts, and I have succeeded beyond my wishes. I do not wonder that the land rings with your praises, if you are always so kind to every trembling aspirant for the honors of your magazine. I hope never again to be without the LADY'S BOOK.

F. L. A.

VOTARIES of fashion are constantly seeking redress for their grievances in courts of justice, where their troubles are apt to excite less sympathy than mirth. Of such a nature was a case recently heard against a druggist who had sold some hair-wash to a lady, which had the effect of causing the user to become completely bald. Such accidents will sometimes happen, and had better be endured in silence, no substantial damages being generally obtainable against the careless dispensers of such washes. If the label "For external use only" is affixed to the bottle, the risk incurred by the use of its contents rests usually with the purchaser. Hard-hearted judges are apt to think that the experience bought by the loss of a head of hair is reward sufficient for the amount of injury incurred. At the same time we must protest against the sale of hurtful compounds of the kind, plenty of harmless drugs being in use for the purpose of dyeing hair without having recourse to risky experiments. It is not sufficient to say that ladies ought to be satisfied to appear as nature pleases, and that any attempt at embellishment deserves to be frustrated. In all ages women, and even the sterner sex, have been more or less rebellious against the sway of time. Early Asiatic races were well versed in the use of cosmetics, and the number of such preparations used by Roman ladies was very considerable.

IN the large dry goods establishments the clerks now pass a watchword on the entrance of a certain class of customers. The phrase is simple: Two on ten. This means, "Keep your two eyes on her ten fingers."

A GOOD housewife should not be a person of one idea, but should be familiar with the flower garden as well as with the flour barrel; and, though her lesson should be to lessen expense, the odor of a fine rose should not be less valued than the order of her household. She will prefer a yard of shrubbery to a yard of satin. If her husband is a skillful sower of grain, she is equally skillful as a sewer of garments. He keeps his hoses bright by use; she keeps the hose of the whole family in order.

How the present French Prime Minister got his wife as described by herself:—

"Well," she begins, when asked, "I used to go aux Eaux (watering places); he used to come aux Eaux too; I was a little thing; he was tall. The following year I went aux Eaux again, and so did he. I had grown a little, he was much taller. The third year I went aux Eaux as usual, almost grown up, but he had got taller than before, tall enough for both of us, so he drew me up to him, and I became his wife."

"MAMMA," said an intelligent little girl, "what is the meaning of a book being printed in 12mo?"

"Why, my dear," replied the mother, "it means the book will be published in twelve months."

WE copy the following point of English law for the benefit of those who are looking to the Old Country for great legacies:—

"Most of the persons who are duped are ignorant on two points, which, in nearly every instance, would satisfy them at once of the utter folly of the hopes they indulge. The first is that an alien cannot be an heir in England when there is no will, and that he cannot take real estate, even if left to him by will. The second is, that in England estates devolve upon the eldest son alone, and on his oldest son in succession, and are not divided into shares among all the children. Yet nothing is more common than for persons to assert heirship to the supposed shares of younger brothers and sisters, or to claim, as natives of the United States, heirship to Englishmen who have left no wills."

SHAWLS.—The passion for shawls, all other wraps devised by Fashion to the contrary notwithstanding, among all women everywhere, is remarkable. In one country the shawl may flow from the head like a veil; in another it hangs from the shoulders; in another it is knotted round the loins, like a sash; in yet another it is swathed round the body like a skirt. Whenever worn at all, it is the pet article of dress.

At the Russian Court ladies judge one another by their shawls as by their diamonds. In la belle France the bridegroom wins favor by a judicious gift of this kind. In Cairo and Damascus the gift of a shawl will cause almost as much heart-burning in the harem as the introduction of a new beauty. In England, the daughter of the house spends the whole of her first quarter's allowance in the purchase of a shawl. The Paris grisette and the London dressmaker go to their work with the little plaid shawl pinned neatly at the waist. The lost gin drinker covers her rags with the remnant of the shawl of other days. The peasant's daughter buys a cotton shawl with a gay border for her wedding. The maiden aunt, tender on the subject of years, takes to wearing a shawl in the house in midwinter; while granny would no more think of going out without it at any season, than she would of retiring without her night-cap. The value of the Thibet goat, from which the shawl known as cashmere is manufactured, is worth one thousand dollars, which price, comparatively enormous as it may seem, is not a speculative one, for no fleeced animal has wool of such fineness, softness, and durability.

The prices paid for the real cashmere shawls, of those woven in India, have sometimes been almost fabulous. A full-sized shawl, such as we call a long shawl, ordinarily commands in Paris or London from five hundred dollars to five thousand dollars, according to quality. Scarfs and square shawls, being smaller, sell for less.

Let not our lady readers for a moment suppose that all these shawls are manufactured in India in the shape in which they are sold here. The centres and borders are made separately, and are put together afterwards in sizes, and after patterns to suit customers. Moreover, a large number of the shawls sold as real India or cashmere, are actually manufactured in France; for the Thibet goat was introduced into that country more than forty years ago, and the cashmere shawls imitated with considerable skill. The real India shawl has a less evenly woven web and shows brighter colors, but it requires a competent judge to detect the difference between the real and imitation. The border of the genuine cashmere is invariably woven in small pieces, which are afterward sewed together, as the whole border is substantially sewed on the centre.

Ladies of the present day, who purchase worsted or woollen goods under the denomination of cashmeres, are, or ought to be, aware that such goods are cashmere only in name. A real cashmere shawl, made by the inhabitants of that India valley, from the wool of a peculiar variety of goat reared on the plains of Thibet, is a most costly article, eagerly sought after by the Rajahs and Sultans of the East, but rarely indeed finding its way into Europe or this country. To make a pair of large and handsome cashmere shawls requires the labor of twelve or fourteen men at least six months. The animals from which the material is obtained are covered by nature with two kinds of coat for clothing—the one, fine, curly, generally gray, imparting to the skin a down more or less thick, as if to guard against cold and damp; the other coarse, lank, and giving a general color to the animal; and as it is only the inner and finer coating which is used for the fine shawls, the quality produced is limited, and therefore higher priced. An idea of the costliness of the real cashmere may be formed from the fact of the late Buneet Liugh, Chief of Sahvre, paying five thousand rupees for a pair of shawls, the patterns of which delineated his victories.

“OLDEST, newest, best, and greatest of the family periodicals.”

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—The last number will lose nothing by contrast with the splendid January number of this oldest, newest, best, and greatest of the family periodicals. Its contents are as interesting as usual, and every department full and showing vigor, energy, taste, and an up-with-the-times-spirit that keeps GODEY'S up to the A. No. 1 standard.—Gazette, Glen Cove, N. Y.

JAPANESE PETS.—From the letter of a traveller: “Japanese ladies possess a very choice breed of pet dogs. These dogs are small, with beautiful silky hair, fringed paws, and pug nose. So completely is this feature diverted from the purpose it ordinarily serves in dogs as a breathing passage, that it is difficult to believe the effect has not been artificially produced. It was not until we saw some very young puppies quite as deficient in useful noses as their parents, that we could believe the pretty little doggies were not cruelly used in their infancy, by their noses being in some way compressed. They are very delicate little creatures, and the utmost care is bestowed upon them by their mistresses, which they repay by manifesting much satisfaction when in the society of women, and selecting the long dresses to sleep on. Owing to the peculiar formation of the nose, they snuffle and snort during sleep, and the tongue hangs out from the side of the mouth. We recollect once going to a dog-fancier's at Nagasaki, where numbers of these little animals were collected for the purpose of sale. They lived in elegant kennels, and at certain times were let out into a small dry courtyard for their morning airing, where they frisked, and barked, and snuffed together to their hearts' content, and then these dear little things—dear in more senses than one, for the price ranged from twenty-five to fifty dollars, or from thirty to forty dollars each—were fed on boiled rice and fish, and replaced in their domiciles. Japanese cats are different from common tabbies, inasmuch as their tails are merely stumps. In that respect they resemble the Manx cats. Cats are there, as here, household pets, and are encouraged for the same services which they render to us—viz., that of preying on rats and mice.”

ORIGIN OF THE FLOATING ICEBERGS IN THE ATLANTIC.—The valleys of Greenland are all filled with glaciers, of which some have an enormous extent. They are always in motion, gliding downward like rivers of nearly solid matter, which have their outlet in the sea, only their motion is exceedingly slow, not exceeding about one hundred feet for the whole summer season. The lower extremities of these glaciers, reaching the ocean, are buoyed up by the deep water, and then are broken off from the rest of the mass, when they slowly drift away to the south. They sometimes have an extent of several miles, and are really mountains of ice—icebergs—of which about seven-eighths is in the water, and less than one-eighth exposed above the surface. These floating ice mountains often carry enormous blocks of rock, torn from the mountain side along which they have moved, and drop these rocks when and where the iceberg is finally lost. In this way geologists explain how boulders and erratic rocks happen to be found where there are no similar formations—namely, by icebergs, at a time before the present surface of the continents were upheaved from the ocean. It is known that this is one of Agassiz's favorite theories. He supposes that the whole earth was covered with glaciers.

THERE is always something singular in the history of paintings. Here is a case:—

“One of the celebrated Watteau paintings, called ‘Gilles,’ and representing a pierrrot, had as adventurous a history as many artistic treasures now preserved with religious care. A collector saw the painting outside a stall, which displayed its nondescript wares amidst a medley of similar bric-a-brac establishments which, fourteen or fifteen years ago, disfigured the great court of the Louvre. To draw attention to it, the salesman had scribbled in chalk upon the canvas, ‘Pierrot hopes to please you,’ and pierrot was not disappointed, for the keen eye of the amateur recognized the master's touch, and quickly bought it for 200fr. It soon after passed into the hands of M. de Lacaze, and, when he had it some years in his collection, an English gentleman offered him for the picture 250,000 francs, which he refused.”

A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE BOUQUET.—The Cubans manifest their admiration for opera artistes in an odd way. Instead of throwing bouquets on the stage, they throw a young negro covered with bracelets of gold and jewelry. The black is, in fact, the favorite's jewel casket. Some one should introduce this fashion as apropos at the performances of the Christy Minstrels.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

THE BIRD'S NEST.

Will you take the nest away,
From beneath the hawthorn spray,
And the poor bird's labor spoil,
After all her pains and toil?

She has only flown for food,
For her young and tender brood;
Think, oh think, how she will moan,
When she finds her darlings gone.

Patience for many a day,
When the sunshine looked so gay,
On the little eggs she sat—
Will you not remember that?

And her faithful mate would sit
Near her with his joyous twit;
Singing, all the livelong day,
Pretty songs of shining May.

Little birds, shall all your care
Now be changed to sad despair?
Who would take the nest away
From the twinkling hawthorn spray?

AMUSING GAMES.

THE KEY OF THE KING'S GARDEN.

This game somewhat resembles the old one of "The House that Jack built," and is played in precisely the same manner. It begins thus, and may be carried on for any length of time, according to the pleasure and ingenuity of its conductor:—

I sell you the key of the king's garden.
I sell you the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the stick, that beat the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the fire, that burnt the stick, that beat the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the water, that put out the fire, that burnt the stick, that beat the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the pail, that brought the water, that put out the fire, that burnt the stick, that beat the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden.

I sell you the well, that filled the pail, that brought the water, that quenched the fire, that burnt the stick, that beat the dog, that worried the cat, that killed the rat, that gnawed the beam, in which is the nail, where hangs the string, that holds the key of the king's garden, etc.

THE LITTLE OLD MAN.

This is only a variation of the preceding game. The players seat themselves in a circle, and the one best acquainted with the game, commences it thus:—

1st. I sell you my little good man.

2d. I sell you the house of my little good man.

3d. I sell you the door of the house of my little good man.

4th. I sell you the lock of the door of the house of my little good man.

5th. I sell you the key of the lock, etc.

6th. I sell you the string of the key of the lock, etc.

7th. I sell you the mouse who gnawed the string of the key of the lock, etc.

8th. I sell you the cat that eat the mouse, that gnawed the string, etc.

And so on. Every player making a mistake has to pay a forfeit.

SOWING OATS.

The players range themselves in a circle, and dance round without singing, whilst the air is played once. The song then commences thus:—

I.

This is the way my father sows
His oats, as through his fields he goes.

[repeat
repeat

(Here the players imitate the action of sowing.)

And when the grain springs from the ground
He folds his arms, and gazing round—

(Here they all fold their arms, pirouette round and return to their places.)

Says, "Soft rain fall, and bright sun shine,
And make my oat-crop fine!"

II.

This is the way my father reaps
His oats, and when they lie in heaps—

[repeat
repeat

(Here they imitate the action of reaping.)

In yellow heaps, upon the ground,
He folds his arms, and gazing round—

(Same movements as in preceding verse.)

Says, "Rain keep off, and bright sun shine,
And make my oat-crop fine!"

III.

This is the way my father binds
His oats in sheaves, and when he finds

[repeat

(Each player here passes her right arm round her companion's waist.)

No more remaining on the ground,
He folds his arms, and gazing round—

(Same movements as before.)

Says, "Thanks to rain and bright sunshine,
My oat-crop has been fine!"

IV.

This is the way my father's oats
Are made to lose their husky coats— [repeat (Here each player imitates on her companion's [repeat shoulder, the action of threshing.)
And when the flail rings on the ground,
He folds his arms, and gazing round,
(Same movements as before.)
Says, "Come what will, come rain or shine,
My crop is housed in time!"

ORIENTAL NUPTIALS.—A marriage was recently celebrated in the synagogue on Chrystie Street, New York. The reform movement among the Hebrews has occasioned among those who remain orthodox a fondness for customs which were falling into disuse, and the marriage we speak of was performed with all the imposing ceremonies of the Orient of long ago. All the women were on the right side, and all the men on the left. These latter wore their hats, invited Christian guests included. The reader, who officiates also as rabbi, was clad in the black robe and peculiar cap of the Hebrew clergy. Soon the bridal cortege made its appearance, the happy pair leading, and followed by five bridesmaids and best men. On arriving at the altar, the bridesmaids ascended the platform on the right, surrounding the bride, and obscuring her from view. The gentlemen of the party surrounded the bridegroom. At this juncture the violins in the gallery struck up an air, monotonous and decidedly oriental. The ensuing service was almost entirely in Hebrew, the bridegroom, bride, and reader standing under a canopy of flowered silk, which was held by the groomsmen. Before and after the betrothal with the ring a cup of wine was presented first to the bridegroom and afterward to the bride. At intervals the violins gave snatches of the same doleful strain. The service was sung, rather than chanted, by the reader in a fine baritone voice. This gentleman wore, during the ceremony, a white shawl over his shoulders, and a white scarf was placed around the bridegroom's neck. The benediction and breaking of a wine glass concluded the service.

A FRENCH TRICK.—A sharp hand has long succeeded in making a good living at the expense of the owners of the leading restaurants by stealing the silver and plated forks and spoons. His assurance and ingenuity have defied all attempts at detection until the day before yesterday. His mode of operating was this: He placed wax underneath the frame of the table at which he was sitting, stuck the silver to it, and then, with the utmost sangfroid, told the waiter to bring another couvert. When arrested by the police he was found to be a walking silversmith's shop well stocked.

Another: There are many ways of making money in this great city of Paris, but which to scrupulous minds might not appear legitimate. A complaint has been made to the Procureur Imperial against a personage passing himself off as Grand Chancellor of Mexican orders. He has amused himself and his dupes—for a money consideration—with conferring, ad libitum, the Orders of Guadalupe, Mexican Eagle, and the feminine Order of San Carlos. The price which human vanity will pay for ribbon is represented to have been in some cases exorbitant. It is a pity that the recipients of these decorations should have had their eyes opened. Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise.

WAY OF THE WORLD.

Determined beforehand, we gravely pretend
To ask the opinion and thoughts of a friend;
Should his differ from ours on any pretence,
We pity his want of both judgment and sense;
But if he falls into and flatters our plan,
Why, really we think him a sensible man.

"THE best periodical of its class issued, and no rivals."

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is an established favorite, and has long enjoyed the reputation of being the best periodical of its class issued. Its claim as such is certainly well based, and does not seem likely to be disturbed. No rivals have as yet succeeded in encroaching on its popularity.—Courier, Geneva, New York.

We copy the following from an English publication, it may be a warning to our own countrywomen:—

"Green ball dresses are always much in fashion for the fair complexioned ladies whom they suit. But the bright green which looks so charming carries death with it, and the dressmakers who make up the dresses, and the ladies who wear them, suffer from the effects of the arsenite of copper which gives the much-admired dye. We extract a note sent to a contemporary, which contains a warning as to these poisonous ball dresses.

"You are read in so many households where ball dresses are required that I am sure you will do good service in calling attention to the green batiste, of which and its arsenical dye I sent you a note the other day. I wrote to the firm who supplied the sample I examined, and in reply they say, 'We are aware that the green batiste contains arsenic in the dye, and some time since we gave instructions to our assistants to mention it to all customers purchasing it, and believe it is now generally known by ladies, and we feel ourselves compelled to keep it to supply our customers to prevent them going elsewhere.' It is certainly not generally known by ladies that this green is arsenite of copper, and I am sure that a hint from you would save many a dressmaker from the evils to which she is now subjected by thoughtless or ignorant customers."

THE Princess de Metternich and a new dance.
Extract from a letter:—

"The Princess de Metternich is another high-born lady who has been pretty fairly discussed, but she never cries; she does not care much, and outwardly braves it all. In private she has written her memoirs, only they are not to come out till after her death. She opened the German ball at the Grand Hotel, where the battle of Sadowa 'en chambre' was danced. That is the figure of a fashionable cotillon, and couples proceed as follows: Cavaliers stand down the dancing hall side by side, with their fair partners in front. Explosive paper crackers are held out from line to line, and firing begins along the whole row. He or she who has pulled the side from which comes forth a paper cap has to put it on and waltz all round in this grotesque head-piece, be it a glazier's or drum major's. The effect on German heads can be fancied above gold-rimmed spectacles. At this ball it was I noticed some hideous toilettes, an excess of colors blended as inharmoniously as on the person of the first blue stocking met in London."

AWAKENING SUDDENLY.—To awaken children from their sleep with a loud noise, or in an impetuous manner, is extremely injudicious and hurtful; nor is it proper to carry them from a dark room immediately into a glaring light against a dazzling wall; for the sudden impression of light debilitates the organs of vision, and lays the foundation of weak eyes from early infancy.

FRENCH HEIRESES.—France is the country, par excellence, of heiresses. The other day Rigollot, the inventor of a new kind of mustard-poultice, gave his daughter a dower of 3,000,000*f*. Mdlle. Pinsaud, the perfumer's daughter, who was married last week, had a still larger portion, to say nothing of her great expectations. The approaching wedding of Mdlle. Lebeuf, better known as Miss Margaret Bellanger, is announced in nearly all the papers. She is to espouse one of the partners in a house of the Howell and James calibre. The marriage is to take place under the dotal régime, so that the lady will remain mistress of her own fortune. A few of the items in the inventory are a hotel, style Louis Quinze, built in 1867, in the Avenue Friedland, worth 1,700,000*f*; Gobelin's carpets, almost fresh from the looms, manufactured for the aforesaid hotel; many lots of building ground; laces, diamonds, gold and silver plate, shares in mines, railways, and gas works, with autograph letters from illustrious personages, which are said to be of historical and family interest. It is a pity that no "Golden Rose" perfumes this precious Corbeille de Mariage.

SUBURBAN RESIDENCE.

Drawn expressly for Godey's Lady's Book, by ISAAC H. HOBBS & SON, Architects, 436 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

THE above beautiful cottage was designed and built for Mr. Wm. Jackson, near Pittsburgh, Pa., and is a very commodious and comfortable residence. It is built on the slope of a hill, and entirely surrounded by large forest trees. Its peculiar plan affords the greatest possible capacity, as the hall, dining-room, sitting-room, and parlor can all be thrown into one grand room, which, being connected with back and money possible; some, indeed, do their best for the owner and he may find a beautiful scroll here, a nice bracket there, elegant cornices may surmount the whole, but in the end it wants unity and breadth.

We have seen many houses costing over $100,000, that have no merit or beauty, nothing to educate the taste, and not to be called ugly, are merely a waste of money by wrong appropriation and bad front porches by windows running to the floor, containing a very large area so that thirty sets of cotillon have danced comfortably at one time. The kitchen apartments are entirely separate, and the family can render comfortable a sufficient part of the house for their wants in winter. It has been occupied for two years, and the owner has remarked that if he were to build another house he would not alter in a single instance any portion of it. These sizes being less than used by him, the cost will be in accordance to finish and material used. The house cost the owner $15,000, but we will place it by the side of many costing $50,000, and for capacity, grand interior, as well as largeness of external appearance, entirely eclipse them. This may seem strange to many not knowing the value of architectural effect, and to the penny-wise and pound-foolish who attempt to build expensive residences without the aid of an architect, or who obtain a design from a carpenter or builder whose interest it is to make all the

Miss A. E. F.—Sent pattern 19th.

E. L. G.—Sent pattern 19th.

Mrs. M. F. V., Nebraska.—We can get you the diamonds you wish at any price between $5000 and $20,000, and as much higher as you may please.

Jose.—Lead combs cost $1 70. India rubber gloves $2 50 and $3 50 per pair, the latter having gauntlets. It would be impossible to do as you suggest, as we furnish everything desired, and it would be impossible to mention all.

Stanton.—1. We would advise the use of no cosmetics, nothing but pure soap and water. 2. Fine checks and stripes are very fashionable; black and white, lilac or green. 3. $12.

Ingemiso.—The author of this novel is requested by the ladies of Camden, Ala., to write another.

O. M., Leona, Texas.—We have published such receipts from year to year. We do not care to republish them, but can send you a copy of the LADY'S BOOK containing them for twenty-five cents.

A. F. B.—Every alternate page is best, but every page may be filled.

M. T. R.—We cannot make any new engagements during this year; perhaps next.

Metia.—Pronounced ay-yer-e.

A. D. R.—Crimping with heat injures the hair. Crimping by plaiting or putting up in pins does no harm. We cannot prescribe a remedy for the eruption on your face. Consult your physician.

M. L.—No sensible woman would dye her hair. Therefore we do not recommend any dye.

Mary.—Of course. Send back all the presents you received during the engagement.

E. O. R.—Philadelphia has many eminent dentists. If you write and inclose a stamp we will give you a name. Nothing is more unpleasant than to see decayed teeth. They are also unpleasant in another sense. We think you owe not only a duty to yourself but to society to have them replaced with artificial ones.

Polly and Carrie.—If the gentlemen has been introduced to you, and the presents he makes you are only of a trifling value, it is better to accept them gracefully than to decline them, which might possibly suggest that you attached more importance to them than he intended to convey.

P. E. D.—We recommend cutting the ends of the hair once a month.

Attie.—The lady need not recognize the gentleman unless she wishes to do so.

Elsie.—We think dancing a very healthy and pleasant recreation, and can see no objection to it.

H. P.—If you are engaged you should discontinue the correspondence, unless it is with the approval of your lover.

Fuchsia.—This elegant plant was so named in honor of Leonard Fuchs, a German botanist of the 16th century. This beautiful exotic is a native of Chili. The fuchsia, in the language of flowers, is appropriately used as the emblem of taste, for there is a peculiar elegance and beauty in the appearance of its pendent blossoms, which have also gained for it the name of "The Lady's Eardrop."

Will the author of "Where are the Daisies" favor us with her address?

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice.

The Publisher of the LADY'S BOOK has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the LADY'S BOOK, the Fashion Editor does not know.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE.
